severs us from the old life of sin and gives us access to eternal life “the eternal life which was with the Father and was made manifest unto us.”

Denying the Faith

The acceptance of the revolutionary truth that Jesus is the Son of God and our Master and Lord, by its very nature obligates us to imitate his life as partakers of the divine nature. As truth becomes available unto us we must embrace and apply it to our own life and conduct, or we deny the faith which brings us into relationship with the truth. To deliberately rebel against the life demanded by the relationship we sustain in the faith is to disown that relationship and the faith which creates it.

Faith is the foundation of the Christian life and love is its embodiment. In Christ Jesus “faith which works by love” is what counts. Love is the fulfilling of the law. All the commandments are summed up in it (Romans 13:10). Love must be in deed and in truth, not in mere word or speech. “But if any one has this world’s goods and sees his brother in need, yet closes his heart against him, how does God’s love abide in him?” (1 John 3:17).

This will explain a passage which is urged against our thesis in this article. In 1 Timothy 5 the apostle gives instruction relating to the case of widows. The community of saints is ordered to sustain real widows, that is, those who are left all alone, and bereft of all immediate relatives. Those widows having children or grandchildren are to be supported by their offspring. The record says, “If any one does not provide for his relatives, and especially for his own family, he has disowned the faith and is worse than an unbeliever” (verse 8).

Many unbelievers, motivated only by natural affection, would not allow a widowed mother to suffer. A Christian has the additional motive of belonging to Christ Jesus, whose ministry was summed up in the words, “He went about doing good.” To refuse to love others is to deny the working principle of the faith which is intended to bind us to Jesus. It is to make our profession empty, shallow and senseless. Rowland Hill was wont to remark that when a man becomes a Christian even his dog knows the difference.

Birth and Growth

The faith relates to the life and death of Jesus; the apostolic epistles relate to our own life and death. The faith portrays what Jesus has done and will do for us, and we accept it; the doctrine portrays what we must do for Jesus and we attempt it. One comes by proclamation; the other by indoctrination. Both are the word of God, but the gospel has to do with our begetting, the doctrine with our development. One may be begotten in a minute but continue to grow for a lifetime. One does not digest all of the food God has provided on the day he is born.

To confuse the faith which all must have to be in Christ with knowledge of the word which all must acquire as they grow in Christ is a tragic error. To make fellowship contingent upon uniformity in degree of knowledge is a fatal fallacy. If fellowship is based upon the faith, and the faith consists of every epistle in the new covenant scriptures, then one must fully know every passage or he cannot be in the faith. Yet Paul declares, “If any one imagines that he knows something, he does not yet know as he ought to know” (1 Cor. 8:2). This proves we are all deficient in knowledge, and the one who imagines that he is not is worse off than the others.

Those who plead for uniformity in knowledge of the word of God as a basis for fellowship must either demand perfect knowledge or else they must designate the areas in which one must know to be in the fellowship, as distinguished from those areas in which he may be ignorant and still be justified of God. How much in God's word can one be mistaken about and still be justified? What percentage must he be right about before God no longer recognizes him as in the family? How much must one grow in intellectual attainment in order to continue as a brother? How sick must one become from spiritual vitamin deficiency before the Father disowns him as a child?

To postulate that one must have perfect knowledge of every detail of revelation is to require inerrancy and infallibility and to demand that he be God. This is what I call "the Haman's gallows argument." If it is affirmed that fellowship with ourselves is contingent upon knowing all we know and understanding everything as we do, then our fellowship with God is dependent upon our knowing all that God knows and understanding everything as He does. Since no one is rash enough to claim this for himself, he admits he is not in fellowship with God, and damns himself by the argument he concocted to deny others. "By what judgment you judge you will be judged."

On the other hand, if he concedes that others do not need to agree upon every matter of doctrinal interpretation in order to be in the fellowship, he must exercise his human judgment as to what portion is essential. When he binds this upon others as a term of communion he exercises the prerogative of God. Was not the revelation of God given to all of the saints? Do others not have the same freedom as ourselves to make those emphases which are commended to their own intellects and consciences as important and relevant to the Christian walk? If, in the physical life, we must recognize the difference in digestive ability and capacity, shall we not do the same in the spiritual realm? Is not growth in the family of God progressive and individual?

Life is more important than food. "Is not the life more than meat?" (Matt. 6:25). The whole purpose of food is to sustain life. Bread which comes from the earth is the staff of physical life. The bread which came down from heaven is the staff of spiritual life. Any use of food to impair life, or any application of a theory of nutrition to destroy life, is criminal. If our emphasis upon physical food is such as to destroy human life and its relationships we have a warped view of the place of both life and bread. In the same manner we must regard the sacredness of the life in Christ Jesus as superior to the given means of growth. Our sense of values must never become so distorted that we sacrifice life for doctrinal correctness, especially when that correctness is determined by our own deductions and interpretations. Bread has not been given for the purpose of pounding the other children over the head. No one but the Great Physician can determine the proper amount of spiritual food intake and rate of growth for each of God's children. Those who berate others may themselves be deficient. Our problem is that we have too many "doctors" practicing without a license, each heading his own little clinic and dispensary.

The true basis of our continuance in corporate unity can never be predicated upon an arbitrarily determined degree of knowledge at a given time. If it is, we shall need to exclude from our fellowship in the afternoon those whom we immersed in the morning. If it be argued that when men come into Christ, we must give them time to grow, the same principle will force us to continue to be patient, forbearing and tolerant with them as long as they are growing in Him. Thus the basis of the corporate functioning in Christ is the faith which creates the state, and a proper attitude toward truth of those within that state. One may love truth and know little of it, or he may know a great deal and have but little respect for it. In the final analysis attitude is the determinant factor between true discipleship and sectarianism. One is not a sectarian because of where he happens to be at a given time, but because of his attitude toward truth regardless of where he is. This must never be forgotten, for if we forget it we will probably be sectarian.

Doctrinal Values

What relationship has the apostolic doctrine upon which we feed, with the faith which produces our life, or for that matter, is our life? To phrase the question in another fashion, what relationship exists between the germ by which we are begotten and the food of which we partake after birth? What relationship exists between the pasture upon which a sheep forages and that which makes it a sheep? We propose to face up to these matters frankly, fully and fearlessly. In order for you to follow our reasoning with greater facility we will present our views in numerical sequence.

1. Both the gospel (Good News) which brings us into affinity with eternal life and the apostolic doctrine which sustains us, are the word of God. Paul commended the Thessalonians because they accepted the gospel “not as the word of men but as what it really is, the word of God, which is at work in you believers” (1 Thess. 2:13). To the Corinthians he wrote, “If any one thinks that he is a prophet, or spiritual, he should acknowledge that what I am writing to you is a command of the Lord. If any one does not recognize this, he is not recognized” (1 Cor. 14:37, 38). We accept without question or quibble that the Good News of salvation in Christ Jesus and the means of Christian growth are both from the Father of lights.

2. The apostolic letters do not constitute the new covenant, or new testament, and are nowhere said to do so in the sacred writings. The new covenant is not a written code (2 Cor. 3:6). It is not even written with ink (2 Cor. 3:3). The apostolic letters were written with pen and ink (3 John 13). The new covenant is an individual and personal Agreement by which one commits himself to, and is adopted by God into his family, as a child. This covenant is written on human hearts by the Spirit of the living God (2 Cor. 3:3; Heb. 8:10). This divine-human Compact cannot be effected by any other person on earth for another. Neither can it be affected by any other person. Read those two sentences again!

3. Those who heard the Good News on Pentecost, and accepted its implications for their lives entered into the new covenant relationship as fully as any persons ever did since that time. At the moment, they knew nothing of the apostolic doctrine which was gradually revealed over a period of many years as need arose and abuses were created by those in the covenantal relationship. The gospel which produced the covenantal relationship had to be announced prior to that relationship which it was to create and which grew out of it; while the apostolic doctrine was revealed as a need was felt for information as to conduct and behavior in Christ. The entrance into the life relationship was not contingent upon knowledge of subsequent doctrine. The gospel was to make children of God; the apostolic doctrine was to make the children of God better.

4. The Good News was never proclaimed to any person with any other intention or objective than to bring him into covenant relationship with God through Jesus Christ. No apostolic letter was ever written to any person or group to bring such person or group into the covenant relationship. All letters were written to those in covenant relationship and because they were in it. The very first letter Paul wrote was addressed to those who were in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. The second letter was addressed to the same identical ones.

5. The apostolic epistles are not a pattern or blueprint. There is a difference between a love letter and a blueprint. One may contain advice but the other sets forth specifications. A blueprint must always be available in full and in the hands of the builders before construction starts. There were many in Christ Jesus who actually suffered death for him before the first epistle was written. Congregations of saints had been planted and grew in spiritual stature before letters were ever written to them. Our pattern is a person! Our life is unity with that person! "He who has the Son has life; he who has not the Son has not life" (1 John

5:12). “He is our wisdom, our righteousness and sanctification and redemption” (1 Cor. 1:30). Our pattern is not external but internal. Our lives are shaped and transformed by the Spirit and not by an external code. We “are being changed into his likeness from one degree of glory to another; for this comes from the Lord who is the Spirit” (2 Cor. 3:18).

6. The purpose of the apostolic epistles is to provide, by our assimilation of truth as revealed, for our growth in the divine nature in order that we may automatically and spontaneously act and react to given situations as Jesus would under the same circumstances. It was when congregations responded as Jesus would that Paul wrote them letters of thanksgiving and commendation as he did to Philippi, “let your bearing toward one another arise out of your life in Christ Jesus” (2:5). It was when they did not that he wrote them of the dangers attendant upon such a course. “But that is not how you learned Christ” (Eph. 4:20). Christianity is not Jesus pointing us to a book as a pattern, but a book pointing us to Jesus as our pattern.

This will make all of the difference in the world in our attitude toward each other. Every sincere person thinks he understands and does just what the book teaches. His stock-in-trade remedy for disunity is the platitude, “If everyone will just take the Bible for what it says, and do just what it teaches, we will all be one.” This old cliché has been proven unrealistic and unworkable. Those who mouth it the most are the most strife-torn and divided. In spite of the sincerity of each, what is actually meant is, “If everyone will just take the Bible for what I say it means, and do just what I teach it requires, we will all be one.” All of our confusion stems from the fact that every one who regards the Bible as our pattern, thinks he perfectly grasps that pattern while others labor in ignorance, stubbornness and stupidity. All of us have seen communities where there are five or six different groups who say that if everyone will take the Bible for what it says, unity will result, and yet none of the six have anything to do with any of the others. The world is catching on to such childishness and inconsistency.

Once we recognize that Jesus is the pattern, it follows that the greater our sincerity the more humbly will we admit that we fall far short of this example, and the easier it is to recognize that none of us are perfectly following the pattern. Then we can receive each other in Christ as equals— not in knowledge, understanding or perception— but in our need of grace to save. It creates a lot of difference in attitude if we think that some of us are already on higher ground tossing a rope to those who are floundering about in the waves, or if we recognize that all of us are still in the deep and are all struggling together to reach a goal or ideal. We need to be careful that we do not secretly pride ourselves that it is by our grace others can be saved.

The real criterion is not at all our knowledge of a code or book, even though divinely given. It is love for a person. In the school of Jesus it is not mastery of a text but affection for the teacher which brings recognition. Knowledge inflates self, but love inspires imitation of another. As the apostle puts it, “Knowledge puffs up, but love builds up. If anyone imagines that he knows something, he does not yet know as he ought to know. But if one love God, one is known by him” (1 Cor. 8:1-3). Of course if we truly love him we will want to hear what he says and do what he asks us to do. We will not do this because of legalistic demands but because of loving commands.

7. Nothing we have said herein is intended to derogate the apostolic epistles. It is written simply to place doctrine in proper perspective, to enable us to regard it as God intended. To say that life does not originate with bread is not to speak disparagingly of bread. To observe that family relationship is not created by food is in no sense to undervalue food. The man who truly grasps what we are saying will find the revealed word of God growing more precious unto him day by day. This has been our personal experience in the freedom we enjoy from the pettifogging trivia which legalistic attitudes convert into tests of communion. “Christ sets us free, to be free men. Stand firm, then, and refuse to be tied to the yoke of slavery again” (Gal. 5:1). We intend to study God’s precious truth for ourselves. We shall allow no one to do our thinking on earth who cannot answer for us at the judgment. And this very resolution makes every word within the sacred pages pulsate with life and glow with the light of new meaning and relevance in our own life.

Every person who truly loves the Father will want to know all that the Father has said. While it is true that one who commits himself to Christ obligates himself by that very act to familiarize himself with all that God has taught, he will not do so out of a sense of obligation but as a joyful privilege. It is one thing to study to be a shrewd lawyer, and a wholly different thing to study to be a loving and affectionate son. Such a son will be as tolerant of others in their deficiencies as the Father is of his weaknesses. He will not set up a standard for others which God has not set up for all. This warrants the following observations.

1. The word of God has a meaning and the doctrine of God can be understood. Such understanding can only result from diligent investigation by earnest students who examine the text of the revelation and apply to their research those rules of logical interpretation which govern such matters. When proper examination has been made, free from preconceived bias, the result must be conceded to be the doctrine of Christ as given through his holy envoys, the apostles.

2. In view of the fact that such conclusions must depend in part, or in whole, upon the deductions made from the sacred scriptures, and thus represent the sacred oracles as filtered through human rational processes, the conclusions cannot be constituted conditions of union or communion, or tests of one’s relationship to the Father. They must not be regarded as the basis of life but of growth and that rate differs with each individual in Christ.

3. The deductions from the sacred revelation as made by one individual, or a group of individuals conducting research in concert, are not formally binding upon any other individual, unless commended unto such individual by his own investigation, perception and conscience. They can be shared with others but not saddled upon them, for they can be binding only to the degree and in the measure that they are personally grasped and comprehended. If this be not true the following evils will result.

a. Individual responsibility will be destroyed and men will be subjected to creedal tests and criteria arbitrarily imposed.

b. Those who concur with such imposition upon themselves will repose their faith in the wisdom of men rather than in the wisdom of God.

c. The supreme court of appeal will be “the infallible interpretation” of each party, a thought as reprehensible as “an infallible interpreter,” or pope.

4. No opinion, honestly held by a child of God, can be made a basis for fellowship or a test of it. Such an opinion must never be bound upon others as a creed, nor must others threaten excommunication of one who holds such opinion if he does not relinquish it. The sword of the Spirit must never be used to kill or destroy those who are indwelt of the Spirit. Separation upon the basis of opinion must never be condoned. The called out ones are never called out from among the called out.

My Personal Position

All of God’s children are my beloved brethren. I have no brothers who are not beloved. I have no half-brothers, step-brothers, or brothers-in-law in Christ Jesus. Some of my brothers believe that instrumental music is justified by the apostolic doctrine, some do not. Some believe that the pre-millennial coming of Jesus is taught, some do not. Some think that institutional orphan homes are authorized by the scriptures, some do not. Some believe Bible classes are condoned by Jesus and the apostles, some do not. On every controversial issue which has disturbed our tranquility some of my brothers take one position, while some take another.

They are all my brothers, not because of any of their views but in spite of all of them. I shall recognize them as brothers publicly and privately. I will call upon them to pray and participate in meetings. I will love them and cherish them. I shall maintain my personal convictions about all of the troublesome problems— instrumental music, the pre-millennial concept, orphan homes, classes, colleges, cups— but I will not allow these to negate or deny the sublimity of our relationship.

We are members of the same body. We are branches of the same Vine. We are sheep of the same flock. We are children of the same Father. No one will ever again herd me into a party corral where I must set at nought or mistreat some of my brothers to be recognized and used by a group of others. I value the love of my Lord too highly. The price one pays for factionalism is too great. The Christ whom I serve is not a party chieftain but Lord of the whole church. He is not the president of a faction but the head of the whole body— every member of it!

I have no perfect brothers. They are all brothers in error. All of them are as weak and fallible, as helpless and remiss, as myself. Some are in error on some things, some on other things, but none of them know all there is to know, and none are free from error. No, not one! It is foolish and arrogant for brothers in error to label others as “brothers in error” as if those who slapped on the label were free from all error. Such men, knowing their own failures and shortcomings should be ashamed to live and afraid to die!

If I am in the fellowship with any brothers at all they are brothers in error. This does not bother me because it is this kind of persons to whom grace is extended. Those who are perfect as God will not need the blessings of grace. I do not love error. I simply love my brothers and I do not intend to deny brotherhood on the basis of imbecility, lack of understanding or mistaken views. If life in Christ consisted of being right about everything and every point of doctrine, I would have to confess that I have never lived, and the “I” of today would have to sever all relationship with the “Me,” of yesterday.

I do not plead that my brethren accept instrumental music, pre-millennialism, orphan homes, classes, cups or colleges. I simply plead that they quit playing God and accept all of God’s children as their brothers. God does not tell us how to treat the lengthy catalogue of disturbing items. He does tell us how to treat our brothers. I might be right about all of these things and go to hell because I did not show love for my brothers, or, I might be mistaken about a lot of things and go to heaven because I love my Father and all of His children.

We live in Christ through the faith, the one faith, the faith once for all delivered. That faith is created by the cross. It is not a faith based upon being in the right position about everything, but upon being in the right Person. I shall elevate nothing higher than the cross. I will allow nothing to overshadow it. I will permit the blood of the cross to blot from my life those things which hinder, but I will permit none of these to blot out the blood of the cross. The life is in the blood. I will use the cross to batter down walls between brethren but I will not use it to batter down brethren. This is my position!

Except They Be Agreed

Mission Messenger (November 1965)

Volume 27

[Abstract]

Solomon was the last monarch of the twelve tribe kingdom in its undivided state. In the days of his son and successor, a revolt occurred because of the oppressive taxation required to maintain the opulent splendor of the regal family. Ten of the tribes seceded and set up the Kingdom of Israel under Jeroboam. He immediately introduced calf-worship at Dan and Bethel and plunged his domain into idolatry from which it never recovered. In 220 years nine different dynasties succeeded each other to the throne as a result of suicide, conspiracy and assassination.

If the reign of Jeroboam II in the fifth dynasty seemed an exception because of its outward prosperity, it was deceptive. The undercurrent of degeneracy continued unchecked beneath the surface. Because of it God called a prophet to denounce the open sins of the people. The man whom he selected was not a recognized prophet. He had not gone to one of the schools of the prophets which had flourished since the days of Samuel to train young men in the prophetic role. He was a simple farmer living in the wilderness serenity of the little village of Tekoah, six miles south of Bethlehem and twelve miles south of Jerusalem. His livelihood was derived from the rustic pursuits of herding cattle and caring for his sycamine fig orchard.

Since he lived in Judah, the commission to go to the king's court in Bethel, was a call to invade a hostile region. The message he was to deliver was calculated to make him more unpopular. In addition to his denunciation of corruption he was to foretell the captivity and exile of the people under a rapidly growing alien power. Amos lifted up his voice against the immorality, injustice and intemperance which characterized the people with such effectiveness that something had to be attempted to thwart his effort.

The local priest was Amaziah, a fawning sycophant on the king's payroll. He began his attack by telling Jeroboam that Amos was a conspirator, an implication that he was an infiltrator collaborating with the Davidic regime in Judah, and sent up north to create unrest and dissension. He then confronted Amos and ordered him off the property and out of the country, closing with the words, "Never again prophesy at Bethel, for it is the king's sanctuary, and it is a temple of the kingdom."

But the country preacher was not easily frightened. He pointed out that he was not a professional making his living out of prophesying nor was he a seminary graduate. He was actually following the flock at the very time the Lord said, "Go, prophesy to my people Israel." He then told Amaziah that his sons and daughters would be slain, his wife would have to become a prostitute in the city to support herself, his real estate holdings would be parceled out to strangers, and he would become a captive and die in a foreign land.

Because of the fearlessness of Amos we think the first part of his prophecy deserves some attention, especially since sermon text hunters (scriptural scrap-doctors, Alexander Campbell called them) have abused one of his statements to make him mean something he never even implied. The passage referred to is Amos 3:3 but we shall start at the beginning. Chapter 1 begins with a specification of the time when the prophecy was uttered. It was "two years before the earthquake," a tremor of such magnitude that the people in Jerusalem fled from it as they would the day of the Lord (Zech. 14:5).

It is important to note that the Lord is referred to as a lion whose den, or place of abode, is Jerusalem in Zion. So powerful is his voice and so certain its fulfillment that the pastures dry up and the dew-covered summit of Mount Carmel withers. The roar of God is expressed through his prophets. There follows in regular succession pronouncements against Damascus, in Syria; Gaza, Ashdod, Ashkelon and Ekron, in Philistia; Tyre in Phoenicia; Edom, Ammon, Moab, Judah, and Israel.

The utterances against these last two bring the prophet to the point where he addresses all of the tribes as a whole. They are more responsible than any other nation for two reasons, viz., God formed them as a nation by delivering them from the womb of Egypt, and he claimed them for his own out of all the nations of the earth. Now he speaks against them, because the day has come when their iniquities and their judgments have met. Throughout all denunciatory prophecy runs the thread of certainty that God will bring to judgment every evil work. The divine appointment is that inevitably the sin and its punishment must meet.

Since this is the very nature of divine justice the prophet appeals to natural reactions to illustrate it. He exemplifies it by two people walking together because of a previous appointment to meet, a lion roaring because he has captured prey, young lions snarling in a den over their food, a trap or snare springing shut because a victim has hit the trigger, or people in a city running for shelter when the official trumpet signals an alarm. His argument is simply one of cause and effect. He reasons that for every effect there is a cause and you may determine the cause by observation of the effect.

He concludes by pointing out that God does not visit his wrath upon a city without revealing his secret to the prophets.

When the prophets speak it is the voice of God and the populace should react accordingly. The prophet cannot resist speaking the word of God; the hearers should not resist obeying it. "The lion has roared; who will not fear? The Lord God has spoken; who can but prophesy?" With this introduction we are prepared to look at the prophetic message itself.

Can two walk together, except they be agreed?

Will a lion roar in the forest, when he hath no prey? will a young lion cry out of his den, if he have taken nothing?

Can a bird fall in a snare upon the earth, where no gin is for him? shall one take up a snare from the earth, and have taken nothing at all?

Shall a trumpet be blown in the city, and the people not be afraid? shall there be evil in a city, and the Lord hath not done it?

Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets.

The lion hath roared, who will not fear? the Lord God hath spoken, who can but prophesy?

The art of sermon-making, a skill wholly unknown to the new covenant scriptures, has led its practitioners far afield in their ardent pursuit of texts. When one is found which seems to suit the propaganda purpose of the hour, they operate and remove it from the contextual body, and by injections of their own intellectual distillate seek to make it develop into a new body of its own. No creation of homiletic fantasy better illustrates this than the use of Amos 3:3 by modern advocates of unity based upon conformity. The proponents of the cult of the rubber stamp have seized upon this passage as the one stone which will grind their grist, and wherever they speak the sound of that millstone is heard in the land.

As any person of even slight scholarly bent can ascertain for himself, this is an absurd abuse of the prophetic intent. Not only was Amos not providing a text for a sermon on unity but the passage is not even remotely connected with the use made of it by solemn clerics who weave from this one little filmy thread a gossamer web of tissue to cover all the saints in all of their association with each other.

Can two walk together unless they be agreed? Do two people have to agree upon everything in the world before they can walk together? If so, no two people on earth will walk together, or ever have done so. Shall we interpret God's word to forbid and make absolutely impossible the unity it commands? But I am told that this does not mean they must be agreed upon every thing. This surrenders the whole argument. Either two people must agree upon everything in order to walk together or else two people can walk together who are not agreed, and you will need to find a new text for the ridiculous doctrine of unity based upon conformity.

The utter absurdity into which people are driven by forced exegesis to sustain a pre-supposition and partisan position was observed not long ago in the home of a certain preacher. He contended that two could not walk together unless they were agreed, but his wife challenged that statement. She mentioned that she had never agreed with her parents on their attitude toward her brother but they still all continued to walk together as one family. She and her husband then got into an argument and could not even agree upon what it meant to be agreed, but the last I heard they were still walking together— and arguing as they walked!

The only unity possible on this earth to thinking people is unity in diversity. This is true in the domestic realm. My wife and I could not be one flesh at all if we were alike. It is our very diversity which makes our union possible. We are not uniform in our mental and intellectual attainments. We sometimes disagree in our understanding of the import of certain scriptures. We are held together by love and respect for each other as persons.

The same is true in the governmental realm. We are a part of the United States, but these fifty states which enjoy unity and constitute one body of people have a considerable diversity. Those who postulate unity upon conformity and deny that it can obtain in diversity, lie every time they give the flag salute and murmur, "One nation under God, indivisible." Can we walk together as citizens of the same republic if we disagree?

The only fellowship possible in the spiritual realm which involves fleshly men at all, must be unity in diversity. How could I be "in the fellowship of the Father and of His Son Jesus Christ" on any other basis? How else could I be in the fellowship with any of my brothers, seeing that I do not concur fully with any of them? No, not one! I am joined to my Lord and I am one spirit with him. But I am not as good as my Lord and I am not as wise as my Lord. The union of the perfect Lord Jesus with our imperfect selves while in the flesh, forever gives the lie to the fallacious notion that there can be no unity in diversity where the spirit is concerned.

But what did Amos mean? We will be helped in our understanding by consulting other versions. First, I shall refer to the translation by Robert Young, who was the author of various works in Hebrew, Chaldee, Samaritan, Syriac, Greek, Latin, etc., and who is best known to most of us as author of an Analytical Concordance. Dr. Young was quite critical of the King James translators for laxity in translating and compiled a lengthy list which he designated "Lax Renderings," and which we have found most interesting. He translates Amos 3:3,

"Do two walk together if they have not met?"

Many of our readers possess, or have access to a Revised Standard Version, and can easily ascertain that it renders the passage, “Do two walk together unless they have made an appointment?” It will readily be seen that if these are correct the use of this passage as descriptive of the nature of unity is forever barred to honest men who use integrity and do not “handle the word of God deceitfully.”

This brings us to a study of the word yaad, a Hebrew primitive root, which is defined by Strong’s Exhaustive Concordance thus, “To fix upon (by agreement or appointment); by implication to meet (at a stated time), to summon (to trial), to direct (in a certain quarter or position), to engage (for marriage).” The word translated “agreed” has not one thing to do with the attitude, purpose or nature of two people while walking together. The agreement is to meet and walk together, and is not related to walking together in agreement. The agreement or appointment precedes the walking together as the cause precedes the effect. The word yaad is not marriage, but engagement to marry; not occupying a position, but directing one to it; not a trial, but the summons to appear; not the state of walking together, but the appointment to meet for the walk.

The word occurs in the same form and tense 19 times in the Hebrew scriptures. It is translated “meet” 9 times, of which six (Exodus 25:22; 29:42, 43; 30:6, 36; Numbers 17:4) refer to God’s appointment to meet his people in the tabernacle. In Joshua 11:5 it relates to meeting together by appointment of a number of kings at the waters of Merom to fight against Israel. In Nehemiah 6:2, 10, it refers to the attempt of Sanballat, Geshem, and others, to meet with Nehemiah, to work mischief. The meeting never occurred.

Even more revealing is the usage of the word in Job 2:11 concerning Job’s three friends who came every one from his own place, “for they had made an appointment together to come to mourn with him and to comfort him.” The emphasized words are the translation of yaad. Any student of the book of Job knows that these three men did not share the ideas of God, Job, or one another, yet they were “together” with each other. There is no use of multiplying other usages of the original for to do so would be the equivalent of flogging a dead horse.

After all, we should not need to do profound reasoning to show that the controversial passage in Amos does not relate to unity based upon conformity. The inconsistency of those who affirm that it does is sufficient to prove the unworkability of their contention. Those who declaim the loudest that two cannot walk together except they be agreed are forced to walk with those with whom they cannot agree upon many things. They resort to the subterfuge of selecting some partisan test of fellowship which is elevated to a status above the cross and demanding agreement upon it, while allowing liberty upon most everything else. Each party has its own point of emphasis, its own unwritten creed. Each time one moves from one party to another he must alter his criterion for measuring togetherness and must cast out his brothers on a different basis than he did before.

I am opposed to this mixed-up mess and messed-up mix. I recognize no other appointment to meet than at the cross of Jesus. Nothing will be allowed to negate the oneness created by the cross. I will walk with all of God’s children even while I disagree with all of them about many things. I am walking today with my brothers who disagree with me about instrumental music, the millennium, cups, classes, colleges, and a great host of other things. I shall continue to walk with all of them tomorrow, for no party proponent will ever inveigle me again into aligning myself with any faction whose orthodoxy is the criterion of faithfulness to my blessed Lord and Savior. I shall walk together with all of my brothers, realizing that we are not together in head but in heart.

The world needs a demonstration of the victorious power of love over all lesser things. It needs to know that the cross can still batter down walls of partition. I intend, God being my helper, to prove it can be done. The best place to start is with a clear understanding of what God's word teaches. For that reason I suggest that all of my brothers look once more at Amos 3:3, and make an appointment for us to meet and walk together.

Playing It Safe

All sectarianism originates in fear and is perpetuated by it. It is fear which formulates creeds, erects walls, and dams the free flow of thought. Christianity is a great adventure. It thrives on daring deeds and epic achievements of men who burst their bonds and break their shackles. Christianity frees men; sectarianism enslaves them. The latter is the religion of the cross, the gibbet and the stake.

We have been observing recently how our brethren are victims of that timidity which comes from deliberately restricting their own horizon by simply refusing to lift up their eyes and look. It is obvious that what is being said about fellowship in MISSION MESSENGER is having a profound effect. It is evident in the renewed partisan attacks generally labeled "The New Ketcherside Unity Movement." The brethren are forced to take time and space from their favorite axe-grinding and use it to build their own factional walls higher and thicker. It can be seen in the clever insinuations in sermons and in the innuendoes in college classrooms, as the defenders of orthodoxy pump the bellows to keep the fires of prejudice glowing. For the first time in a century of shame, scandal and schism, a plea for unity and peace based upon spiritual depth and increasing insight is penetrating even the most extreme and reactionary segments of the non-instrument Churches of Christ.

Attitudes are changing at home and on the farflung mission fields of the world. The hearts of the humble yearn for a brighter day, when the acrid smoke of civil strife within the kingdom will no longer sear their nostrils or wring the tears from their eyes. There is a growing revulsion against the creation of artificial standards as the rallying point for clashing clans. Men are sick and tired of deserting the cross to dance and cavort around their own little rival maypoles while hurling challenges and insults at their brethren.

Why do we not see greater tangible results? There is no simple answer to such a question which is affected by the matted roots of traditional slogans. But we can give you an inkling with reference to one aspect of it. Repeatedly in these days we hear from brethren who write, "I have been reading your articles concerning fellowship and have come to the conclusion you may be right but I am going to keep on the safe side." Occasionally this is varied to read, "I am going to play it safe."

What does this mean? It means that frightened men, most of them preachers and elders, are going to continue to hide behind factional barricades and trust in their party affiliation for protection and security. The ground has been cut from beneath them as one scripture after another which they have wrested to justify division has been rescued for the cause of divine unity. They will cease to be as blatant in their condemnation of others and as bombastic in their challenges to dissenters. Their lessons will emphasize love as the hope for the future. In their hearts they will conclude that we are all "brothers in error" and that none of us know it all.

But when a brother drops in to visit them from a congregation which uses instrumental music, or from one that differs with the party on cups, classes, colleges, orphan homes or the millennium, they will give him the "deep freeze" treatment which consists of the cold shoulder and the frozen smile. This is playing it safe! It is the very opposite of the nature of the Christian concept. No one can follow Jesus by such an attitude. He can merely sit on the fence and watch!

Jesus lived in a nice comfortable heaven. It was completely walled in. He associated with angels who never spoke a questionable word. It was a wonderful, marvelous place filled with a glory that was before the world was. But He did not play it safe! He deliberately left it and came to associate with those who were enemies of God. He ate with publicans and outcast tax collectors. He was wept over and anointed by street-walkers and prostitutes. He was ridiculed by the religious, criticized by the conventional and ostracized by the orthodox. Those who claimed to have a closed circuit on the heavenly wave length called him “a glutton and a winebibber.” They hustled him out of his boyhood congregation and were going to throw him over a cliff to prove their loyalty to God. He associated and shared with too many who were not “faithful” so they remained on the safe side and killed him!

No one can participate in “the great adventure” who wants to remain in his quiet and serene little heaven behind walls of artificial jasper and with gates of cultured pearls. He who restricts his sharing to those who see everything as he does and who refuses to associate with those who disagree is not following Jesus at all. Jesus took risks for the sake of unity. If Jesus had set up the criteria for association and fellowship which his professed followers now project, he could not have left heaven and come to earth until all of us saw things as he did. Christianity is not made for heaven but for earth. It is warfare and there will be no more war in heaven. The one who caused the only war heaven ever knew was cast out and is now down here. We need to be shaken out of our little air-conditioned factional heavens where we spend our time talking to ourselves and start following Jesus. It is difficult to walk while sitting in a pew. Too many brethren get their spiritual exercise by pedaling stationary bicycles. They always get off where they got on. But it is safer that way!

Saul of Tarsus could have played it safe. He was valedictorian in his rabbinical class at the Hillel School in Jerusalem. He might have succeeded Gamaliel as president some day. He could draw up a list of qualifications that topped any other candidate. "If any other man thinks he has reason for confidence in the flesh, I have more." Then he saw Jesus and took the plunge. "For his sake I have suffered the loss of all things and count them as refuse." Later on when he attended religious services on the campus he was assaulted by some of the alumni, who dragged him out of the chapel and slammed the door shut. They were beating him up until he was rescued by the state troopers who got a call that there was a riot going on.

The "mother church" with which he met when he was in the city had a very restricted view of who should share in the Good News of Jesus. It was the idea of the elders and membership generally that every place on earth must be just like themselves to be recognized of God. They could not distinguish between Christianizing the world and Judaizing it. As they saw it, a missionary who was loyal must insist that every one embrace the forms and traditions which characterized their congregation. They packed enough weight that even their leaders when visiting congregations in other countries quickly snapped back in line when they learned that a "missions inspection team" from the home church had arrived in town.

If Paul had stayed on the safe side the community of saints for which Jesus gave his life would have been just another sect. But he refused to recognize any creed but Christ or any test of fellowship except Christian character based upon faith. He recognized those who placed emphasis on ceremonial ritual and those who did not; those who had scruples about dietary restrictions and those who had none; those who esteemed certain days as having significance and those who regarded all days alike. He was concerned only that no one make a test of brotherhood out of his personal views about such matters. It was his contention that, since the kingdom of heaven did not consist of such matters, they should not be made the criteria of union or communion in the one body. He held that all that was necessary to join us as brothers was just what it took to join us to Jesus—no more and no less!

He was denounced as ultra-conservative by those who wanted to make a prey of the church by philosophy “according to the elemental spirits of the universe, and not according to Christ.” They did not like it because he insisted, “For in him the whole fulness of deity dwells bodily . . . and you were buried with him in baptism, in which you are also raised with him through faith in the working of God.” It was rather obnoxious to the intellectuals to hear any one naive enough to think that deity could be invested in a historical figure or that baptism had anything to do with coming into relationship with the divine.

Mostly, though, he was decried and disparaged as a liberal because he refused to bow his neck to any party yoke, and branded “selfishness, dissension, party spirit, and envy” as works of the flesh. When he was in a congregation that had four factions he refused to be confined to any of them but called them all “brethren” and treated them all as being “in Christ.” To Paul the Christian life was not staid, stagnant or stifling. It was a thrill-filled adventure, vibrant, throbbing and pulsating with joy. “We are treated as impostors, and yet are true; as unknown, and yet well known; as dying, and behold we live; as punished and not killed; as sorrowful, yet always rejoicing; as poor, yet making many rich; as having nothing and yet possessing everything.” As Paul viewed it, Christianity was for eagles soaring in the wild blue yonder, and not for barnyard fowl clucking contentedly to each other while pecking in the tame brown dust of the corral.

God needs preachers who will not “play it safe” with reference to the status quo. We will never get over our sectarian state so long as we hide behind our sectarian fences. Brethren need to have the raw courage to go anywhere the Spirit opens up a great door and effectual for communication and promote peace by personal contact. Jesus “came and preached peace” and he did it to those who were not at peace with each other or in agreement with him. We need to cross back and forth across our “crazy-quilt pattern” of lines. The shameful “Berlin walls” of the spiritual realm should be disregarded, rendered null and void. One does not fraternize with the “enemy” when he shares with God’s other children. The devil never pulled a more clever stratagem than when he caused us to regard our own brothers as aliens. If men cannot be free and supported financially they are enslaved by a chain of gold. They should free themselves to teach school, dig ditches, or do some other worthy work which will permit them to assist in the crusade for unity among all the believers in the Lord Jesus Christ.

God needs elders who will not “play it safe” to appease a narrow, provincial, sectarian attitude. Elders are called to feed the sheep and lead them into the broad paths of Christian grace and love. There are too many who want to keep the flock confined to stalls of their own construction and throw down only the hay which they have cured. Let the elders be men of valor. Let them daringly rise above parochial, illiberal and intolerant views and practices. Let them scrape off the superficial and superfluous traditions which have accumulated like barnacles on the Ship of Zion and free that vessel to sail through the sea of life unhampered.

Elders must resist pressure from without, of editors who talk glibly of congregational autonomy and exercise diocesan dictatorship. Why should not a congregation of saints be free under God to listen to any consecrated person whom they wish to hear? Why should not brethren have the God-given liberty to invite any brother to share his thinking with them as long as he is not dogmatic, arbitrary or uncharitable? Let us cease to erect artificial barriers of our own devising. Let us make peace. Let us dare to be one in spite of differences. This is no time for cowardice. Shall we play it safe when the cause we love is in danger?

They are slaves who fear to speak

For the fallen and the weak;

They are slaves who will not choose

Hatred, scoffing and abuse,

Rather than in silence shrink

From the truth they needs must think;

They are slaves who will not be

In the right with two or three.

[Abstract]

An editorial in Firm Foundation,
September 14, 1965

It is regrettably true that the heirs of the Restoration have seen fit to part on many issues. We feel uncomfortable when anyone points out that “there are twenty-five different segments” of the Restoration Movement. We do not believe that this accurately describes the church at all. It seems that some gloat over the number of such differences they can find. They would make every little difference of opinion a “split,” and it isn’t true. However, it is true that there are some cleavages in brotherhood thinking that should not be there.

We must point out that all shades of thinking among us have much in common. Each group will quote with the same vigor the pioneers of the Restoration. One group thinks as much of Campbell, Fanning, Smith, Stone and Scott as does the other. And behind these men there was a heritage of respect for the Bible gained from various Protestant sources.

Even among second generation restorationists like McGarvey, Lipscomb, Errett, Sommer, Pendleton, Pinkerton, Rowe, Johnson and Clark there was a bond of brotherhood. Even though they had begun to differ from each other over such questions as the missionary society, the use of instrumental music, the millennium, located preachers and the Sunday School, they still worked together when they could conscientiously do so, and maintained communication with each other and in most instances friendship to the end of their lives. Party issues had not yet crystallized.

Even after major cleavages had occurred there were some giants who tried to keep lines of communication open. East of the Mississippi numerous men, even into the 20th century strove to maintain dialogue between elements of the Restoration which were gravitating further and further apart. We were fortunate enough to hear Daniel Sommer's now famous speech at Abilene Christian College in the early thirties in which in the closing years of his life he sought to close the gap his own teachings had created. We were also fortunate enough to have passing friendship with N. L. Clark during the last years of his life, and to hear him speak with regret of the cleavage the opposition to "Sunday Schools" had caused. We feel sure that some of this generation will weep bitter tears before they die over the cleavage of the past ten years.

That there are divisions in the body of Christ none will deny. They had that in the church at Corinth. We have it today. It is as sinful today as it was then. But to refer to every little difference of opinion among brethren as a "segment of the Restoration Movement" is a little ridiculous.

There are many times when brethren differ one from another— within a congregation and between congregations. As we look back upon history we feel that in all likelihood it was good for all of us that we have been forced to constantly re-examine all the postulates and all the consequences of our differences. True unity must be found in the Scriptures, and nowhere else. At the same time there is a basic need for a certain amount of friction within the society of saints, lest they become petrified through lack of challenge to study. Every challenge the saints have received, whether it comes from denominational or heathen sources, or whether it comes from other saints, stimulates us to deeper study of the scriptures and increase (sic) activity in the interest of righteousness. Some diversity of opinion and method among churches is essential for incentive, and is a prod that goads along the way the odyssey of the human spirit. Brethren require of other brethren enough in common to understand each other, enough difference to provoke attention, and enough worth emulating to command admiration.

It would be to damn the Restoration to hopeless fracture if we should shut the door completely to dialogue between brethren whose opinions and whose interpretations of scripture differ. We must maintain contact with each other and prayerfully and hopefully work toward a better understanding of the scriptures upon the part of us all. We must never consider theological discussion closed between any two elements of brethren.

Unity is always to be sought within the framework of scripture; never outside it. We have no liberty or license to set aside what the Bible teaches in order to have fellowship. If fellowship is in a Person it is in the teachings of that Person. Salvation is in Christ which means on Christ's terms and within the framework of Christ's teachings. Likewise unity is in Christ— which means Christ's terms and within the framework of Christ's teachings. To attempt to set aside Christ's teaching either on the plan of salvation or the basis of Christian unity would be folly. There can be no fellowship— outside of Christ's teachings.

It would be unfortunate if in our discussions with each other we should meet only in the twilight zone of our mutual agreements. These are not the grounds upon which we took leave of each other. It is certainly good to explore mutual ground, but to do this at the expense of examining with honest hearts the grounds of difference would be unprofitable. To close our minds to the fruitful possibility of discussing points of difference would be to kiss fellowship goodbye, and murder any hope of unity. With mutual respect for the conscientious belief of each other let us consider one another in love, and always keep the door of communication open.

Unity— not compromise— should always be the goal of our efforts. It is time we see how close we can get together rather than how far we can get apart. And in it let us pray, “Not my will but thine be done.”

REMARKS ON THE FOREGOING

Although we have sought, in the interest of peace, to avoid direct reference to fellow-editors except when our name has been specifically mentioned, we are encouraged by the tone of this editorial by our esteemed brother in Christ, Reuel Lemmons, to make an exception to our policy. We trust that our readers will bear with us in a review of the article and in a suggestion we shall offer.

Our good brother admits that heirs of the Restoration “have seen fit to part ways on many issues.” He does not say how many factions there are but he thinks we set the figure too high when we mention “twenty-five different segments” of the Restoration movement. He infers that every little difference of opinion is made a “split.” By our use of the word “segment,” which is merely a polite term for sect, we mean an exclusivistic party which makes a definite test of fellowship out of something which God has not made a condition of salvation. We do not refer to “little differences of opinion,” but to opinion elevated (or degenerated) into partisan tests of fellowship.

There are at least twenty-five such parties within the restoration spectrum. We have personally visited and conversed with representatives of twenty-one of them, and trust, through God's grace, to visit the rest, seeing they also contain our brothers. While others may gloat over "the number of such differences," we are seeking by association and sharing of thought to reduce tensions and eliminate further strife and division. Our divided state is a scandal and shame, an occasion of sorrow and sadness. Our esteemed brother does not know how many segments exist because he limits his efforts to the faction for which he is one of the chief spokesmen. He espouses the fallacy that it is "the Lord's church" to the exclusion of the others. We do not say this derogatorily, but merely as a point of fact, since we once held the same position as to the faction with which we were identified.

It is true that we have much in common, but it will come as a distinct surprise to most of the brethren who differ with us about the missionary society, instrumental music, and the pre-millennial interpretation, to know that our brother considers the door is still open for maintaining communication and dialogue. Most of them have thought that the orthodox party with which our brother is affiliated had slammed the door shut. Certainly the members of this party are conspicuous by their absence in every gathering of free men from various segments to engage in dialogue. In several places where our brother has labored, preachers and elders have issued decrees that their members must boycott such meetings. Brethren all over this country who use instrumental music and have sought to establish forums for open discussion have been rebuffed and repulsed. They can furnish our good brother photostatic copies of letters which are arrogant and insulting, received in reply to invitations issued in kindness. I know whereof I speak. I have read these rude epistles with sadness. The writers refuse to engage in dialogue and know only one course to pursue, that of unlovely insinuation and unbrotherly challenge to partisan debate.

I have published this editorial so our readers all over the world will see that there is still hope because of the changing attitudes of men like our esteemed brother. In April, 1962, he said in an editorial personally attacking our position, "Brethren are united only when they see alike." It is refreshing to hear him now say that it is ridiculous to think that differences of opinion indicate division. While our brother once condemned me for saying that the only unity possible for thinking men is unity in diversity, he now goes so far as to assert, "There is a basic need for a certain amount of friction within the society of saints," and also, "Some diversity of opinion and method among churches is essential for incentive."

We concur heartily and sincerely with the paragraph in which our brother says, "It would be to damn the Restoration to hopeless fracture if we should shut the door completely to dialogue between brethren whose opinions and whose interpretations of scripture differ. We must maintain contact with each other and prayerfully and hopefully work toward a better understanding of the scriptures upon the part of us all. We must never consider theological discussion closed between any two elements of the brethren." This expresses our own viewpoint better than we could express it. I share in the sentiment without reservation.

On January 2, 1964, I wrote to Roy H. Lanier, Sr., Denver, Colorado, a brother who is a staff writer for Firm Foundation, in these words: "I suggest that we meet in Denver to engage in dialogue with reference to the question of fellowship and its relationship to the current status of the Restoration Movement. I suggest that we hold six sessions of two hours each, and that in the first session each of us take one hour to present his position on some agreed upon phase of the subject, and follow this by a two hour session in which we question each other in the presence of the public, and this, in turn, with another two hour session in which we sit down together and allow the audience to question us. I suggest that we repeat the same procedure with a second phase of the subjects so interesting in this day. In such a confrontation only truth can gain. If you concur with this fair and non-partisan approach, I further suggest that you agree to announce it in three issues (at least) of Firm Foundation and I shall do the same in three issues of Mission Messenger, and I shall urge representatives of all segments of the Restoration Movement to attend and participate in the questioning.”

Our good brother Lanier rejected this approach to dialogue. He wrote, “I am not in the position you are; I am so related to brethren in the area that I cannot do such things without their fellowship and endorsement. The brethren in this area would have to realize the need of such discussion. Next, they would have to be allowed to choose their representative. I have talked with several preachers and they doubt if you have a sufficient following in the area to justify giving you an audience.”

Our brother did not want dialogue but partisan debate as a representative of a particular faction. He said, “I would insist on at least two nights of regular debate for one night of questions previously agreed on, at least as to the field of inquiry. Also general propositions would have to be drawn which would obligate you to affirm the outstanding doctrines you have taught since 1957. I am not interested in giving you an audience before which you would say a lot of pretty things about fellowship.”

I am heartened by the fact that the situation has so changed that the editor of the paper of which Brother Lanier is a staff writer now makes a plea for dialogue as the means of holding the door open. Brother Lemmons differs with my approach to making the spirit of the Restoration movement relevant to our day. He has accused me of surrendering in toto the entire restoration plea and of completely losing sight of any former truth which I held. He also wrote about me, “He has swung from the extreme of the narrowest of sectarian spirits to the broadest cover-everything-stand-for-nothing liberalism.” In one issue he charged me with gross error and rank liberalism, and declared that my current writing and speaking constitute “a glaring example of blindness.” None of this has affected my love or respect for our brother. I think I understand the pressures upon him. I realize that when I was editing a factional journal I wrote the same way about some of my brothers with whom I differed. Brother Lemmons is a good man, and I do not think he really wants to write as he feels forced to do in his position.

But now I have a proposal to make to our gracious brother. On the basis of his own editorial I propose that the two of us “keep the door open” by meeting for open dialogue. Specifically, I propose that we meet in some Texas city of his own designation, for two full days of three sessions each, with each session lasting two hours. In the morning session let each of us speak one hour in setting forth his position on fellowship. In the afternoon session let the two of us question each other an equal amount of time for better understanding. At night let us sit down together and allow the audience to question us both for two hours. Let us then conclude the two day confrontation with joint prayer that God may use us as instruments of His grace in promoting unity among all of the saints. Let us do this as free men, representing no one but ourselves, even as we shall be judged in the last day.

I further propose that we invite all of the concerned ones among the Disciples of Christ, Independent Christian Churches, and various types of Churches of Christ, to attend and share in the occasion by directing questions to us in the evening forums. I pledge to Brother Lemmons, upon my sacred honor, that I will conduct myself toward him and all others who attend, as a Christian gentleman, and that when we part I shall love him as my brother as much as I do now. Because of the current atmosphere it is my earnest conviction that the two of us may go far toward relieving tensions and uniting our brothers across all lines and barriers within the restoration movement.

For reasons I shall not here disclose, I now feel that if effective witness of the original ideals of the restoration movement can ever be made to the leaders of the ecumenical movement, it will probably come from those in the non-instrument segment who dare to rise above partisan considerations and establish rapport with world leaders of theological thought. But time is running out and our own shameful divisions hinder us in any attempt to approach such groups as “the Faith and Order Commission,” which are affecting the hearts of men in our day. I refuse to believe that the restoration ideal is invalid, but if there is not enough dynamic in it to hold us together, on what ground can we expect it to be accepted as it was originally defined by Alexander Campbell—a project for uniting the Christians in all of the sects.

I urge our readers in all segments of the restoration spectrum to write Brother Lemmons and encourage him in his announced purpose of actually using dialogue as a tool to forge the bonds of unity. I concur with him that we should not meet only in “the twilight zone of mutual agreements,” and I am ready and anxious to explore with him “the fruitful possibility of discussing points of difference.” His statement which follows is a noble one: “With mutual respect for the conscientious beliefs of each other let us consider one another in love, and always keep the door of communication open.” In the unabridged spirit of that declaration I invite my good friend and brother to share with me in public dialogue in consideration of our differences as to the grounds and nature of fellowship and unity among the saints of God.

Perhaps our brother would like to arrange a mutual dialogue on the campus of Abilene Christian College, where he serves on the board, and where members of the faculty could act as moderators. Failing this, perhaps some congregation with the courage to face twentieth century problems would consider inviting the two of us to engage in dialogue, with the elders serving as chairmen. I am not afraid of any of my brothers in the Lord. I shall not quibble about mere details. Time is failing us. We must get on with the task of unity among ourselves so we can present a case and a demonstration to the ecumenical world around us. I am so thoroughly convinced that the Spirit will work with and through one who trusts in Jesus completely that I am ready to go anywhere at any time.

You may write our brother by addressing Reuel Lemmons, P.O. Box 610, Austin, Texas 78767. May God use us both as instruments to bring about an answer to the prayer of His Son for the oneness of all who believe upon Him through the apostolic testimony is my own prayer. Let the truth be known!

The Works of Darkness

In a thrilling statement addressed to God's people at Ephesus, the apostle Paul declares that unity in Christ is the purpose, will and pleasure of the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Moreover, that unity is to be universal. It is to include all in heaven and on earth. "He has made known to us his hidden purpose— such was his will and pleasure determined beforehand in Christ— to be put into effect when the time was ripe: namely, that the universe, all in heaven and on earth, might be brought into a unity in Christ" (Eph. 1:9, 10). One who devotes his life to the promotion of unity among the saints acts in harmony with the divine purpose. He serves the will of God. He is responsive to the divine pleasure.

If the holy scriptures contain a revelation from God in which the mind of God is found expressed, it follows that they must be wholly in accord with the purpose of God. Any use of these writings to create, condone, or continue division within the family of God must be misuse and abuse. The sacred scriptures, like any other communication between rational beings, are subject to interpretation and application by those who read them, and one criterion of accuracy in both areas is whether our view formulated by study is conducive to the reduction or increase of tensions among the disciples of Christ.

No governing principle expressed in words, whether of divine or human origin, is proof against distortion by prejudiced hearts. Not all prejudice is deliberate and all of us are prejudiced in one degree or another. It is a temptation to use the scriptures in such a manner as to give credence to our traditional positions and attitudes. Men may wrest what God has said and do it without recognizing an ulterior motive. We should be ready always to investigate anew our views and explanations, realizing that while God's word is sacred, our deductions are not necessarily so. There is a danger that we will see in the scriptures what we want to see. Our predispositions are stronger than most of us like to admit.

If it be true that God has designed that all who are in Christ be one, it follows that there must be a separation between those who are in Christ and those who are out of Christ. If the first are citizens of the kingdom, the others are aliens from it. To justify division in Christ one would have to destroy such distinction. That which applied to the wall between children of God and children of the devil would have to be wrested to make it appear applicable to the children of God in their relationships, so that walls could be erected between saints. Nothing can be more contributory to confusion and disorder than such a course, yet nothing is more common among those who profess loyalty to the Lord.

Passages pertaining to the relationship of believers with unbelievers are lifted from their context and made to apply to the relationship of believers with each other. A caution against an unequal yoke is magnified into prohibition of an equal one. Because the temple of God has no agreement with idols it is made to appear that the stones in the temple should have no cement between them. Because he that believes has no part with an infidel it is affirmed with equal force that he should have no part with other believers who differ with him about matters not directly concerned with the faith. The called out are called upon to come out from among the called out. Those whom God has called together are called to separate under the guise of pleasing

Him.

In this is seen the difference between the Holy Spirit and the unholy spirit of the party. The former uses the word to draw us together; the other uses the same word to drive us apart. One regards the scripture as a divine cement; the other as a solvent. Although we have dealt with the schismatic abuse of the sacred oracles in previous issues we propose to add some observations to what has been said by reference to another passage in Ephesians (5:11) which has been used as occasion to lend sanction to strife and disunion.

And have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them.

In the desire to find sanction for factional and exclusivistic attitudes, men have seized upon the expression, “have no fellowship,” and employed it as the tool for fragmenting the saints. The “unfruitful works of darkness” are converted in the factional crucible into every point of difference arising among the brethren, and those who disagree with arbitrary opinions can be hounded out and treated with contempt and disdain as heathen and publicans. It is astounding that any one who poses as a Christian teacher could possibly make an application of this passage to brethren whose only “sin” is that they cannot see every point of doctrine alike. Yet we find this verse used over and over in those journals whose editors mistake community with conformity.

Is not the whole tenor of the Ephesian letter against such a forced interpretation? Did not the apostle tell the brethren, “Be humble always and gentle, and patient too. Be forbearing with one another and charitable. Spare no effort to make fast with bonds of peace the unity which the Spirit gives” (4:2, 3). Did he not urge them to “throw off falsehood and speak the truth to each other, for all of us are parts of one body”? Did he not command them to “have done with spite and passion, all angry shouting and cursing, and bad feeling of every kind”? (4:31). Did he not say, “Be generous to one another, tenderhearted, forgiving one another as God in Christ forgave you”? (4:32).

Surely one need not know the original Greek to determine that the apostle would not deliberately write an epistle to prove that we are one body, only to splinter and shiver it to bits with one sentence. The Ephesian letter is a magnificent document of unity and peace written to portray the fellowship of the mystery, and the mystery of the fellowship. Who can believe that after painting such a masterpiece that its author would hand us a knife and tell us to slash it into ribbons?

What are “the unfruitful works of darkness”? Are they opinions which differ from the party norm— opinions about the validity of instrumental music, missionary societies, the millennium, orphan homes, centralized support, institutionalism, organization, individual cups, Bible classes, qualification of elders, the work of evangelists, fermented wine, a method of breaking the bread in the Lord’s Supper, or owning a television set? Are these to become our criteria for cleaving the fabric of brotherhood and reducing the divine family to the status of warring tribes “hated and hating one another”? Are they the grounds upon which we shall callously rive, rend and rupture the one body, until it is lacerated and bleeding at every pore? What thoughtful man among us, knowing the spirit of Paul, can even imagine that he would approve our crazy-quilt pattern of division, much less that he would lay the foundation for it?

Would the apostle of grace set at nought a brother simply because he had a divergent view about instrumental music, the millennium, cups or classes? Would he refuse such a person the right to pray to the Father or coldly disdain to call upon him to do so? What spirit of evil has possessed us that we can set at nought a brother for whom Christ died, and seek for justification in the words of the very one who condemned such arrogance and haughtiness of spirit?

Our trouble is that we are so muddled and confused we cannot distinguish between God's family and heathen. We mistake our brethren for barbarians. We cannot tell the difference between an honest difference of opinion and a barren work of darkness. In our factional derangement we cannot differentiate between error and sin. We think that every error is a sin simply because every sin is an error. This is the wilderness of perplexity into which we have been led by the party spirit and we have been left entangled in the thicket of our own meandering thoughts. We are trapped in a maze of legalism and dogmatism and we have forfeited our freedom through fright and fear.

I unhesitatingly affirm that no man can be true to Christ and make a test of fellowship out of either the pro or con of any of the motley multitude of those things which have disturbed the saints. He who sets at nought his brother simply on the basis of an opinion or idea of any of these, or all of them, judges another man's servant, does not walk charitably, and destroys with his own judgment one for whom Christ died. No honest opinion about cups, classes, colleges, methods, music or the millennium, regardless of how mistaken it may be, is a work of darkness in the context of Paul. We should not use the word of God deceitfully but by manifestation of the truth commend ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God.

The works of darkness constituted the perverted practices of pagans and not the varied rationalizations of the called saints. This becomes obvious from any angle of approach to the Ephesian letter. Let us analyze a few of the ways which incontrovertibly prove it.

1. The use of the pronouns "ye" and "them." Certainly the first refers to the addressees and recipients of the letter as opposed to others. The letter was written to "the saints which are at Ephesus, and to the faithful in Christ Jesus” (1:1). They had believed the gospel and been sealed by the Holy Spirit (1:13). Their faith in the Lord Jesus and love to all of the saints was an occasion of thankfulness upon the part of the apostle (1:15). They had been quickened together with Christ (2:5) and saved by grace (2:8). Thus, the admonition to “be not therefore partakers with them,” is not a warning to have no part or lot with others who are under the lordship of Jesus, but with those outside the pale.

2. The contrast between the regenerate and unregenerate state of the Ephesian saints. “For though you were once all darkness, now as Christians you are light” (5:8). They were “in time past Gentiles in the flesh” (2:11). “In time past ye walked according to the course of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience” (2:2). In times past they behaved “in the lusts of the flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind” (2:3). Now the apostle testifies they must “henceforth walk not as other Gentiles walk, in the vanity of the mind” (4:17).

Works of darkness are the deeds of those who abide in darkness. Since there is no fellowship of light and darkness, those who have abandoned paganism with its vice have nothing in common with those who remain in its sordid and degenerate state. They are to have no fellowship with the barren works of darkness.

3. The terms of address employed. The saints are called children of light (5:8), and are told to be imitators of God, as dear children (5:1). Those who abide in darkness are called children of disobedience (5:6) and have no inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God (5:5).

4. The remote context describes the former life of darkness from which they were called, and which must be laid aside completely. There can be no compromise of their present with their past. Read Ephesians 4:17-24.

This then is my word to you, and I urge it upon you in the Lord's name. Give up living like pagans with their good-for-nothing notions. Their wits are beclouded, they are strangers to the life that is in God, because ignorance prevails among them and their minds have gone as hard as stone. Dead to all feeling, they have abandoned themselves to vice, and stop at nothing to satisfy their foul desires. But that is not how you learned Christ. For were you not told of him, were you not as Christians taught the truth as it is in Jesus— that leaving your former way of life, you must lay aside that old human nature which, deluded by its lusts, is sinking towards death. You must be made new in mind and in spirit, and put on the new nature of God's creating, which shows itself in the just and devout life called for by the truth.

5. The adjacent context describes the works of darkness indulged in by those who lived in the Stygian blackness of the heathen world where depravity drew a sable curtain across the moral planet and plunged it into total eclipse. Whatever else may be said of these works they consisted of such secret perversions practiced under nocturnal concealment that one who was in the light dared not contaminate his lips with the bare mention of them. "For it is a shame even to speak of those things which are done of them in secret."

Although it is impossible for the apostle to give the lurid details of the conduct of those "who being past feeling have given themselves over unto lasciviousness, to work all uncleanness with greediness," he does mention the generic categories of the works of darkness. These are fornication, uncleanness and covetousness (5:3, 5). Uncleanness refers to a state of heart which is dissolute, depraved and profligate; covetousness to a state of mind filled with insatiable desire. While all of these seem frightening to contemplate, they become even worse when we recall that this was an expression of religion, the very manner of worshipping the gods.

For this reason, these things were “not to be once named among you, as becometh saints” (5:3). The saints were not to engage in filthy or suggestive conversation, foolish talking or low ribald jesting, about the sex deviates and their vices for this was not befitting or proper for those who had been delivered into the light. Instead, they were to substitute the giving of thanks for the fact that “God who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ” (2:4, 5). They must never be deceived with vain words or shallow arguments “for because of these things (the works of darkness) cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience.”

The opposite to the “unfruitful works of darkness” (5:11) is the “fruit of the Spirit” (5:9). Just as the former is portrayed in a threefold aspect of fornication, impurity and greed; so the latter demonstrates itself in the threefold virtues of “goodness and righteousness and truth.” One product is unfruitful; the other is fruitful for our growth and development.

6. The tenor of God’s revelation shows the nature of the darkness and its works. The universe of intelligent beings is divided into two great domains. One is the power of darkness (Col. 1:13); the other the kingdom of light. Over the first, Satan presides as the god of this world, the prince of the power of the air. Allied with him are his angels, the demonic forces, the principalities and powers who are “the rulers of the darkness of this world” (6:12). Opposed to these fiendish forces with their great army of depraved human beings, are the armies of righteousness. At their head is the Son of God, and with him are the holy angels. At his side and opposed to all wickedness are the men and women who have been delivered from the power of darkness and translated into the kingdom of light— those who acknowledge the sovereignty of Jesus over their lives.

These have not yet reached perfection, but press on, hoping to take hold of that for which Christ once took hold of them. They are reaching out for that which lies ahead. They are pressing toward the goal to win the prize which is God's call to the life above, in Christ Jesus. They all make mistakes, they are all imperfect, and none of them have reached their goal. But the mistakes they make, they make in Christ. They are imperfect in Christ. They are not in the darkness nor of the darkness. "But ye, brethren, are not in darkness" (1 Thess. 5:4).

It is a consideration of all of these factors which makes me realize how tragically many of the brethren err in our day in their application of such passages. Before me as I write are two journals edited by members of the "Churches of Christ." One of these champions the cause of those who make a test of fellowship out of the number of containers used in the distribution of the fruit of the vine in the Lord's Supper. A writer urges the members of the faction, when traveling, not to "attend worship" with a "cups church" as he so quaintly and singularly refers to those who use individual containers. His advice is that it would be better to remain in the solitude of a hotel room on the Lord's Day and read the Bible alone, than to compromise "the truth" and meet with "a disloyal and sectarian group," who have departed from "the pattern." He closes with the stern admonition, "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness but rather reprove them." Thus the word of God is invoked to bless the partisan counsel.

The other paper is several years old. A subscriber raises a question to the editor. The reader is perturbed about a situation which occurred during his vacation. Due to difficulty with his automobile he found himself stranded in a certain city in the northern part of the United States on the Lord's Day. Intensive investigation revealed there was no "loyal church" meeting in the area, but there was "a group calling themselves Church of Christ which used the instrument." The brother and wife attended but with some misgivings. They ate of the Lord's Supper when it was passed around. The group was so kind and friendly and exhibited such hospitality that the visitors from the south found it difficult to understand why they could not “see the truth as we do.” They expressed the hope that one of “our preachers” might go and “convert them and set them right.” But the brother wanted to know if they had sinned in worshipping with them as they did.

The editor advised that they had sinned in going but he did not think they ought to “go forward and acknowledge it” and ask forgiveness back home where the brother was a deacon, as this might upset some of the weaker members. He suggested that it would be satisfactory if they would repent in private and ask God to forgive them “for compromising and endorsing evil by their presence,” but he warned them that God might not overlook their error if they did it a second time. His closing remarks were very significant, “We cannot be too careful about our association, because we are distinctly told to have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness but rather reprove them.”

My memory is haunted by these two papers. I cannot eradicate them from mind. Both claim to represent the spirit of the restoration movement yet both are diametrically opposed to it. Both contend they are faithful to Jesus yet the unloving spirit exhibited toward brethren is the very opposite of the attitude of Jesus. Both boast that they are true to the word of God yet both are guilty of lifting the same passage and warping and wresting it to build a factional barrier higher and wider. I find myself pondering how Satan could so stealthily worm his way into a movement and cunningly deflect it from its original ideal so that it becomes a source of the very division it started out to remedy. By what diabolical alchemy in reverse has Belial converted all of our fine gold to dross, making us love what we should hate and hate what we should love?

I deny that this modern Babel with its confusion of tongues, which we have built upon the shattered ruin of the restoration movement is pleasing unto God. The revelation from heaven is not responsible for the jumbled mess which has gone into a legalistic labyrinth to discourage the devout and stifle the spirit of the saints. How long will we continue to lift up discordant voices shouting “Lo, here!” or “Lo, there!” How long shall we squat behind our factional barricades and breast-works and bomb our brethren with accusations of “Liberal,” “Anti,” “Digressive,” and “Apostate.” Can we convert thinking men and women with such a farrago of chaotic claims? If not, are we willing to settle for only unthinking partisan proselytes who find refuge for their discontent and parochialism in our dogmatism and bitter denunciation of all but our arrogant selves?

Is it not time that we still the seething ferment of sectarianism in our own ranks before we are engulfed. Can we longer afford the luxury of division over a millennial position, or over cups, classes and colleges, when the whole world totters on the brink of destruction? Shall we continue to disown and denounce our brethren, rending ourselves into rival ranks, when it will take all that all of us can supply to survive the dread holocaust which licks out fiery tongues to devour all of us? How long can we indulge the insane tendency to confuse pandemonium with paradise and still survive? Do we not tempt God with our elevation of trifles and our denigration of timeless truths which alone can afford solid ground for eternity?

Let men of integrity in every party among us examine anew every scripture which has been used to foster and foment division. Why should we perpetuate the feuds of our fathers and slash each other with traditional interpretations forged in the heat of passion and hammered out on the anvil of debate? Have we learned nothing in a hundred years except how to gather new fuel to keep flames crackling under a witch’s cauldron of steaming hate? Are we to be the only people in the twentieth century who refuse to sit down at the council table to explore avenues leading to oneness?

Let men of courage move back and forth across our fanatical patchwork of party fences, ignoring the threats of their own factional custodians and the challenges of the self-appointed sentinels who guard the sacred portals of rival claims staked out on the kingdom commons. Why should a free man in Christ be told by anyone else where he may attend, to whom he may listen, and how he shall participate in services with his other brethren? Did Jesus die to free us from sin only to place us in durance vile and under slavery to men who will regulate our movements and chain us behind party doors which will swing only in one direction?

Let men of daring arrange conferences with dissenting brethren in every community where all may meet as equals in failure to keep the peace and none may come in the arrogance of self-righteousness to bluster and boast as if they held a special commission from the king to browbeat and deride His other subjects. The sands are fast trickling from the upper glass. We cannot afford to tarry much longer. Too long already we have held ourselves aloof from the other children of our Father. Now is the time to build bridges instead of barriers, to span chasms instead of to plan schisms.

I pledge myself to lend my meager influence to the cause of unity wherever I can serve any of my brethren. Regardless of the party or faction with which they may be affiliated, if I can do them good and not harm, I will go at their invitation. I will share with them what I have learned, and with them I shall share in what they have learned. With my allegiance given to the Lord of the whole church, the Shepherd of all the sheep, and the Head of the whole body, I will belong to all only because I belong to Him, even while because I belong to Him I shall belong to none of them exclusively. I would be afraid to belong to any but I am glad to belong to all! I have steadfastly decreed in my own heart that I shall make nothing a test of fellowship which God has not made a condition of salvation. Here I stand!

The Conflict of the Ages

Mission Messenger (January 1966)

There are two great forces in conflict with each other in the moral universe. Because of their nature they are referred to as the kingdom of darkness and the kingdom of light. And, also because of their nature, they will be locked in battle until the utter conquest and defeat of one or the other. Every intelligent being in the universe is directly connected with the strife, voluntarily or involuntarily, consciously or unconsciously, and there will be no cessation of hostilities to pick up the wounded or bury the dead.

This warfare did not begin on earth, but in heaven. It began before the creation of this world which we inhabit. It originated in insurrection and revolt motivated by pride— pride of such magnitude that it challenged the very prerogatives of God. It was precipitated by the one who came to be known as the Slanderer. Those who were seduced by him to regard God as their enemy fought and struggled bitterly for control, but the Messengers who remained loyal to God under the leadership of Michael vanquished them utterly and expelled them from the celestial realm.

When the earth was created to be the abode of man, made in the image of God, the Adversary, who pre-empted the sphere called Atmos, and became “the commander of the spiritual powers of the air” (Eph. 2:2), directed his attack upon man as a means of wreaking vengeance upon God. That this was an exhibition of diabolical cunning is evident when one takes into account the nature, state and purpose of man at the time he was created.

Man was at the apex of God's ascending scale insofar as material creation is concerned. All that preceded was designed and executed with a view to his coming, and he was made so as to use it all for his advancement and enjoyment. He was the bridge between that which was wholly material and that which was wholly spiritual. His body was made out of the elements of the earth and was a product of the womb of terra firma, but his intellect and intelligence linked him with the divine. Thus he could hold communion with the visible forms of nature as well as with God. He was made to know happiness, and to experience joy in everything God made and in the God who made everything.

His condition made him ruler, by divine appointment, over everything which God created of a material nature. "Yet thou hast made him a little less than God, and dost crown him with glory and honor. Thou hast given him dominion over the work of thy hands; thou hast put all things under his feet, all sheep and oxen, and also the beasts of the field, the birds of the air, and the fish of the sea, whatever passes along the paths of the sea. O Lord, our Lord, how majestic is thy name in all the earth" (Psalm 8:5-9).

It is true that "the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof," but it is equally true that man was granted conditional title to it, and was the lord of all he surveyed. Inasmuch as the earth was made for man, and not man for the earth, when man found happiness, joy and satisfaction in the things made for his special enjoyment and gazed with thankfulness and admiration upon the Creator who provided them, God was glorified, and the divine purpose justified as pertained to material creation.

The purpose of man was to glorify God and he was to do this spontaneously, naturally and unaffectedly. His very association with the blessings provided was simply a part of his communion with the Creator. As he shared in their beauty, utility and grace, in their pristine purity, he was made a partaker with Him who had formed them and made them part of a great system, the unity of which required a divine intellect to grasp, and therefore, a divine power to create. No one has the power to produce what he has not the power to conceive of.

It is obvious that any spirit moved by malevolent or ulterior motives could best strike at God in the material universe by influencing man to commit such action as would prove him unworthy of the divine trust reposed in him and topple him from his exalted state. The possibility of such incitation was in man because of the nature of God as expressed in or impressed on the nature of man. It is not for us to question why man was not made a great deal lower than God, although we realize this would have limited his communion with God. If we spoke in purely human terms we would say that God “took a chance” in making man a little less than Himself. In doing this it was necessary to make him a free and responsible being, and to be either he had to be given the most awesome prerogative in the whole universe— the right of choice.

One does not possess the right of choice at all who is not free to make an adverse decision, so man was constitutionally susceptible of happiness and of misery. To be otherwise would have made him not only less than God, but also essentially less than man. As a human being with the right of choice, if he glorified God by willing subservience and obedience, the divine will had to be expressed and in such a manner that man would glorify God by choice. This required the enunciation of a principle or law which could serve as a test of willingness.

The precept proposed by God in the infancy of the human family was eminently designed to serve the purpose for which it was intended. It was simple, so that there could be no possible misunderstanding occasioning sin by imbecility; it was single rather than complex, since it was to be a test of the will and not of the function of the reasoning capacity. It was stated clearly and objectively, and the penalty was included therein, so that the penalty became an actual part of the choice and no ground was left for complaint that it was by caprice, an unthinkable thing with reference to God, and a thing which only the Slanderer is capable of asserting as an accusation against the Almighty.

That the precept was a positive, rather than a moral one, is obvious to all who are capable of distinguishing the difference, and that it could not have served its purpose if it had been the latter is equally self-evident to the thoughtful and discerning. In this lay the greatest opportunity for the Enemy and he moved with sagacity to the attack. He first denied the penalty. "You will not die." Then he proceeded to appeal to the inner urge of all mankind, to attain unto knowledge without limitation, to burst all intellectual bonds and restraints, to probe all of the mysteries of the universe until nothing is mystery, in short, to be like God, which in the final analysis is to be God.

This is not to say that the primeval pair understood all of this, nor that they could define the impulses and incentives which drove them almost relentlessly on, but to the woman the tempter quickly promised, "For God knows that when you eat of it your eyes will be opened, and you will be like God, knowing good and evil." The result is known to all of our readers and requires no particular analysis here. Suffice it to say that for the first time in a human being, lust conceived and the period of gestation was short until sin was produced as a progeny. The animal man triumphed over the spiritual and the glory departed. The long and unbroken caravan of death began that has deposited many more in the earth than now walk upon its surface. All of us tread upon the dust of our sires back to Adam,

Man was thus thrust into the unceasing conflict of the ages, both as a participant and a pawn. Not a rational being in the universe is exempt from the effect of this war. As respects the regions inhabited by such beings, there are three— the celestial, the terrestrial and the infernal. The first is inhabited by the Father, Son and all of the holy angels or messengers. The last is invested with the Adversary and all of his angels, or messengers, the demons. The angels of Satan, having been thrown out of the celestial realm because of rebellion share the insensate fury of their leader against all that is heavenly.

The hierarchical distinctions of angelic hosts are retained by those who have fallen as well as by the holy messengers. Thus we have principalities, powers, mights and dominions, signifying the area of control in the cosmic forces. These are all supernatural distinctions and refer to those intelligent entities under direction of supernatural leadership. Since these constitute the unseen (by human vision) fighting force against the army of righteousness their subjection and conquest had to be included in the purpose of God to vindicate His right to govern the universe which He created.

He determined to accomplish his design by entry into the world of mankind in the person of a Son, reversing the process which obtained at creation as regards Adam, the son of God. Then, one who was first fleshly took upon him the inner nature of the divine; now one who was first divine took upon him the outer nature of man. This was essential in order that the struggle of the ages be fought upon that field which the Adversary had chosen, and that man be ransomed from the power of sin in the very state where he had been taken captive. Although, He had previously existed as the Logos, and joined in the inception of the material universe as a creative personality, the Son entered the world by the process of natural birth after a supernatural begetting.

During his sojourn on earth he became thoroughly capable, by experience, of sympathizing with our weaknesses, being “one who because of his likeness to us, has been tested every way, only without sin” (Hebrews 4:15). But he never lost sight of his mission and of the cosmic forces which constituted the real threat to God’s sovereignty. And he recognized that the cross was the only means of ultimate conquest. This explains his statement to his disciples, “I shall not talk much longer with you, for the Prince of this world approaches. He has no rights over me; but the world must be shown that I love the Father, and do exactly as he commands; so up, let us go forward” (John 14:30, 31).

There is every possibility that we may seriously underestimate the real struggle of the cross. We are accustomed to think of it exclusively in relationship to ourselves. This may be natural since we have such a tremendous stake in it and our hope of life is vested in it. Yet it accomplished its purpose because it was the ultimate in a power struggle of such mammoth perspective as to challenge the highest peak of human thought and reason. It was the means by which creative intelligence asserted the absolute right of sovereignty over that which was created, and that which was eternal and unmade demonstrated that all which was made, whether tangible or intangible, must be forever subservient. The cross marked more than the crossroads of history, for history has to do with the past, with that which has happened. Instead it is the crux of destiny and it is just as meaningful today as it was when erected at “the place of the skull.” The cross is as imperishable as the victory it achieved. It is not a monument. It is a living symbol and men are still being crucified upon it daily.

nowhere more clearly stated than in the Colossian letter (1:15-19). "He is the image of the invisible God: his is the primacy over all created things. In him everything in heaven and on earth was created, not only things visible, but also the invisible orders of thrones, sovereignties, authorities and powers: the whole universe has been created through him and for him. And he exists before everything, and all things are held together in him. He is, moreover, the head of the body, the church. He is its origin, the first to return from the dead, to be in all things alone supreme. For in him the complete being of God, by God's own choice, came to dwell."

The key to this passage is found in the two phrases— "his is the primacy over all" and "in all things alone supreme." The ever present danger is that in the sanctuary of our hearts we shall attempt to enshrine something else as his equal. His unwitting enemies may do this with governments, powers or structures. His friends may unwittingly do it with angels, saints or the church. But all of these are creations and when they are used to divide our loyalty, they serve the cause of the Adversary. "All things alone supreme"— this forever precludes a diadem placed upon the head of any created organism or organization.

This is not simply a modern problem. "You are not to be disqualified by the decision of people who go in for self-mortification and angel-worship, and try to enter into some vision of their own. Such people, bursting with the futile conceit of worldly minds, lose hold upon the Head; yet it is from the Head that the whole body, with all its joints and ligaments, receives its supplies, and thus knit together grows according to God's design." God's purpose is not served either by exalting angels, which are invisible, to a place of adoration; nor by flagellation or mortification of the human body, which is visible, in an attempt to make devotion to Jesus appear greater. Neither can we serve him by a mistaken concept of the church in which we attribute our salvation to it. The church, like any other creation, cannot save, but must be saved!

The Cosmic Powers

But we must revert to our original theme and the conquest of the Son over the invisible forces of the universe. Here we have positive testimony as to the power of the cross. “On that cross he discarded the cosmic powers and authorities like a garment; he made a public spectacle of them and led them as captives in a triumphant procession” (Col. 2:15). This is a dramatic picture drawn from the ancient custom of the conquering general who returns home from the war victorious, to enter the gates of the city at the head of his army, trailed by slaves bearing the fruits of victory, and followed in turn by the dejected captives. So the Son when he returned to the city where the throne is located made a public spectacle of the cosmic powers. He demonstrated his ability to throw them off like one would slip out of a garment no longer needed.

This does not mean the annihilation of these principalities and powers by the cross, but rather their subjugation. They have been brought under the authority of Christ. We must still face them in the war of the ages but in Christ we are assured of victory. “Be on your guard; do not let your minds be captured by hollow and delusive speculations, based on traditions of man-made teaching and centered on the elemental spirits of the world and not on Christ. For it is in Christ that the complete being of the Godhead dwells embodied, and in him you have been brought to completion. Every power and authority in the universe is subject to him as Head” (Col. 2:9, 10). The war for the minds of men continues and we are in danger of being captivated. There are still delusive speculations, there are still traditions of man-made teaching. These are the effective weapons to capture and enslave.

We have available unto us in Christ the same transcendent power which raised him from the dead, the power of the unconquerable life. Our problem is lack of inner illumination. We do not envision what is ours. We feel frustrated and often defeated. We battle on as if we were committed simply to a holding action until death. We think in terms of a battle unto death instead of a victory over it. The enemy has deluded our hearts and befogged our vision until we expend our energies in futile skirmishes and waste our ammunition upon trivia.

“I pray that your inward eyes may be illumined, so that you may know what is the hope to which he calls you, what the wealth and glory of the share he offers you among his people in their heritage, and how vast the resources of his power open to us who trust in him. They are measured by his strength and the might which he exerted in Christ when he raised him from the dead, when he enthroned him at his right hand in the heavenly realms, far above all government and authority, all power and dominion, and any title of sovereignty that can be named, not only in this age, but in the age to come” (Eph. 1:18-21).

The Adversary has deluded us with a clever strategem by confusing us as to the identity of our real foes. We congratulate ourselves when we think we have vanquished those who are not enemies at all. Through superior knowledge or extra intellectual effort we may put our less informed fellows to flight and think we have won a great victory but this may be wholly unrelated to the real warfare. The weapons and armor provided may not be adapted to such petty conflict at all. “Finally then, find your strength in the Lord, in his mighty power. Put on all the armor which God provides, so that you may be able to stand firm against the devices of the devil. For our fight is not against human foes, but against cosmic powers, against the authorities and potentates of this dark world, against the superhuman forces of evil in the heavens. Therefore, take up God’s armor, then you will be able to stand your ground when things are at their worst, to complete every task and still to stand” (Eph. 6:10-13). Devices of the devil— cosmic powers— forces of evil— these can never be overcome by natural power unaided. They require superhuman assistance, the armor which God provides.

The apostle here mentions the devices of the devil. In 2 Corinthians 2:11 he refers to the wiles of the devil. "For Satan must not be allowed to get the better of us; we know his wiles all too well." There is a slight difference in the implication of the two terms, but both are associated with the master strategy by which he accomplishes his destructive ends. The word "wiles" has to do with the tricks or stratagems employed to deceive; the word "devices" has to do with the methods employed to accomplish the ulterior motive. The master design of the evil one is to thwart the will of God and to keep it from being regnant in our lives and on earth.

Jesus taught his disciples to pray, "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." Satan is deeply interested in keeping this prayer from being answered. The reason is obvious. When he led the revolt in heaven he sought to impose his will as equal with the will of God. The will of God triumphed. "The dragon and his angels fought, but they had not the strength to win, and no foothold was left them in heaven" (Revelation 12:8). If the will of God is done on earth as it is in heaven there will be no foothold left for the devil on earth. Every aim of Satan is directed toward keeping the will of God from being translated into reality on earth.

It will be seen at once that the most direct means of offsetting the will of God would be to convince man that God does not exist, or to lead him to accept the theory that there is no personal being who may be called God. The will is associated with a being who is personal and intelligent. It must be said to the credit of man that he is not easily convinced that there is no God. Being a rational personality himself, and possessed of creative intelligence, he cannot readily account for the universe of which he is a part on any other basis. Even Voltaire, who decried supernaturalism and denied formal religious faith was forced to say, "If God did not exist, it would be necessary to invent him, but all nature cries out to us that he does exist.”

For this reason the devil does not make a direct frontal attack upon the existence of God. This would encourage too much reaction and defensiveness. Instead, he plants a doubt of his own existence. He seeks to become self-effacing, to obliterate himself. His purpose is achieved by making the world believe that man is somebody but there is nobody who is Satan. Evil is to be accounted for by assuming that it is merely a principle and not the machination of a principal. Man can dismiss his sins much more easily and with less twinging of the conscience if he can regard them as proceeding from an inner nature which he cannot help possessing and for which he does not therefore feel directly accountable.

The ultimate purpose in spreading the propaganda that he is non-existent is to lead man to a denial of the existence of God, or certainly to denial of the relevance of the word of God. If there is no enemy there can be no war, if there is no war weapons are unnecessary. A shield of faith to quench all the fiery darts of the evil one is a ridiculous encumbrance with which to be burdened if there is no evil one and if the only fiery darts are social inequities and personal quirks of temperament. It would be silly for one to carry a sword around if there existed no enemy on earth, and since the sword of the Spirit is said to be the word of God, it follows that the word of God is meaningless to those who have learned that Satan is a purely mythological character, and a creation of superstitious minds.

The Success of Satan

It is the intellectual mind which Satan is especially anxious to mislead. There are two reasons for this. The policy of a people, if planned at all, will generally be planned by the intellectuals. These will determine what the popular philosophy of the moment will be and many others will follow in the wake of a few respected leaders. Nothing is more conducive to the success of the tempter than the penchant of the masses for hero worship. Too, there is the ease with which the intellectual mind may be deceived in the realm of philosophy. This is proven by the numerous schools of thought which have succeeded each other in almost dreary monotony, and each of which was considered the ultimate in the days when it flourished. The natural pride associated with “the wisdom of this passing age” acts as a blind to shut out contradictory facts and betrays those who elevate past superstition into what is as bad, present fads and vagaries.

The greatest proof that the devil exists and that he has been uncommonly successful is seen in the fact that the great majority of intellectuals in our day do not believe that he is real. One who affirms that evil, like righteousness, originates with a personality outside of man himself is regarded as being ignorant and devoid of real mental and rational acumen. Certainly Satan has employed the art of camouflage and incognito with tremendous effect. Like a specter or wraith he has blended into the fog which he has created until men no longer suspect his presence or admit his reality. This will account for the foggy thinking about self, sin and Satan in our generation.

Of course the cause of Satan will be served as well if by direct approach men can be persuaded to deny the existence of God, for those who do so will also deny the existence of Satan. There can be no opposite to that which has no being. If there is no heaven, there will be no hell; if there is no such thing as morality, there can be no immorality. This course is not so easy, however, because man’s heart is so tuned as to yearn for God and to desire truth, and the creativity of God is everywhere manifested in the universe. “The invisible traits of him are clearly seen in the creation, being understood by the things that are.”

than to plant the seeds of absolute denial or rejection. Man finds it easier to be skeptical than to be atheistic. In an age which has been conditioned to think that all is relative, even in the moral and spiritual realm, there is a hesitancy to be positive about anything. We should not be surprised that instead of blatant atheism we are rather treated to theorizing which questions accepted means and methods of conveying the idea of God, and in the upheaval of the mind concerning the means, God himself is tossed out. If we are devoid of the terms for explaining our concept of a personal God we shall soon be without the concept altogether. Our contemporary predicament is not so much one of base denial as it is of denial of a base from which to reason.

The willingness of modern man to become entangled in the skeins of sophisticated mental meanderings is found in the readiness with which the theological world has hailed as deliverers those who, under the guise of rescuing us from outmoded and invalidated expressions, have left the world suspended in mid-air by a rope which is not attached to anything above. Recently, as an example, a volume by a Bishop in the Anglican party, became a runaway best seller, translated into nine different languages. The author, who admitted to having been powerfully influenced by the German theologians—Tillich, Bonhoeffer and Bultmann—attacked the idea of a God “up there” or “out there.” Actually, however, his thesis amounted to denial of a personal God anywhere. The God “down here” or “in here” as opposed to the God “up there” or “out there” was simply “the ground of being,” or some other impersonal principle.

We need to question whether such men have simply devised a way of explaining God to this generation, or have generated a method of explaining God away. It is one thing to make the language of the Bible live for our day but it is a wholly different thing to kill God off in the process. However, our objection is not to men expressing themselves as to the nature or existence of God even in denial of the truth of the divine person.

We deplore them doing so while parading as Christian, or intimating that their rationalizations constitute a justifiable alternative to revealed faith for Christians. It is not our intention to advocate the kind of blind censorship which denies a man the right to state his views regardless of how divergent they may be from our own. After all, as A. Leonard Griffith, Minister of City Temple, London, said about the bishop who wrote the book, “What really matters in this view is not what the Bishop thinks about God, but what God thinks of the Bishop.”

We can respect an honest atheist, agnostic or skeptic, in the sense in which we here use the word “honest,” nor do we deny there are such. But it is a wholly different thing for one who parades as a Christian, or as a Christian teacher, to deny the very foundation of the Christian concept. Obviously the word “Christian” is used so loosely in our day that like charity it covers a multitude of sins, but it cannot be divorced from Christ, for to eliminate “Christ” from “Christian” would be to destroy the very term. Regardless of what else may be involved, the very minimum expected of a Christian is that he possess the “Christ-attitude” and certainly this must begin with the proper attitude toward God.

Jesus and God

It is doubtful that any student of the new testament scriptures would deny that Jesus of Nazareth regarded God as a personal being, and as his Father. Even those who have popularized the term “myth” in a peculiar sense to describe the verbal cloak in which the Message is clothed, are forced to admit that this is so. It follows then that one who is a Christian in the real significance of the term, a designation for a disciple of Christ, must reflect the concepts and teaching of his Master. A disciple is a learner or student, but he is more than a mere student. He is also an adopter and follower of what he is taught. “If you continue in my words then are you my disciples indeed.”

To find what a Christian should believe about God or Satan, we need only to find out what Jesus taught about them. It is unthinkable that we should claim to be disciples while advocating the opposite of what Christ taught. Such a course would negate the very essence of discipleship, which is actually followership. Jesus taught that God was a personal being by description of His nature, attributes and functions. He also taught the same truth by identification and communication with the Father.

As to identification with God in purpose, he said, "If you knew me, you would know my Father too . . . Anyone who has seen me has seen the Father . . . I am not myself the source of the words I speak to you: it is the Father who dwells in me, doing his own work . . . And the word you hear is not mine: it is the word of the Father who sent me." Again, "It is his will that all should pay the same honor to the Son as to the Father. To deny honor to the Son is to deny honor to the Father who sent him." As to communication with God, he declared, "I will ask the Father" (John 14:16), and "I have prayed to the Father." In a recorded prayer he said, "I came from thee," and, "Now I am coming to thee." This is the language used by one person in addressing another. On no other basis can it have any validity or make a semblance of sense.

It will be noted that when Jesus prayed "he looked up to heaven" (John 17:1) He said, "No one went up into heaven except the one who came down from heaven" (John 3:13). He declared, "You shall see heaven wide open, and God's angels ascending and descending upon the Son of man" (John 1:51). At his ascension he testified that he was "taken up to heaven" (Acts 1:11). The apostle says, "He who descended is no other than he who ascended far above all heavens, so that he might fill the universe" (Ephesians 4:10). This language is now made the butt of attack, and even of some ridicule. We are told that the idea of a "three-story universe" has been outgrown in the Space Age.

It is considered absurd to speak of God as “up there” or “out there,” and such language in the Bible is considered as myth. It is merely the feeble attempt of a primitive people to give form to their superstitions based upon ignorance of the universe, we are told. But the strange thing is that when modern sophisticates seek to “demythologize” the language, they can do no better in portraying the state of God in relation to earth and man. In their desperate attempt to correct the wording they terminate by eliminating God, or, what is worse, by reducing God to some innate principle or power which makes man end up in the insufferable egotism of worshiping himself.

But we are constantly told that we must “face up” to every assault made upon the Christian concept and take time out to fully investigate and reply to every philosophic thrust against it. To those who regard the Way as being simply another “religion” in a field of comparative religions, or another philosophic attempt to explain life, this is true. But to those who respect it as the revelation of a divine mind to direct our steps until the ultimate purpose is attained this does not appear at all necessary. One whose house is conceived of as being built upon a rock foundation hardly deems it essential to go about swatting every termite which mistakenly gnaws away at it. This is especially true when the yard is full of dead termites from the past which have killed themselves in prosecuting the same attempt.

It is argued that maintenance of personal integrity demands that we explore every critical attack to the fullest before we make any definite commitment. This we deny, because it makes no distinction between credulity and faith, and assumes that the latter is not a valid principle or premise upon which to postulate one’s hope. Yet those who demand that we hear their claims do so because they have faith in them, and thus demonstrate that man cannot choose whether he will believe or not, but only what or whom he will believe. In the final analysis, both scientists and theologians, and common folk like myself who are neither, must end up walking by faith. Where their walk will take them depends upon the direction of their faith.

I have examined the claims of Jesus of Nazareth. I am willing to stake my life upon their verity and veracity. No one can prove at this late date that His claims are false without proving that he was a charlatan and an impostor. When I behold men who affirm the moral superiority of his personal life and teaching, and urge it as the standard by which to judge themselves and others, while asserting that he was a product of his times, hampered and hindered by a provincial outlook, my compassion is for the critics even as my faith is in the Christ. It is observable that our own day, with all of its tremendous potential, has not produced another Jesus, our critics themselves being judges. On what grounds can we conclude that the narrow and restricted age of the first century fashioned Jesus out of its fabric? It takes more faith than I am capable of generating to believe that one who was merely a son of man could so develop. It is much easier, within the limitations of my faith, to account for Jesus as the Son of God.

And because I acknowledge Jesus as Lord of my life, I accept what he taught about the personality of God and Satan. I have enlisted in the battle of the ages under the leadership of the captain of my salvation. I expect to battle the foe until the convulsion of death relaxes my grip upon the sword of the Spirit and I fall headlong upon the shield of faith. I am committed to the faith that Jesus is real. In the strength of that commitment I shall do my best to summon the whole world to kneel before him and acknowledge his sovereignty over all. I seek to go where he leads without fear. He said, "If anyone serves me, he must follow me; where I am, my servant will be."

Is God Dead?

Mission Messenger (January 1966)

[Abstract]

We live in a time which is designated by some as “the post-Christian age.” Certain philosophers have declared that God is dead, and certain clergymen have rushed in to conduct a funeral service for the deceased. Many who are highly educated hesitate to speak of faith in a living God for fear they will be thought to be traitors to the intellectual cause. They are victims of a fright psychosis brought on by reading such sophisticated works as Religion Without Revelation, by Julian Huxley, who wrote:

It will soon be as impossible for an intelligent, educated man or woman to believe in a god as it is now to believe that the earth is flat, that flies can be spontaneously generated, that disease is a divine punishment, or that death is always due to witchcraft. Gods will doubtless survive, sometimes under the protection of vested interests, or in the shelter of lazy minds, or as puppets used by politicians, or as refuges for unhappy and ignorant souls.

Perhaps it will be thought a little presumptuous for one who cannot qualify as either a philosopher, theologian, or intellectual, to enter the arena of contemporary thought and assert a firm conviction that God is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him. On the other hand, the testimony of one of the common people like myself, may well be heard, if for no other reason than that we constitute a majority. Abraham Lincoln declared, "God must have loved the common people because he made so many of them." Perhaps their recognition of this fact makes it easy for them to reciprocate his love.

I suspect that there is but one prime reason for believing in God and that all others are but facets of this one. However, we have been trained to require a multiplicity of proofs regardless of their connective relationship. Due to lack of space I will confine my own reasons to five which I shall refer to under the terms— purpose, power, plan, putative and personal. These are not in order of importance for in dealing with the infinite there is no such arrangement.

1. Purpose. We readily admit that no one can demonstrate that God is by use of syllogism or logic. God cannot be examined in the laboratory or under the microscope. He cannot be seen in the sky nor observed in space. Yet the evidence by which we judge ourselves and prove our own existence— a thing which has also been questioned by certain philosophers— is all about us. That which causes us to have faith in our own existence will lead to faith in the existence of God. Sir Isaac Newton declared, "The whole diversity of created things could have its origin only in the ideas and will of a necessarily Existing Being."

This is the equivalent of saying that a complex and inter-related universe could not be the product of chance but had to originate with will, and the will had to precede the creation and formulate it. If we can determine the ultimate in demonstration of mental power and show that the world of which we are a part could logically have no existence apart from it, we have by logic postulated the absolute necessity for a mind preceding creation and superior to it. This may be as far as we can go, but it is far enough, unless some wild theorist insists upon a logical demonstration of that which underlies all logic. In this event we need only to demand that he demonstrate by his accepted criteria his own existence, and refuse to reason with him until he does, on the ground that we may be seeking to convince one who does not exist.

We agree with W. H. Fitchett that, "The highest expression of mind is to take a number of unconscious, unrelated physical things, and set them in relations which make them the channel of a meaning of which they are unconscious, the servants of an intelligent purpose of which they know nothing." There are twenty-six letters in our alphabet. Each of these is a symbol of a sound. They are powerless to combine themselves in such a manner as to create a simple sentence. These letters appear on children's blocks and if I walk into a room and see the blocks so arranged in a line that a sentence is constructed I know that someone has arranged them. I know that the type in a printing shop did not fall into such chance sequence as to spell out the words of "A Psalm of Life." It is easy for me to credit the creativity of the genius of Longfellow. The poem was produced out of the purpose governing an intellect. By the same token I must acknowledge that the intricate complex, but synchronized universe, grew out of an intelligent purpose.

2. Power. There are two manifestations of power or force connected with our universe. One is the power by which it originated, the other the power by which it is perpetuated. The power by which a thing comes into existence must exist prior to that which it originates. In view of the axiom, "Out of nothing, nothing comes," it is apparent that before the material originated there had to exist that which was immaterial and eternal. If it be affirmed that the power is natural to the material, we respond that power is not self-generating, and we ask from whence nature was invested with this power, and what power outside of nature threw the switch, or triggered the spark which caused blind, insensate matter to begin to function in co-ordination.

We accept by faith the atomic constituency of the material universe. "By faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God in such a manner that the things which we see are constructed from that which is in itself invisible.” The atomic universe is a vast reservoir of energy. Energy when unconfined dissipates itself and becomes powerless or ineffective. This is true of steam which drives a piston through a cylinder but has no potency when not confined. The power or substance which confines energy must be greater than the energy confined. If the atomic universe is a mass of energy the power which has confined this to the atom must have existed prior to atomic formation and was greater than the combined power of the material universe. To put it in another fashion, the material universe is subject to universal power which is superior to all that constitutes the material. That which we refer to as “the law of atomic energy” or “the first and second law of thermodynamics” is but an application of this power in a sustaining or regulative degree, for laws indicate intelligent application of that to which they are related and which they govern.

3. Plan. A universe so constructed as the one of which we are part could never have originated except by application of intelligent design coupled with the necessary power to produce the design and start it operating in pre-determined harmony and synchronization. It was William Paley, who in 1794 published a memorable work entitled, “Evidence of Christianity,” who first used a watch to illustrate creative design. It was his contention that anyone observing such a mechanism lying in the road would immediately conclude that it had an intelligent maker.

Modernistic thinkers who deny the personality of God refer to this as a remote “watchmaker relationship.” But A. Cressy Morrison, in his book, “Seven Reasons Why A Scientist Believes in God,” begins by relating the story of Paley, and offers “Our Unique World” as the first of his reasons for believing in God. Pointing out how the slightest variation in the planetary system would render life impossible, he cites case after case in point. He concludes the chapter by saying, “All these facts about the universe could not be the result of chance. The laws of mathematics unerringly prove that they are the design of a Supreme Intelligence.” The expression “unerringly prove” is a strong one indeed.

There are other things to which Morrison does not refer that are as valid. One is the control of the affinity and unity of elementary material substances. For instance, water is essential to preservation of all life. It is composed of two elements combined in the ratio of two parts of hydrogen to one of oxygen. An invisible manifestation of controlling power has caused these two elements to separate from all others and merge in this exact mathematical proportion. Hydrogen has a greater affinity for chlorine than for oxygen, yet this power prohibits this natural affinity and causes oxygen to combine with hydrogen in the only proportion in which the two will combine naturally. If two parts of hydrogen compounded with two parts of oxygen the result would be hydrogen peroxide and all life would terminate at once.

It will serve but little purpose to multiply such illustrations. One can look at his own body and observe such synchronization as will convince the careful student that man is “fearfully and wonderfully made”— and he is made! The light would avail nothing without the eye and the eye would avail nothing without light. Yet the substance and the organ are both here and the organ functions harmoniously in that state for which it was designed. As Morrison has written, “Nature undistorted appears designed to call forth that which is highest within us, and inspire us with admiration for the Supreme Intelligence which seems to have given us the gift of beauty comprehended in its completeness only by man.”

4. Putative. Perhaps I should tell you what I mean by this word. It is a transliteration of the Latin putatum, which literally means “to reckon, to think.” It now refers to that which is commonly thought or deemed, that which is generally supposed or reputed to be so. There is nothing conclusive in the form of “proof” to be deduced from this as to the existence of God but our readers must remember that we are not necessarily attempting to prove this. Instead, we are merely giving a few of the many reasons for our own personal faith in God. That which influences and carries weight with us may not so affect another.

Man knows a universal need of God. So acute is this that it is often actually referred to as hunger and thirst. A means has been provided for every other need of the human personality. Man knows physical craving and the prairies become veritable seas of waving yellow grain. He knows thirst and copious streams of crystal clear water burst forth from hillsides to cascade into the valleys below. He knows desire for intimacy of companionship and marriage provides for sexual satisfaction. Is the deep need for relationship with a power outside and above ourselves the only want for which no provision is made? If so, from whence came this overwhelming anxiety for communion with the Eternal?

The recognition of and reverence for divine power is as comprehensive in time and space as the history and sweep of mankind. It is unlimited by social and intellectual differences. The aborigine looks up with the same innate longing as the sophisticate. Man deems there is a God because the demands of nature and reason cry out there must be a God. A world without a God is as incomplete as a world would be in which no food has been provided. It is so because it has to be so. Like gravity, one may not be able to prove it by observation, sight or study, but this in no wise affects the reality of it. We dare not assume that a thing is not real until man can prove it is real, for much of what we now know as reality could have had no prior existence until men discovered means of proof. It is not lack of reality but ignorance of man which postponed the discovery of criteria by which to measure that which existed all of the time that man was seeking to discover it.

5. Personal. This must be in the nature of individual testimony. I believe in God because of my personal experience with God. Centuries ago, when David was in a precarious position among his enemies, he wrote, "O taste and see that the Lord is good! Happy is the man who takes refuge in him!" (Psalm 34:8). The Hebrew word for taste which is toam is equivalent to the Greek geuomai, which means "to try, test by experience." A good illustration is found in the account of the wedding feast which Jesus attended, and where he relieved the embarrassment of the host by replenishing the supply of wine. "When the steward of the feast tasted the water now become wine . . . he said, 'You have kept the good wine until now.'" The steward knew the wine was good because he tasted it; one knows God is good by the very same experience.

After a great many years of trusting in Christianity as a system and an organization, and placing my hope in my own good intentions and motivations, I found myself with a sense of emptiness and frustration. We were proclaiming love for our enemies while often showing contempt for our brothers; we were delivering sermons on unity at the very time we were dividing from another; we were giving learned encomiums on the Holy Spirit while often governed by the party spirit. It was like living in a world of unreality. We were caught up in a vortex of legalism and factionalism. Finally, thousands of miles from our own country, while reading the word of God one afternoon for my own strength and help, it dawned upon me that I had never really invited Jesus to come into my heart and life.

I was thoroughly familiar with the words, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock. If any man open unto me, I will come in unto him, and will sup with him and he with me." These words had formed the basis of a little chorus I had taught boys and girls to sing. They had constituted the text of a sermon I had delivered scores of times with rather tremendous affect. I was accustomed to sitting down with my loved ones and eating in that precious intimacy of the table which seems to draw a family together, but I did not really experience that kind of closeness with Jesus. Yet the promise was there that if he was invited in the experience would be as close and friendly as sitting down and eating together.

I was haunted by the fact that, search my memory as I did, I could not recall a single time when I had actually flung wide the door of my life to ask Jesus to step inside. Always I had been going into something. I had gone into the church. I had gone into the work. I had gone into the foreign field. I had been so involved with going into things, and making plans for going into more things, that I had overlooked inviting Jesus to come into my own heart and life. True I had always assumed that he was there because I thought that my going was an invitation for his coming.

I walked to the little meetinghouse with its stark furnishings and the wintry cold seeping through the aged walls. In the gray gloom, oblivious of the chill, I kneeled on the bare floor for an hour and very quietly talked to God and asked Jesus to come in and share with me. I was not emotionally upset at all. In fact, I never recall having been more calm. I knew what I wanted and I knew where to go and get it. I felt exactly as if I were talking to a good friend who been waiting for years to see me and visit with me.

Almost at once a tremendous change took place in my whole attitude. The first test, and tangible proof, took place that same evening when I talked with the brethren. Some of the things which they did as a part of their tradition had secretly irritated and disturbed me. I could not understand why they appeared so trivial to them when they seemed so important to me. Now, all of a sudden, it came to me that I was listening to them without one trace of annoyance that they differed with me. They were my brothers. They were children of my Father. They were eagerly and earnestly trying to please him. For the first time I could project myself into their place. As each one spoke I realized why he acted and reacted as he did.

I found myself wanting to share with them the truths I had discovered without worry as to whether they would accept them that night. There was a tugging in my heart to help these. It seemed unimportant that I should argue them into seeing every matter as I did. My task was to help, to minister, to serve in their needs. I experienced the love of God actually shed abroad, or poured out, by the indwelling Spirit, and that Spirit became vital, valid and vigorous in my life. Later as I tried to recall what had happened there came to me words of Jesus when James and John wanted to destroy with fire a city of the Samaritans. "You know not what spirit you are of." It is possible for men to be close to Jesus and to walk with him and not know the spirit of which they are.

I would not exchange this sense of personal closeness with the Father and the Son for all the wealth or prestige this world can bestow. The utter freedom from loneliness, even in the crowd; the all-pervading feeling of harmony and fellowship with the divine— this is the most tremendous thing that can happen to a mortal in the flesh. What a serenity of soul results from the majestic knowledge that "I am my Lord's and he is mine." Of course, I am not so foolish as to think that any other person in the world must come to know God, or will come to know God, under these same conditions or circumstances. We are all different in personality and temperament. I only say that I know that God is, because I know that God is within me through His Spirit. And I pray for all who do not know Him because I know what men miss when they trust to the rightness of their own concepts, the organizational structures which they project, or their own moral strength. In the midst of the turmoil and strife of this age, perhaps the one thing that most of us need is to hearken to the voice, "Be still, and know that I am God."

The One Foundation

[Abstract]

It was a large tree and it was directly in the path of the new construction work. Obviously it had to be removed. We met with axes and mattocks to “grub it out by the roots” as the foreman phrased it. When we began digging about the base someone said that the roots reached out to form a circle in the earth of the same diameter as the branches in the air. Soon we had uncovered many of the roots and were chopping them in two, but the sturdy monarch stood unbowed, except for an occasional trembling of the giant frame. “We’ll have to cut the taproot,” said the foreman, “or it will never fall.” He was right. The supporting roots had been severed all around, but when the anchor root was cut, the tree tottered for a minute like a stricken animal and then plunged crashing to the earth.

I have long labored under the conviction that every system of religion and philosophy, true or false, has a taproot which is central to it and serves as its anchor in the soil of human hearts. As it lives and grows it develops a root system which sustains and supports it and which may be as great in scope under the surface as it appears visible above. One may lop off branches and sever secondary roots and thus weaken the system but not until the basic and fundamental principle is destroyed will the system topple. Thus the growth may be retarded and even halted temporarily, only to resume again when circumstances are favorable.

What we have said is appropriate to the Christian system. It is founded upon a fact peculiar to itself which anchors it against every stormy wind that blows. There is a network of spiritual and moral values reaching out in every direction. An attack upon these at the base may weaken the influence and temporarily halt the spread, but until that which is exclusively central to the Christian system is destroyed that system will survive. It is in our interest to ascertain what principle is basic to Christianity and determine the chances for its survival.

We can immediately eliminate certain aspects which some unthoughtedly would equate with Christianity. One of these is moral or ethical behavior. This offers support to the Christian concept, but is not centrally exclusive to it. Many philosophers have incorporated in their instructions to their disciples a high code of moral conduct and offered motives to encourage it. One is not a Christian simply because he lives a good moral life, but he lives a good moral life because he is a Christian.

Again, we may eliminate the rational element as central to Christianity. We believe that it is a definite part of it and that Christianity satisfies the emotional need, the demand of conscience for cleansing from guilt consciousness, and the cry of will for a cause greater than self to which willing surrender can be made. It is designed to appeal to thinking persons and God summons men who rebel against Him with the words, "Come, now, let us reason together," but there is a deeper anchor than man's power of rationalization, majestic as it is.

Nor may we regard miracles as the taproot of the system. We expect to show in a future issue, God willing, the relationship of the miraculous to revelation from God, and when we do we will demonstrate that the term "miracle" is used because of our human limitations. Nothing can be supernatural with God, for he is not subject to limitations of time or space and cannot be restricted by the restraints of nature. Nothing can be "super" or above the ultimate. That which is over all can have nothing over it— or Him! Miracles may constitute a support to the claims of Christianity, and may confirm the mission of its proclaimers, but they are not basic to it. If they were there could be no Christianity without miracles, in which case miracles would cease to be supernatural at all and would become merely a natural demonstration in a Christian world.

The Initial Premise

Our task is to isolate the one great foundational anchor which separates the Christian system from every philosophy or religion in the world. I purposely omitted inserting the word “other” before either philosophy or religion, for the simple reason that when we apprehend the true nature of Christianity, we may learn that it is not simply a philosophy among other philosophies, or a religion among other religions. That which is peculiar to it may not merely set it apart from others in the same class, but may create a completely different and distinctive class to which nothing else can approach. It may not be “Exhibit A” on the top shelf of a museum case where it can be compared with other exhibits, but may be found to fit no case, and, for that matter, no museum.

As a launching pad for our orbital survey we may begin with the statement that Christianity proceeds upon the premise that at a certain juncture in the unfolding drama of human existence, God revealed himself to man. This alone serves to set the Christian system apart from many of the philosophies which preceded the Event and were still popular when it occurred. The magnificent mentality of the Greek world, in many spheres of thought had been influenced by, and in some cases obsessed with the notion that the chasm between the divine and the human was so wide and so deep that no bridge could span it. Zeno, and his disciples, the Stoics, had done their work thoroughly. Deity was considered to be so far above the realm occupied by mankind that there was no interest in or concern for men. God had no feeling manward at all. If he could be affected by the needs or sufferings of men he then would be subject to men to the extent of concern, and to that extent, at least, could not be God. This provided a frightful fatalism which pervaded the whole area of life.

But this initial premise involves much more than revelation of the thoughts and ways of God for a specific people at a specific time in the stream of human history. It was not simply a declaration of the will of God in words adapted to man's need, and this makes it distinct from even pure Judaism. We use the word "pure" to distinguish what God declared through Moses and the prophets, with the mass of interpretations and deductions which were added to make up the body of Judaism which resulted from the forced wedding of revelation and tradition. Judaism was a revelation to men through men, and comprised a book or code of laws.

Christianity did not begin with a book but with a baby! It will be seen at once how this set it apart from many forms of Gnosticism, all of which were predicated on the thesis that all matter is inherently evil and corrupt. It could not, upon such a predication, be conceded that God could directly create the material universe, and gradually there evolved the idea that emanations from God, as Eons, proceeded farther and farther from the divine person and presence until one, as a demiurge, could be close enough to the material chaos to fashion the universe from it. There was no place in such a philosophy for a direct involvement with the universe of mankind upon the part of God.

Important Distinctions

It is important to remember that the revelation of God did not come as a system to synthesize all that was good in the philosophies of the day, or of any other day or age. It did not salvage from Judaism that which was of abiding value, and mingle it with a distillate from Platonism, Aristotelianism and Persian Zoroastrianism, to form a way of life. Those who have been tempted to do this through the passing decades under the impression that they could best serve the true ends of Christianity have all, like the master of the synthetic, Thomas Aquinas, ended up with a distortion which as certainly perpetuates and protects the evil as it projects and propagates the good. All such attempts to harness Christianity to the human plow only succeed in curbing its freedom and breaking its true spirit. They stem from the false notion that Christianity is a way of life instead of life.

As we proceed further we must remember that Christianity differs from Judaism in that it is a revelation of God while the latter is a revelation from God. One would need to be skeptical indeed to doubt the divine wisdom which is exhibited in the order of these revelations. If it was to be a part of the divine purpose to recapture fellowship with men by a breakthrough of the flesh curtain, our innate sense of the appropriate would seem to decree the advisability of preparing the world of mankind for the event. Surely, if in our own day, when a dignitary pays a visit to an area which he has not previously graced with his presence, a great deal of exchange of thought is essential to pave the way, we can see the wisdom involved in preparing a world for the visit of its Creator. And just as we do not confuse the previous messages of protocol, nor what is said after the arrival, with the person of the dignitary himself, we must make the same sensible approach to the divine personage.

Having come thus far it becomes apparent that the central truth of Christianity involves a person and our relationship to that person. It is not a system of abstract truths arrived at by the power of logic, or by inductive or deductive reasoning. Instead, it centers around the birth, life and death of a person, for these are the facts which span the earthly existence of a personality, and since this is a divine personage there must be added one more dimension, that of resurrection. Christianity relates to the proper identity of this person on the basis of these facts, and an acceptance freely of all the implications and responsibilities inherent in an acknowledgment of that identity, as one's own life and death are affected by them.

The Taproot Fact

Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of the living God. This is the taproot. This is the indispensable fact upon which the Christian system rests. In the region of Caesarea Philippi, when Jesus pointedly asked his disciples how they regarded or identified him, this was the response of Simon Peter. Jesus declared that upon this fact he would plant his community. Physical structures are built upon physical foundations, moral structures are built upon ethical codes or constitutions, and the spiritual structure of the ages is built upon the truth contained in a single proposition. It is impregnable and indestructible. The forces of death will never overpower it.

We must be careful at this point lest we mistake the nature of the foundation. In our glib reply that it was upon the confession made by Peter, we must be certain that we understand what is involved. The foundation is not the act of confession. It is not the words or formula of the confession. It was important for Peter to make the statement and impossible for him to do it without means of communication, but neither a human action, nor the means employed to implement it constitute the foundation. It was not the voicing of his faith but the faith which he voiced that is basic to our study. It was the truth, the reality, embodied in the proposition which constitutes the foundation. This was a revealed truth and not the result of human deduction or expression. "You did not learn that from mortal man, it was revealed to you by my heavenly Father" (Matt. 16:17). The truth, or reality, was a person. That person was of God, and because he was the Son of God, it was God who laid the foundation. All that is built upon that foundation belongs to the foundation, and through that foundation, to God. This is made abundantly clear in the letter of Paul to the community of saints in Corinth. “There can be no other foundation beyond that which is already laid; I mean Jesus Christ himself” (1 Cor. 3:11). “Surely you know that you are God’s temple, where the Spirit of God dwells” (verse 16). “So never make mere men a cause for pride. For though everything belongs to you— Paul, Apollos, and Cephas, the world, life and death, the present and the future, all of them belong to you— yet you belong to Christ, and Christ to God” (verses 21-23).

Since Christianity is anchored in Christ the only way by which it can be uprooted is to first destroy Christ. That this is impossible will become evident to every person who solemnly contemplates that it was by an exercise of divine power that he was raised from the dead and given a name that is above every name, in all that is implied in that statement. Who can cut the taproot? The fact that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, is a divine fact, divinely revealed and divinely sustained. All that is involved in Deity itself is invested in the fact of Christ. “For in him the complete being of God, by God’s own choice, came to dwell” (Col. 1:19). “For it is in Christ that the complete being of the Godhead dwells embodied, and in him you have been brought to completion” (Col. 2:9, 10).

Facts and the Fact

There is a great deal of difference in the revealed fact of Christ who is the foundation and the facts revealed about Christ as a foundation. Men sometimes labor under the mistaken notion that by attacking the latter they are destroying the former. To all such the ancient human proverb is applicable— he who spits into the wind spits into his own face. This is as true of the winds of God which blow relentlessly across the universe. No cavilling about the virgin birth, the miracles of Jesus, the literal resurrection, or any such thing, can ever deny the fact of Christ. Men dull their axes and blunt their weapons hacking away in vain attempts to even dent the cornerstone which was laid by God.

It is true, of course, that chopping away at these supporting roots may hinder the witness of the Christian community in a given era or period. The growth may be retarded for a time because of the confusion created but all of this is powerless to uproot what God has planted. A good example may be found in the criticism of what appears to moderns as a delinquency upon the part of the Christian ethic with regard to human slavery in the teaching of Jesus and his apostles. They appear not to have condemned it but simply to have regulated it. But the critical attitude stems from a lack of knowledge of both the nature of slaves and of Christianity.

Because Jesus is a historical figure and Christianity is a historical fact, it was essential that entry into the human spectrum be made at a specific time. This had to be because history is the record of persons and events within the boundaries of time. But regardless of the time of such entry, conditions politically, economically, socially and morally, will be far from ideal. Christianity is revolutionary but it does not effect its goals by direct attack upon organizations or structures as such. To simply overthrow such structures would mean their replacement by other structures subject to the same corruption. Christianity recognizes that conditions and environments not only shape men but are created by men. It reforms the men from within and reformed men alter conditions. "The kingdom of heaven does not come by observation (overt demonstration), the kingdom of God is within you."

If Jesus had organized abolition rallies during his earthly sojourn, cities would have been sacked and burnt, a course which he rejected when it was suggested by two of his more fiery followers. "You know not what spirit you are of, for the Son of man came not to destroy men's lives but to save them." This would have resulted in some men dying for him in contravention of his design to die for all men. Even if he had been successful in striking the shackles at once from the millions of abject and nameless slaves in the Roman Empire, they would have been wholly unconditioned by previous servitude to create a stable government. If society would have survived the resultant holocaust, the annals of history would have branded Jesus as a benevolent, compassionate, but misguided zealot, instead of the Savior of the world.

Yet human slavery was effectively doomed from the very day that the slaves of envy and passion nailed Jesus to the cross. The sharp nails driven into his body were to become the hypodermic needles of the world injecting a new life into the hearts of men, and transforming them from within. The blood flowing from the riven side made both slaves and masters free, for human bondage victimizes both, the buyer and the bought. The same price paid to redeem both proved that both were of equal value. The galling fetters of heart and conscience may be more cruel than chains on arms and feet. "Christ set us free to be free men" (Gal. 5:1).

The critics of the moral approach of Jesus are always betrayed by their own fears occasioned by recognition of the brevity of life and certainty of death. Most reformers, worthy as their motives may be, undo all that is noble in their approach by the fierce sense of urgency to see the fruits of their efforts during their own lifetime. They trust themselves but not their successors. They forget that "the mills of God grind slowly." Christianity is designed to be universal and timeless. Each area and each era is considered only as it relates to the whole.

Attacks made upon the miracles of Jesus can, in no sense, destroy the fact of Jesus. There is a difference between a fact and the credentials presented by one who testifies to that fact. Although the Son of God demonstrated his power by miraculous works, he was the Son of God before them. Christianity is not based or founded upon miracles but upon the identity of the person who performed them. Miracles are signs and signs point to something— or Someone! We must never confuse the sign with the substance!

The Anointed of God

Jesus is the Christ! If this is one side of the foundation of the Christian system in all of its majesty and greatness, no field of investigation in the universe should be more challenging than the study of the implications of this foundational truth. What is involved in it which makes it so sublime and elevates it in rank above every other proposition in the universe? What does it mean to accept this proposition? To what does one give assent in so doing?

Let us first understand the meaning of the term “Christ.” John declares it is the equivalent of “Messiah.” “We have found the Messiah, which is, being interpreted, the Christ” (1:41). Messiah from the Hebrew, and Christ from the Greek, are one and the same, and they mean “anointed.” Unfortunately, the translators did not always faithfully render the original, and the average reader soon forgets that the definite article belongs before the word “Christ.” Indeed it appears that some actually think of “Christ” as a sort of second name for Jesus.

The word is not another name at all. It is the special office or function of Jesus. Dr. George Campbell, the noted scholar of Aberdeen, says in his Dissertations on the Gospels, “Our translators have contributed greatly to this mistake, by very seldom prefixing the article before Christ, though it is rarely wanting in the original. The word Christ was at first as much an appellation as the word baptist was, and the one was as regularly accompanied with the article as the other. Yet our translators, who always say the baptist, have, one would think, studiously avoided saying the christ. This may appear to superficial readers an inconsiderable difference, but the addition of the article will be found, when attended to, of real consequence for conveying the meaning in English, with the same perspicuity and propriety with which it is conveyed in Greek.”

The expression, “Jesus the anointed,” is expressive of a particular person occupying a specific office. But in what sense is the word “anointed” used in this connection? Why is it reserved for Jesus exclusively? In order to understand we must make reference to God’s method of educating mankind to that point where a divine communication could be grasped and understood. Before a child can converse with mature persons he must develop an adequate vocabulary. For this reason children are first sent to primary and elementary schools. What is true of each individual is also true of society as a whole. So God sent his children to the primary school from Adam to Moses, and when they developed into adolescence, he sent them to the secondary school with greater discipline, from Moses to the coming of the Messiah. One purpose of revelation during these ages was to provide man with a vocabulary which could be used in conveying a message to those upon whom the end of the ages has come. Scarcely a word is used in the new covenant scriptures which is not found in the old, and the spiritual meaning can be deduced from the more primitive usage.

From the old covenant scriptures we learn that there were three offices or functions for which individuals were anointed by direction of God— those of prophet, priest and king. It was the responsibility of the prophet to make known the will of God. “Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets” (Amos 3:7). “Then the Lord put forth his hand and touched my mouth. And the Lord said unto me. Behold, I have put my words in thy mouth” (Jeremiah 1:9). “Hear, 0 heavens, and give ear, 0 earth: for the Lord hath spoken” (Isaiah 1:2).

The priest was to accomplish the service of God (Hebrews 9:6), to offer gifts and sacrifices (Hebrews 8:3), and to make atonement for the sins of the people. The prophet performed a work which was God to manward; the priest performed a work which was man to Godward. The first offered the gift of God to man; the second the gifts of men to God. These were distinct functions and while a priest might prophesy, he did not do so because he was a priest.

The duty of the king was to govern and command, to exercise leadership and control. It was his duty to stop the foe and with proper direction to conquer and bring forth judgment and victory. He was to command his subjects and gain their respect, acting in benevolence and not in despotism.

These three offices represent all that is essential to reclaim and save us from our lost condition. All that is necessary to reconcile man unto God is invested in them. As Alexander Campbell once said, "We are ignorant, guilty and enslaved. To remove ignorance is the office of a prophet; to remove guilt, the office of a priest; and to emancipate and lead to victory, to defend and protect, the office of king."

To believe that Jesus is the Christ, the anointed, is more than to say he is a prophet. At the very time when Peter confessed "Thou art the Christ," he did so in contrast to the popular view that Jesus was "Jeremias, Elias, or one of the prophets." The Jews, instructed by Moses to look for a prophet whom God would raise up like himself, and whose words must be heard under penalty of banishment by God, were awaiting the coming of such an eminent personage. Accordingly when John appeared proclaiming in the wilderness, they sent priests and Levites from Jerusalem, who asked him, "Art thou Elias?" When he answered in the negative, they quickly asked, "Art thou that prophet?" They distinguished between "the prophets" and the prophet.

As “the anointed” of God, in his role of prophet, Jesus is the superlative revelation of God. “When in the former times God spoke to our forefathers, he spoke in fragmentary and varied fashion through the prophets. But in this, the final age, he has spoken to us in the Son whom he has made the heir of the whole universe” (Hebrews 1:1, 2). To accept Jesus as the Christ cannot possibly mean to regard him as one of a long line of men given special insights into the outworking of God in the universe. He was not simply another of the prophets but the goal of all of them. “‘How dull you are!’ he answered. ‘How slow to believe all that the prophets said!’ . . . Then he began with Moses and all of the prophets, and explained to them the passages which referred to himself in every part of the scriptures.”

One does not accept Jesus as the Christ at all, by conceding that he was a majestic moralist, a profound philosopher, or a powerful prophet. His uniqueness consists not in his life, his wisdom, his insights— great as these may be— but in his person, that is, in his identity. He is the Christ. He is the Son of God.

By the same token, he is not simply one of a special order of men chosen as priests. In the relationship of priesthood, he is also the Christ, the anointed one. For this reason he is referred to as “the great high priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God” (Hebrews 4:14). He is unique in that he is both priest and sacrifice. “For every high priest is ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices: wherefore it is of necessity that this man have somewhat also to offer” (8:3). “So Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many” (9:28).

Jesus is the King of kings. He is the Lord of lords. His authority, bestowed by the Father, is absolute with the exception of the Father himself who is the source of all authority. “Every other power and authority in the whole universe is subject to him as Head” (Col. 2:10). Jesus is more than a ruler among men. He is the divinely commissioned One of whom it is said, “He is the image of the invisible God; his is the primacy over all created

This much we have said about Jesus as the Messiah, or Christ, foretold by all of the prophets of God. But the taproot of the Christian system involves more than this. “Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God.” No doubt it will appear difficult to see how one could accept one of these without acknowledging the other. The Messiah of the prophets is the Son of God, yet these are two divergent propositions pointing to the same purpose. One indicates the office, the other the divine relationship. One relates to that which brings us into citizenship in the kingdom of heaven, the other to that which brings us into kinship with God.

Belief of this proposition in its fulness and without reservation must work a profound change in the life of a man. So tremendous is the alteration produced that it is spoken of as a regeneration, the new birth, or the new creation. The entire attitude toward God and man, and death, is completely transformed. Love for one another in a transcendent sense is produced in the hearts of all believers. It can be envisioned why the community of the saved ones can be built upon no other foundation.

That foundation was laid by God to endure for all ages. He acknowledged Jesus as His Son when he arose from the waters of Jordan after having been immersed by John “to conform in this way with all that God requires” (Matthew 3:15). He confirmed it at the brow of the mount where Jesus was transfigured in the presence of his disciples who fell on their faces in terror when they heard the voice from heaven. When Peter made the confession of identity fundamental to the planting of the community, Jesus declared, “You did not learn that from mortal man; it was revealed to you by my heavenly Father.” It was God who laid Jesus as the cornerstone and other foundation can no man lay. A divine structure requires both a divine architect and a divine foundation.

For this reason there can be no system of religion, worship or ritual in the category of the Christian system. It is not this, or something else as a hope of salvation— it is this, or nothing else. That which undermines faith in the Messiahship or Sonship of Jesus sweeps away man’s only hope. Every doubt cast upon either, regardless of motivation, intent or purpose, is a betrayal of man’s best interest. It is destructive of his eternal welfare. It blights and eclipses his only hope. Whether such skepticism is fostered by the darkness of ignorance, or by the gleam of intellectualism, it should be resisted by every exercise of the will. “Keep safe that which has been handed to you as a sacred trust. Turn a deaf ear to empty and worldly chatter, and the contradictions of so-called ‘knowledge’ for many who claim to have it have shot far wide of the faith” (1 Timothy 6:20, 21).

Mission Messenger (February 1966)

“Can modern man really believe in Jesus?” Increasingly we run into this question. It is not always asked by those who are in open revolt against God. More often it is the plaintive query of those whose broadening intellectual scope leaves wide chasms between childhood acceptance and mature skepticism. So many cherished notions of the past have been destroyed by advanced research that it would appear that everything once held as true must be surrendered to avoid the embarrassment of being labeled as provincial. Eventually man ends up without conviction and even doubting his own existence.

A little thought will show that the question is rather foolish. As it stands it implies that there is a difference in the way that a modern man believes and the way in which his ancestors believed. But this is not so. All rational men believe in the same way; that is they are led to belief by the same method. Belief is the response of the heart to testimony and the nature of the testimony will always govern the reaction to it, emotionally or otherwise. The question, then, is no different for man in the twentieth century than for man in any previous century. It is simply one related to testimony.

Is the testimony concerning Jesus adequate to establish the fact and nature of his existence? Is it credible? The approach must be made by examination of the witnesses. We say it must be so made because there is no other way by which a thing of which one has no personal knowledge can be affirmed or denied. There are three ways open to one who would reject that which is testified to as a fact.

1. He may attack the character of the witnesses. In such case he must present testimony to establish that they possessed neither veracity nor integrity. Or, he may prove that they invented their testimony for an ulterior motive, producing a hoax for personal gain or other private consideration.

2. He may challenge the competency of the witnesses by demonstrating through counter testimony that they were not in the place or position at the time alleged and could not have ascertained the facts, or that their acquaintance and association with the principal was so superficial and sporadic as to render any conclusion invalid. Or, he may prove that the witnesses acted out of sheer prejudice in formulating and presenting the testimony.

3. He may examine the testimony as given and show that it is contradictory to such a degree that the witnesses actually offset each other.

Until “modern man” examines for himself carefully the testimony relating to Jesus and is able to give justifiable grounds for rejection of it, he proceeds wholly upon the basis of prejudice. The word “prejudice” simply means “to judge before,” that is without examination of the facts. In spite of his infatuation with intellectuality, modern man may be as biased and jaundiced as his predecessors. We have the testimony of witnesses concerning the fact of Jesus. The number of witnesses is sufficient to establish the fact. We must either prove that they were persons of perfidy, or that they were incompetent, or that their testimony is contradictory. If “modern man” fails to do this he can never believe anything which has happened outside of his own sphere of observance, and he effectively cancels all history

If Jesus really existed, and if the testimony concerning him is accurate, to refuse to believe in him does no actual harm to Jesus. A fact is wholly unaffected by acceptance or rejection. It remains a fact regardless of the attitude taken toward it. But refusal to believe it may do untold injury to the one who rejects it, and to those under the scope of his influence who look to him for guidance. Of course there are a great many matters of fact which one may ignore with no serious or immediate consequence. There are two kinds of facts— vital and incidental. The fact of Jesus is cardinal and radical. To ignore it is to invite disaster and destruction.

We believe in Jesus as the Son of God. We regard him as the ruler of this universe. We do so upon what we accept as the testimony of credible witnesses. This may not affect what is called “modern man” for in the sophisticated language of our day this term is given a special and synthetic connotation. It does not refer to man in a certain era or epoch of history as contrasted with a previous age, but to a certain kind of man. “Modern man” is shrewd, canny and sagacious. He is the man of science who professes to live by knowledge and without faith. He does not realize that he may not be living at all in the fullest sense of the term. In spite of his suspicion and incredulity we still believe. Here are some of our reasons for doing so.

1. The witnesses who bore testimony to Jesus were simple and undesigning men. In spite of the fact that they were constantly confronted by their enemies they were not charged with perjury. On the day that they announced that Jesus had been made both Lord and Christ, three thousand of those who had been responsible for the murder of Jesus less than two months before recanted and acknowledged as Lord the one whom they had crucified. A short time later a great number of priests became obedient to the faith which the witnesses announced.

The Sanhedrin in Jerusalem was so annoyed with their testimony that they put them into custody. In a private meeting they questioned, "What shall we do with these men?" It would have pleased them beyond measure to have attacked their character, but not once did they do so. If their contemporaries, who sought every means of off-setting their witness, did not once charge them with fabrication, forgery or mendacity, it is too late to do so now. The only legitimate ground for so doing would be the discovery of new evidence not available to the judges of their day. This is impossible. We are forced to regard the witnesses as men of honesty and candor.

It is evident that they did not invent the testimony about Jesus. In the first place they were incapable of producing a hoax by which to deceive millions of the wisest people on earth for nineteen centuries. Their antagonists were made to wonder about their boldness when they "perceived that they were uneducated, common men." They were from an obscure province of the Roman Empire, living in subjugation and in constant fear of the ruling authorities. It is incredible to suppose that they would conspire together to promote a delusion, and if they had done so they would never have included some of their number. One was a social outcast, one was a thief, and another a member of a party which was outside the pale of the law.

Instead of expecting financial gain they actually sacrificed their jobs, investments, and security in order to follow Jesus. Even the outcast tax collector left his lucrative position. One who had studied to be a lawyer, and who threw over everything he had amassed to follow Jesus declared, "As servants of God we commend ourselves to you in every way: through great endurance, in afflictions, hardships, calamities, beatings, imprisonments, tumults, labors, watching, hunger," etc. All of them, with the exception of one, actually suffered death for his faith. It is admitted that dying for one's testimony does not prove it is true, but it proves that he believes it is true. One of them wrote, "Since we have the same spirit of faith as he had who wrote, 'I believed, and so I spoke,' we too believe, and so we speak." Even when threatened by the authorities they said, "For we cannot but speak of what we have seen and heard."

2. We accept the competency of the witnesses for theirs was not a mere passing acquaintance with the subject of their testimony. They had visual, audible and manual experience with Jesus. "We have heard, we have seen with our eyes, we have carefully scrutinized and touched with our hands . . . we saw it and testify to you." They were constantly with Jesus for more than three and one-half years. Indeed, before he would accept them as witnesses they had to accompany him all the time that he went in and out among them from the day he began his public ministry until the day he left the earth. They were chosen and qualified so their credentials could never be successfully invalidated. "And we are witnesses to all that he did both in the country of the Jews and in Jerusalem. They put him to death by hanging him upon a tree; but God raised him up on the third day and made him manifest; not to all the people but to us who were chosen by God as witnesses, who ate and drank with him after he rose from the dead."

That the witnesses did not concoct the testimony as a result of sheer prejudice appears certain from their own doubt and hesitancy in accepting the facts at first. When they were informed of the resurrection of Jesus, we are told, "But when they heard that he was alive and had been seen by her, they would not believe it." Again, "After this he appeared in another form to two of them, as they were walking into the country. And they went back and told the rest, but they did not believe them." Again, "Afterward he appeared to the eleven themselves as they sat at tables; and he upbraided them for their unbelief and hardness of heart, because they had not believed those who saw him after he was risen." So far from being biased in favor of the fact they had to be convinced of it.

3. I have examined the testimony of the witnesses as it is preserved in writing. I have discovered no contradiction of such consequence as to refuse a verdict in reference to the fact. In addition I have also considered carefully the alleged contradictions of those who urge rejection of the testimony on this ground. I am convinced that most of the opposers do not distinguish between a contradiction and a discrepancy or contrariety. Contradictories always exclude each other and do not admit of explanation; while discrepancies may oppose each other in appearance, or in some particular, and may be harmonized when all facets of testimony are taken into consideration in conjunction with the circumstances involved.

The philosopher William Paley wrote, "I know not a more rash or unphilosophical conduct of the understanding, than to reject the substance of a story by reason of some diversity in the circumstances with which it is related. The usual character of human testimony is substantial truth under circumstantial variety." It behooves us to remember that each of the witnesses who recorded testimony for us was writing to a different audience and with a different aspect in mind. Matthew wrote to the Jews to prove that Jesus was the Messiah of the prophets; Mark to the Romans to prove he was a world conqueror; Luke to the Greeks to prove that he was the ideal Man; John to the world to induce belief "that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing this, you might have life through his name." Yet all have the same Jesus in mind and all testify to those essential features which prove that his was a factual residence in history.

Much of what appears to be discrepancy, or even inconsistency, is due to omission, a fact being noted by one witness which is not mentioned by others, or, if mentioned, appearing out of a chronological order. This may be accounted for by the various purposes of the several writers, but if the fact at issue is rejected on this basis, then all courts of law must cease to function as clearinghouses for cases on the basis of evidence. Those who are skilled in the science of jurisprudence are fully aware that when a number of witnesses testify to an incident with close and minute agreement, there may be a presumption of confederacy and fraud. The angle at which one views a person or thing may make a great difference in his actual testimony.

When “modern man” rejects that which has been accepted for centuries upon the basis of evidence, there is as much reason for questioning the motivation of “modern man” as for being suspicious of the evidence. Indeed we may well wonder why he wants to discard that which has been the accepted standard of a majority of his ancestors. Unless he can prove that the witnesses were incompetent and irresponsible, what personal reason governs him in disregarding that which they have testified? Will acceptance of it necessitate just demands upon his life which he is unwilling to meet? Will it increase his responsibility in such a manner as to interfere with his material desires and pursuits? Is denial merely a way of escapism?

One cannot simply say, “I do not believe in Jesus,” without facing the question, “Why?” And he must offer more than prejudice as an answer to that. If he says, “My intellectual status will not allow me to believe in Jesus,” he again must face the question, “Why?” Can one become so sophisticated that he is emancipated from the laws governing evidence? If so, let him be consistent and refuse to accept, believe or teach anything on that basis. So long as he acknowledges the validity of any conclusion based upon evidence, we will insist that he desist from forming a conclusion concerning Jesus until he has fairly attacked the evidence and proven that it is irrelevant or irrational in nature and content.

Meanwhile we want to state unequivocally that we accept the testimony related to Jesus of Nazareth. We unashamedly vow belief that he is the Son of God and both Lord and Christ. While we are convinced that someday every intelligent being in the universe will be forced to admit this, we prefer to do it voluntarily and cheerfully, for he has said, “So every one who acknowledges me before men, I also will acknowledge before my Father who is in heaven.” Please consider this article as my personal acknowledgment of Jesus in your presence. Glory to his name!

The Divine Revelation

Mission Messenger (March 1966)

It is our conviction that God has revealed himself in nature, in word, and in a Son. In these three he has demonstrated his power, his purpose, and his personality. Our conviction is not shared by all. We live in an age which challenges the authorship of the first two, and the paternity of the last. For that reason we propose to discuss the grounds of our belief and much as we would like to deal with all three, we will be forced to confine our attention primarily to the unfolding of the divine thought in word. It will be our thesis that the nature of God and man makes such a revelation imperative.

Man has limitations imposed upon his acquisition of knowledge by time and space. What is true of the individual is likewise true of mankind in the aggregate. The cumulative wisdom of the past has been achieved within these limitations so it can never become infinite. Death is always the terminus of personal research. It removes man from the arena of investigation and cuts off avenues of study. We can apprehend truth by the testimony of our senses, that is, by experience, or by rational deduction. But our perceptiveness is limited in its processes to known facts which form the bases for arrival at conclusions. The intellect can be projected by imagination into the sphere of the unreal but can only frame new combinations of thought from the elements already in possession. Reason and imagination differ in object and operation. Reason ascertains what is true, imagination what is possible. The first enquires, the second creates. Reason is exercised within the limits of what is known and actual, the domain of imagination is that of the conjectural and conceivable. But in any communication of its concepts, imagination must employ word images of the real. The unknown can only be explained in the terms of the known. Man is constantly thrown back upon his intellectual resources consisting of a deposit of his previous observations of phenomena, or of the historical record of such observations by his ancestors.

Since man is by nature powerless to transcend his temporal and spatial limitations, any adequate concept of the infinite must come from without and be derived from a source other than mere rationalization. It must be dispensed, that is, passed out to man, rather than dug out by man. He cannot climb up to it and reach it by experience of his own faculties but it must be handed down to him. To believe in God— as God— one must accept that the ways and thoughts of God are not the ways and thoughts of man. Moreover, he must conclude that no man, by searching or researching, can find out God or fathom the mind of God. As the heavens are higher than the earth so must the thoughts of God be higher than the thoughts of men. To have it otherwise would be to elevate man to the status of God, or to reduce God to the status of man. The ultimate of this would be a denial of God altogether, by a postulation that the infinite can be contained in and confined by the finite.

If man cannot by his own resources and faculties apprehend the thoughts of God, it follows that, if those thoughts are to be made available unto him it must be the result of a gratuitous act of God, and by means of revelation. But revelation cannot take the place of research nor be a substitute for it. That which man is capable of learning for himself he must be allowed to discover, for any other procedure would destroy the incentive for study and stifle initiative. It must be assumed that revelation from God will be for the good of man, and the affording of revelation which would be detrimental to man's development is unthinkable as an act of God. Revelation must be outside the perimeter which can be reached by experience and deduction, and there must be such a perimeter seeing that man is what he is.

This brings us to the place where we must have an adequate definition of our term. However, no term is plunged into a vocabulary without antecedent conditions or circumstances which give rise to it and make its employment either essential or useful. Frequently a definition is best which gathers up into brief compass these conditions. The term "revelation from God" presupposes the existence of God and man, and predicates that there were concepts known to God which were hidden from man, and which were indiscernible by man, and must remain so because of human limitations, and that these concepts were conveyed to man directly and not as the result of his own rationalization.

There is no indication that man could not grasp or understand these concepts once they were made available to his intellect, but simply that he could not ascertain or discover them by his own power. That which is incapable of apprehension by the mind when given, is not a revelation at all. It remains a mystery. Revelation has to do with ideas and thoughts. Words are merely the packages in which they are delivered. If we have no way of opening the package, the ideas will still be hidden, and we will have no revelation, but only neatly packaged mysteries. It is obvious then that revelation is uncovering by the divine mind of those things which man cannot discover for himself.

This definition is sustained by etymology. The Greek original for revelation is apokalupsis. This is a compound of apo, away from; and kalupsis, a veiling. It thus means literally, to take a veil away, that is to uncover, lay bare, or make naked. It was used of the unveiling of a statue which had been swathed in a covering until the day of presentation to the public. It was also used of the explanation of any fact which had been hidden in obscurity. When we talk of the revelation of God we refer to the disclosure of truth which had previously been unknown and remained inaccessible unto man.

We are now ready to examine a much abused and misunderstood scriptural passage, I Corinthians 2:9, “But, as it is written, ‘What no eye hath seen, nor ear heard, nor the heart of man conceived, what God has prepared for those who love him.’” Men who are ignorant of the context sometimes use this as the basis for a funeral discourse. They think it has reference to the eternal realm and the joys of heaven which none of us can fully anticipate in this life. But the very next statement demonstrates the fallacy of this. “God has revealed it to us through the Spirit.”

Isaiah was speaking of the coming Messianic age, the gospel dispensation, the era in which we now live. He points out the limitations of man and the need for revelation. There are some things we cannot discover by visual perception (eye has not seen); there are some things we cannot discern by audible testimony (ear has not heard); there are some things we cannot learn by human rationalization (the heart has not conceived). It is these things which we cannot discover by use of our senses and mental capacities which God has revealed unto us. We live in the age of the world to which all other previous ages were tributary, and in which the deep things of God have been revealed unto us.

Nature of Revelation

The divine agent of revelation must be divine. “For what person knows a man’s thoughts except the spirit of the man which is in him? So also no one comprehends the thoughts of God except the Spirit of God.” It was necessary that the Spirit convey the thoughts of God to man, but it is not necessary for the Spirit to convey them directly to each man upon the earth, for once those thoughts have been bestowed upon capable and qualified men they can become the human agents of transmission to all other men. God is a divine economist. He exerts not one bit of power beyond what is necessary to fulfill the divine purpose. No supernatural demonstration will be given where natural power is all that is required. God does nothing for a man which he can do for himself or which another man can do for him.

Once a divine secret, mystery, or previously hidden truth, is disclosed and written down, all others may grasp it by reading and study. So we learn from Paul that, “the mystery was made known to me by revelation, as I have written briefly. When you read this you can perceive my insight into the mystery of Christ, which was not made known to the sons of men in other generations as it has now been revealed to his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit.” The purpose of the direct revelation to some men was “to make all men see what is the plan of the mystery hidden for ages in God who created all things.” The task of the apostles and prophets was to transmit the divine thought to all men in language they could understand. Paul says, “For we write you nothing but what you can read and understand. I hope you will understand fully.”

What the apostles saw directly they simply recorded as eyewitnesses; what they heard firsthand they simply recorded as earwitnesses. But what they did not experience because of human limitations was made available to them by revelation. Thus Peter affirms, “For we did not follow cleverly devised myths when we made known to you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but we were eyewitnesses of his majesty” (2 Peter 1:16). The words “cleverly devised” are from sophizo, and in this case mean “to play the sophist,” that is, to employ specious or fallacious reasoning. The apostle emphatically denies that the testimony concerning Jesus Christ was a cunningly contrived piece of fiction intended as a hoax. That he positively believed what he said is evident from the fact that he died rather than renounce it.

Not only did he see Jesus but he affirmed that he heard the voice of God announce the identity of Jesus. "For when he received honor and glory from God the Father and the voice was borne to him by the Majestic Glory, 'This is my beloved Son with whom I am pleased,' we heard this voice borne from heaven for we were with him on the holy mountain." "We were eyewitnesses . . . we heard this voice." No one at this late date can deny the fact of Jesus. He can only attack the credibility of the witnesses. He must prove that they were either deceived or deceivers. If he takes the latter course he confronts men who preferred death to denial, an utterly improbable thing in twelve men; if he takes the former he must first postulate a position based upon a presupposition which will make it impossible for him to believe anything which happened before his day or prove himself to be utterly inconsistent and prejudicial. We have never yet read an attack upon the chosen witnesses that did not result in a verdict of inconsistency upon the part of the attacker.

But the apostle does not stop with that which was visually and audibly experienced. "And we have the prophetic word made more sure . . . First of all you must understand this, that no prophecy of scripture is a matter of one's own interpretation, because no prophecy ever came by the impulse of man, but men moved by the Holy Spirit spoke from God." Here it is affirmed that men who received revelation were spokesmen for God. The message originated with God and it was delivered to the human spokesmen by the Holy Spirit. The word "moved" is from phero, to bear or carry. W. E. Vine comments of its use here, "They were 'borne along,' or impelled by the Holy Spirit's power, not acting according to their own wills, or simply expressing their own thoughts, but expressing the mind of God in words provided and ministered by Him." Men moved by the Holy Spirit spoke from God— this is revelation.

Note that this constitutes “the prophecy of scripture.” The word “scripture,” from graphie, refers to that which is written, but it is apparent that it has a specialized meaning. The prophecy of scripture makes up the scripture of prophecy, the accepted or canonical scripture, that is, the scripture which measures up (to the test of divine origin). Here is an affirmation that the scriptures regarded as holy did not originate by the impulse of man. They compose a revelation from God in writing.

Let us note the word “interpretation” because a false emphasis upon the expression, “No scripture is of private interpretation,” led to the evils resultant from the Romish authoritarianism over the sacred scriptures. On page 92 of his book, “The Faith of our Fathers,” James Cardinal Gibbons, Archbishop of Baltimore, cites the statement as proof that “the Church is the divinely appointed Custodian and interpreter of the Bible.” But it will be observed that the apostle was not talking about those who read the scriptures but about those who wrote them. The question with which he deals is not that of understanding the scriptures or what they teach, but of their origin.

No scripture is of private interpretation “because no prophecy ever came by the will of man.” The prophets did not see events and write down their personal interpretation of them; they predicted events and the events happened in fulfillment of the prediction. The sacred scriptures are not made up of human interpretation based upon cause and effect, but holy men of God spoke as they were directed and motivated by the Holy Spirit. We accept the fact that the sacred writings contain God’s message to mankind.

This will be a good place for us to notice a modern tendency to undermine the authority of the sacred scriptures as being a revelation from God. Once this was done by agnostics and skeptics who attacked the word of God from outside the church of God. Now it is being accomplished by those who are regarded as leaders of thought from within the fold. There is a difference in the nature of the attacks; one being an openly declared war of aggression, the other disguised revolt or rebellion. Both are part of the age-old conflict between the wisdom which is from above and “the wisdom of this age” (1 Cor. 2:6). One demonstrates itself in the words of the Spirit, the other in “plausible words of wisdom.”

Every such attack proceeds from a motivation which becomes the guiding genius behind all that is said or written. One needs to look behind the curtain and see what it is hoped to adopt or eliminate, which first makes necessary the undermining of the sacred scriptures. For instance, if one desires to promote a restructuring of the organization or polity of the church among those who have always looked to the scriptures for guidance in such matters he must first remove the scriptures from a position of validity in determination of such factors.

In a discussion on unity held in 1965, a brother speaking under the heading, “The Tradition of the Church Gave Rise to the New Testament,” made this statement: “When seeking for a Churchly structure it is an easy assumption to say that the New Testament— or even the Old Testament— gives a perfect record of what kind of structure we should have. Such an assumption seems to overlook the fact that the Scriptures as we know them in their canonized form did not make their appearance prior to 320 A.D. Of course, there were many letters, collections and writings available; but the Scriptures as we know them were not in anything like their present form for more than three hundred years after the birth of Christ. This means that the Church not alone preceded the Scriptures; but the Bible is the result of the work of the Church.”

It is not our intention here to enter into the controversy which gave rise to this statement but simply to examine the merits of the argument adduced. It is typical of a form of reasoning being adopted by scores of Protestant scholars in our day as the means for preparing the way for various changes in form, liturgy and government— changes which are essential in order to make possible the merger or coalition of various divergent groups. We mention “Protestant scholars” because Rome has always used the same argument but with a different design. Rome employs this reasoning to establish the absolute authority of the church; Protestants use it to deny that there is any absolute authority for the church.

Our interest here is not whether the New Testament “gives a perfect record of what kind of structure we should have.” That is indeed a profitable field of investigation, but the origin and nature of revelation must never be confused with its design. Our purpose is to examine, without reference to the use made of it or intended by it, the argument of our brother, and if it is invalid, it cannot be used by any person justifiably to further any goal. We believe that his postulate is “an easy assumption” which overlooks two facts.

The Canonized Form

We presume that by the expression “the Scriptures in their canonized form” is meant the Scriptures collected and collated as we now have them in a single volume of twenty-seven letters and treatises, but if so, the expression “canonized form” may be somewhat confusing and misleading. We fail to see what relationship is sustained to the argument being made or to the deductions drawn from it, by the fact that the Scriptures were not collected into a composite volume “for more than three hundred years after the birth of Christ.”

If the question deals with the matter of structure, it rightly resolves itself into the problem of whether there is a structure provided in the letters to the congregations, and if so, whether it was regarded by those who received the letters as the will of God and authoritative on that account.

The letters of a father detailing the responsibility of his several children in separate cities of the world do not depend upon the future act of others in collecting and validating their genuineness before they become authoritative to the members of the family. Nor can future generations logically conclude that the family had no special order, form or structure, prior to the publication of the letters in one volume. The authority stems from original authorship and not from subsequent arrangement of the material.

However, purely from a historical standpoint, we must recognize that the Scriptures existed before they were collected. Each letter became scripture the moment it was written, and if it was inspired of God it was holy, or sacred scripture. The collection of these into a volume called “the holy scriptures” added not one thing to their holiness or to their authority. It simply signified that all doubts concerning the rightful place of any of them had been abrogated by that time. Every student knows that long before the compilation of the books into a single volume, quotations were made from all of them by various Christian saints, both in their confirmation of the believers and the confrontation with schismatics. And these appeals were made to the writings as authoritative.

Did the tradition of the church give rise to the New Testament? That all depends upon what one means by tradition. Like most words which have been used for generations this one is now susceptible of several different definitions and even more implications. If used here as “an inherited culture or attitude,” to imply that the scriptures grew out of a human seeking or searching for an ideal, and represent the conclusions reached by a trial-and-error method, we emphatically deny that this is so. If the statement means that need grew for a collection into compact form of the writings regarded as sacred, and this need resulted in the scriptures as we now have them, we accede to this as partially so. If “the tradition of the church” refers to conditions existing in the various congregations which required a revelation from God to exhibit what the response of the divine nature should be under such circumstances, we readily accede to it.

At this point we may well study the implication of the word “canon” as applied to the scriptures. It is a scriptural word, being translated by the terms “line” and “rule.” (Cp. Gal. 6:16; 2 Cor. 10:13, 15, 16). The Greek kanon is akin to the Hebrew word for reed, and originally signified a rod used for measuring. It is, then, a standard for measurement. But a thing used to measure must first be measured itself, and is then used to measure other things. There must be first established a rule for measuring the validity of those books accepted as sacred writings, and then those writings must become the rule by which all else is measured as to its holiness or sacredness.

On what ground was the rule established to determine the right of admissibility to the sacred canon of any writing? It could not have been on the basis of antiquity, or literary structure, or mere content of truth. The answer is found in the word “apostolicity.” The church recognized that the apostles had been chosen, called and commissioned by Jesus himself. They knew that he said unto them, “He that receiveth you, receiveth me.” They were aware that he promised that the Spirit of truth would guide the apostles into all truth. They were ambassadors, ministers plenipotentiary of the King. That which they wrote or sanctioned had the authority of Jesus to give it weight. They were the human agents selected to reveal and convey the divine will. It was made known “to the holy apostles and prophets.”

The general acceptance of the authority of the apostles motivated the acceptance of that which they wrote, or of that which was written by their associates and under their personal sanction or endorsement. It is here that the brother to whom we have alluded may create a false impression by the statement, "the Bible is the result of the work of the Church." The Bible was not written by the church. It was written to the church. The books were not accepted as canonical because the church had produced them but because it had received them. The authority stemmed not from their acceptance but from their origin. Canonicity did not create authority nor increase it, but simply recognized it. It was in the giving and not the gathering of the books that the authority resided.

We have no desire to be tiresome or boresome. We do not wish to belabor a point. But it is our prediction that we will be treated to increasing disregard and irreverence for the sacred scriptures as men continue to confuse liberty with license. For this reason it becomes necessary to emphasize certain distinctive truths, and the truth about certain distinctions. Increasingly we are being treated to the idea that the new covenant scriptures simply grew out of the experience of the church, and that there was no adequate guide until the canon was completed in the fourth century. The conclusion of this is expected to be that the primitive saints had no certain structure, polity or norm. Certainly this would render any thought of restoration an impossibility and would make any reformation limit itself solely to ethical and moral behavior of those involved in it. You cannot restore that which never existed.

Now the apostles either wrote under the guidance and impulse of the Holy Spirit or they did not. If they did not, Christians have no distinctive sacred scriptures at all, and if they do not, any appeal to the new covenant scriptures for testimony about Jesus, or anything else, is useless and senseless. This is obvious when one realizes that Jesus promised that the Spirit would teach them all things and bring to their remembrance all that he had said unto them, and the apostles testified that the things they spoke were received from the Spirit. "We impart this in words not taught by human wisdom but taught by the Spirit." If Jesus and the apostles misrepresented the origin of the apostolic message, we cannot rely upon the content of it.

If they did speak and write by revelation, the authority existed before the revelation and the revelation became authoritative when given. Canonicity conferred no authority! It created a book not a revelation. It gathered up and compiled authoritative documents and created a volume out of them, but each of these was authoritative before the collection took place. Canonicity did not multiply the authority, it simply added the books together.

The authority does not reside in a volume but in a revelation. The Bible is not an authorized collection of books, but a collection of authorized books. The books were accepted because they measured up to the rule of the canon, they contained a revelation from God. They were sacred writings, holy scriptures. They were not holy scriptures because they were accepted in the canon, but they were adopted into the canon because they were holy scriptures.

Let it never be forgotten that there were many letters and treatises written by those within the body of believers at the same time as those which compose the new covenant scriptures. If the new testament scriptures were produced solely by the church out of her tradition, why were these others in that same tradition not included? On what basis was the selectivity governed? If, as is implied, the sacred canon was not closed until 320 A.D., why were the letters of some of the more recent “church fathers” not included as authoritative, seeing that they spoke directly to matters of controversy then current? Did the Holy Spirit guide the apostles into all truth and protect that truth from admixture with that which was deduced rather than revealed. We can never escape the question as to whether the sacred scriptures constitute letters written by the church or to the church!

Perhaps we will now be asked to what “theory of inspiration” we subscribe. This question is always injected when one accepts the scriptures as a revelation from God. Of course the theory one holds does not in any sense affect the issue of whether or not the scriptures are given by inspiration or revelation. One could be quite mistaken about the nature or means of revelation without affecting the fact of it. An error as to the kind of tools employed in making an automobile does not affect its use or function. The truth is that I hold no exclusive theory about the how of revelation. To do so would be to limit God to a special method and a set form. But nothing seems to be clearer than that God has revealed his will in various ways to his chosen witnesses.

I do not doubt that the Spirit sometimes spoke in exact terms. “Now the Spirit expressly says that in later times some will depart from the faith” (1 Timothy 4:1). The word “expressly” is from rhotos, which means “in stated terms.” But the “now” indicates that upon other occasions the Spirit did not thus communicate the divine message. By whatever means, and through whatever channels, it was conveyed by the Spirit to the apostles and prophets I accept it as a revelation from God and propose to implement it as God’s will in my life. God does not need to follow my blueprint to get me to acknowledge his word. My motto is, “The sum of thy word is truth; and every one of thy righteous ordinances endures for ever” (Psalm 119:160).

Revelation and God

At this juncture I shall presume upon the graciousness of my readers by expressing myself about another problem which confronts us in our day. I refer to the skepticism which is concealed behind clerical garb and which has infiltrated many seminaries. It is this infiltration which bodes ill for our society. The word seminary is from semen, or seminis, seed, and it is the seed implanted in the hearts of those who will to a great extent influence and determine the pattern of religious thought in the future which carries a portent of evil consequences. Many of these cultivated seedbeds will prove that “while men slept an enemy hath crept in and sowed tares.”

A concrete example may be found in Time Magazine for October 22, 1965, in which is reported the thinking of the “God is dead” ecclesiastics. Typical is the statement made by Gabriel Valhanian, Associate Professor of Syracuse University. The writer says, “He argues that God, if there is one, is known to man only in terms of man’s own culture, and thus is basically an idol. ‘Theologically speaking, any concept of God can only be an approximation,’ he says, ‘Only God can have a concept about God.’”

This whole skeptical position is based upon one presupposition, and while the learned professor talks with such dogmatic assurance it must not be forgotten that all he says is based upon assumption. If God has given man a revelation his entire “house of cards” comes tumbling down. It is true that if God has never revealed himself there can be no real assurance that he exists. Of course human reason, kindled by imagination, could project the idea of God, and man could react as if he had assurance, but this would not constitute proof. And it must be admitted that if God is known to man only in terms of man’s own culture, he would be basically an idol, a cultural creation of human beings.

But if God has revealed himself and man has accepted that revelation and developed a culture as the result of his acceptance, it is at once plain that God has influenced that culture rather than the culture creating God. Moreover, under such conditions, to know God in terms of the culture would not be to interpret God through the culture but to interpret and evaluate the culture through the terms of God. It is not true that “only God can have a concept about God” if God can reveal himself to rational beings. That concepts can be conveyed from one mind to another by communication must be admitted by even Professor Valhanian, for if such were not the case he is obtaining money under false pretence by “professing” to teach at Syracuse University. When he reveals a concept to a student and the student receives it, does not that student then have that concept? If God reveals himself to rational beings capable of receiving concepts, on what ground is it argued that only God can have a concept about God?

Notice that the statement has to do with “a concept about God.” His contention is that any concept of God can be only an approximation. By this he apparently intends to convey the thought that the finite mind cannot fully grasp the infinite, a point which appears rather ridiculous. If one could enter fully into all that is implied in the concept of God he would be infinite and thus be God. But if God has revealed himself to man, certainly man may grasp the concept of God to the extent of that revelation, and this is not an approximation at all. An approximation is an approach to a correct estimate or conception, but one who believes all that God reveals has a correct estimate or concept, and when he acts upon the basis of that revelation he is not guided by an inferior or approximate rationalization.

The concept about God is in the world. It is as well-nigh universal as any concept can be, except perhaps, that of one’s own existence. If only God can have a concept about God, whence came this concept in the minds of men? How did man first receive it? Even Professor Valhanian talks about God and he either talks about something of which he has no concept, or he denies his own dictum. Seeing that “only God can have a concept about God” he must either admit that he is arguing about something of which he has no concept, or affirm that he is God! Actually he simply provides one more witness that there is a certain amount of proof that God exists in the fact that the mind of man is able to entertain the concept that there is one God.

All of the “God is dead” theorists begin by denying that God has revealed himself and then proceed upon that denial predicated upon assumption to spin their webs of sophistry. To do this they must conclude that God has not revealed himself because he is nonexistent, or because he is either powerless or indifferent. If the conclusion is based upon the first they sail under false colors when they claim to be “theologians,” because theology is a knowledge of God and the supernatural, and no one can claim to possess a knowledge of that to which he denies existence. If these men are not theologians then they should not be respected or quoted as experts in the field of theology. One would be a poor instructor in geology who began his course by asserting that the earth did not exist and was merely a phantom in superstitious minds, or a product of our culture. On what ground can one qualify as a theologian who intimates that there may be neither a theos nor a logos?

By the same token, to postulate that God exists but has not revealed himself unto man, is to turn about and reason God out of existence. If God could reveal his will but would not, he would not be God; if he would reveal his will but could not he could not be God. We concur with Rabbi Eugene B. Borowitz, of Hebrew Union College, Jewish Institute of Religion, The New York School, that “A theologian stands in great jeopardy when he makes his fundamental methodological decisions.” Any survey will be affected by where the surveyor plants his Jacob’s staff. We have planted ours on the ground encompassed by the sentence with which this article begins. If you would know where we stand turn back and read that initial statement.

Unity in Christ

Mission Messenger (April 1966)

Volume 28

An address Delivered at the Forum on Fellowship, Hartford, Illinois

It is a privilege to greet you in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and to present this opening message in the forum on fellowship which you sponsor every year at this time. I commend the congregation at Hartford for arranging these meetings in which men from the Disciples of Christ, Independent Christian Churches, and several segments of the non-instrument Churches of Christ can meet and share their views. In all the years that I have been participating I have never seen a single untoward incident occur. Every speech and the public dialogues between speakers and audience have demonstrated the genuine love and concern which temper our approach to controversial issues.

This year our themes are all drawn from the first two chapters of Ephesians and all of the speakers have been requested to use the New English Bible New Testament as the basic text. My theme is "Unity in Christ." My passage for exposition is Ephesians 1:3-11.

Praise be to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ . . . In Christ he chose us before the world was founded, to be dedicated, to be without blemish in his sight, to be full of love; and he destined us— such was his will and pleasure— to be accepted as his sons through Jesus Christ, that the glory of his gracious gift, so graciously bestowed on us in his Beloved, might redound to his praise. For in Christ our release is secured and our sins are forgiven through the shedding of his blood. Therein lies the richness of God's free grace lavished upon us, imparting full wisdom and insight. He has made known to us his hidden purpose— such was his will and pleasure determined beforehand in Christ— to be put into effect when the time was ripe: namely, that the universe, all in heaven and on earth, might be brought into a unity in Christ.

This provides us the foundation for the whole epistle. It summarizes our relationship with the divine. All we have, all we are, and all we ever hope to be, is found in Christ. The term “in Christ” occurs seven times, the word “us” six times, the word “our” four times.

In Christ we have every spiritual blessing.

In Christ we are chosen.

In Christ we are dedicated.

In Christ we are cleansed from every blemish.

In Christ we are filled with love.

In Christ our release is secured.

In Christ our sins are forgiven.

In Christ our share of the heritage is given.

Christ is the center and circumference of the entire Christian economy. He is the center, and whatever does not propel us toward him has no validity. He is the circumference, and whatever does not proceed from him has no authority. He draws us together by the magnetic power of his divine Sonship; he holds us together by the majestic power of his divine Lordship.

He is the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last. He is the author and finisher of our faith, the pioneer and perfecter of our hope. All who ever went before him, all who ever came after him, if truly important, are important only because of their relationship unto him.

Adam, who was of the earth earthy, is important because of the second man Adam, who is the Lord from heaven. And our own worth is not because we have borne the image of the earthy, but because we shall bear the image of the heavenly.

Abraham is important to the world, because when summoned by divine call from his Chaldean home, it was revealed that through his seed all the families of the earth would be blessed. And “it was not to ‘seeds’ in a plural form, but in the singular, ‘and to your seed,’ and the seed referred to is Christ” (Galatians 3:16).

Moses is important because it was revealed to him that God would raise up a prophet like himself from among the people, and that prophet would speak with such authority that one who refused to hear him would be cut off from among the people.

David is important because of the promise that while he slumbered in his sepulcher, God would raise up one to sit on his throne and would establish that throne through the ages.

John the immerser is important because he could point to Jesus and say, “Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world.”

Paul, who came from Tarsus, is important only because he was willing to cast his intellectual attainments, his social prestige and his national privileges, into the garbage can, in order to know Christ and the power of his resurrection.

GROUNDS FOR HOPE

I am frequently asked for the ground of my undefeatable optimism and overwhelming confidence that unity will become a reality in the family of God. In spite of attacks upon my position, and in spite of opposition to it, I remain serene and unshaken. This is because of my reliance upon the veracity of God's revelation. And there are four words in the passage which I read which stimulate my trust. They are purpose, will, pleasure and design. Every one of these refers to God. What is God's purpose, will, pleasure and design? Here it is! "That the universe, all in heaven and on earth, might be brought into a unity in Christ."

Unity in Christ! This is the purpose of God and one who works for such unity will help fulfill the purpose of God.

Unity in Christ! This is the will of God and one who works for such unity will labor in harmony with the divine will.

Unity in Christ! This is the pleasure of God and one who works for such unity will certainly please God.

Unity in Christ! This is the design of God and one who labors for such unity will be a factor in the divine program of the ages.

Unity will come because it must come. The divine purpose cannot be frustrated, the divine will cannot be a failure, the divine pleasure cannot be mere fancy, the divine design cannot be a fallacy. I think that the certainty of unity can be predicated upon either rationalization, philosophy, or faith, although I take my stand firmly on the latter as the basis of my sheer and rugged confidence. If it be argued that there is no difference in the first two, I affirm that there is. One may rationalize without a goal in mind. All of us have heard of wandering thoughts and vagaries of mind. But the philosopher has a goal. Reasoning is simply the method of clearing the path leading to his destination. Let us examine how these three may lead us to conclude that unity will triumph over division and the party spirit in the universal program or design.

1. Rationally. To one who accepts the new covenant scriptures as authentic, it is given that the party spirit is a work of the flesh, while unity is the fruit of the Holy Spirit. We may reason that the Spirit is as superior to the flesh as the divine nature is to the lower. The flesh is perishable. All that is produced by it, or is an outgrowth of it, is destined to perish. It will decay and pass away. But the Spirit is imperishable. That which is a fruit of the Spirit will outlast and survive. The unity which belongs to the Spirit will as certainly triumph over the flesh as Jesus became victor over death, being raised from the dead through that same Spirit. Division is doomed!

2. Philosophically. Life can be sustained only by unity. Death results from disunity. This is true in the vegetable, animal and spiritual worlds, those three areas in which we are acquainted with life. If a plant or tree is dismembered and the process of division continues long enough the plant will be killed. If an animal continues to be fragmented by removal of limbs and organs, death will result. If we bite and devour one another we will be consumed one of another.

Death is not a thing which displaces life. It is simply absence of life. The body without the spirit is dead. Life is positive. Death is negative. It is mere absence of animation. Darkness is simply absence of light. It is negative. It is not a negative force because it is not a force at all. When a light is turned on darkness simply recedes because light is a power or force which is positive. Division is simply absence of the unifying principle. It is negative. The unifying principle is love. Love will abide when all else departs. It is a positive force, the most powerful in the universe. Some day it will overcome because it must do so!

3. Faith. This is the foundation for my unconquerable optimism. It stems from the very nature of God as revealed unto mankind. I have faith in what I call the divine imperative. Let me define or spell out for you what I mean.

THE DIVINE IMPERATIVE

Whatever God ordains as his will must be done as his will ordains.

That which the infinite mind can conceive, the infinite power can complete.

What God projects as a design of divine purpose, he will perfect as a sign of the divine pleasure.

This is but another way of saying that the Artist will not leave his picture with even one brush stroke lacking. The Architect will not desert his building with one stone missing. The divine purpose, will, pleasure and design, will be accomplished. It will become Reality.

Does God will the fulfillment of law? “Do not suppose that I have come to abolish the law and the prophets; I did not come to abolish but to complete, I tell you this: so long as heaven and earth endure, not a letter, not a stroke, will disappear from the Law until all that must happen has happened” (Matthew 5:17, 18). Ponder that last statement. “All that must happen has happened.” This is the divine imperative. What must be done will be done.

Does God will the birth of a nation? “Shall a nation be born in one day . . . Shall I bring to the birth and not cause to bring forth? says the Lord; shall I, who cause to bring forth, shut the womb? says your God” (Isaiah 66:9). What does this mean? It simply means that God allows no abortion of his plans. There will be no miscarriage of his ultimate design.

Does God will eternal joy for the faithful? “Of one thing I am certain; the One who started the good work in you will bring it to completion by the day of the Lord Jesus” (Phil. 1:6). The One who started will bring it to completion. This is the divine imperative.

When someone, filled with doubt or dismay, asks me if we shall ever have unity in Christ, my reply is also in question form. Is unity in Christ the purpose of God? Is it God’s will? Is it God’s pleasure? Is it God’s design? Then we shall have it. The good work has already started and the One who started it will bring it to completion. The devil cannot stop it. The demons cannot do so. Even the brethren cannot do so, although some are frantically trying to do it, under the mistaken notion that the best way to work for God’s purpose is by thwarting it, and the way to please him is to work contrary to his pleasure.

Then how shall we be saved from our division and disunity? Of course, this is the Lord’s work through his Spirit and I am hesitant to suggest a “how” as if I would limit the Holy Spirit. History is rife with examples of those who drew up a well defined code of how God was going to act, or must act, and when he did not follow their code they rebelled against God. Most of them quoted Scripture to prove that God would act in a certain way, but he that sat in the heavens “laughed at them.” I do not want God laughing at me. I would prefer that he smiled upon me.

It is hardly so presumptuous for me to tell you how I think we will not be saved from our disunity. I do not think unity can be achieved by creeds, concordats or conventions. If a national convention were to be called to convene at Indianapolis, Cincinnati, or Nashville, for purpose of drawing up an agreement to structure our unity I would be conspicuous by my absence. I will not attend a national debate to argue ourselves into oneness, or a national convention to try and agree ourselves into unity.

These are the horses and chariots of modern Egypt in which the modern Israel of God trusts. We will not be delivered from our bondage of corruption, expressed in disunity, by such means. “But I will have pity on the house of Judah and I will deliver them by the Lord their God; I will not deliver them by bow, nor by sword, nor by war, nor by horses, nor by horsemen” (Hosea 1:7). I do not anticipate victory from convention chariots nor from forensic horsemen. “Some boast of chariots and some of horses, but we boast of the name of our God” (Psalm 20:7). “This is the word of the Lord to Zerubbabel: Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit says the Lord of hosts” (Zech. 4:6).

The unity we seek is the unity of the Spirit. It is produced by the Spirit. There is every evidence that the Spirit is very active in the hearts of many who sigh and cry for Jerusalem in our day. Attitudes are changing all over the earth. This is true among our brethren. The heirs of the restoration movement stand upon the threshold of their greatest witness for Jesus since the first division descended as a curse upon us almost a century ago. In this forum we meet in love and in a sense of brotherhood which transcends all of our unfortunate differences. On this program are men from Churches of Christ with four different original factional backgrounds. Here is a man from the Disciples of Christ and one from the Independent Christian Churches. We meet in this building where no instrument is used by invitation of the saints who worship here regularly, and we listen to one another and question one another. We pray together and sometimes we weep together!

This is not an isolated phenomenon. On many mission fields brethren are now able to congregate and strengthen each other in the one faith. Some of them can meet together in Africa and South America who could not do so at home. But in every section of our own great land there is a thawing and melting of men's hearts under the warmth of the genial rays of the Spirit. Of course there are still areas of bitter isolationism, sections where cold orthodoxy still prevails. The snow does not melt as quickly in the shadows. But the prophets of the party spirit are lifting up their cries at the altars of their gods with lessening influence. The Holy Spirit is working in hearts that have grown tired of conversion by cliché and devotion by dogma.

Unity is coming! Lift up your heads. Breathe the fresh winds of freedom that are blowing across the river of life. Unity in Christ—the purpose of God, the will of God, the pleasure of God, the design of God. “He has made known to us his hidden purpose . . . namely, that the universe, all in heaven and on earth, might be brought into a unity in Christ.” Unity must come! Unity will come! Unity is coming!

And fierce though the fiends may fight,

And long though the angels hide,

I know that Truth and Right,

Have the universe on their side;

And that somewhere beyond the stars.

Is a Love that is better than fate;

When the night unlocks her bars

I shall see Him, and I will wait.

Divisive Party Loyalties

An Address Delivered at the Seventh Consultation on the Internal Unity of Christian Churches, Enid, Oklahoma, March 1

The party spirit is a work of the flesh, an activity of the lower nature. It is so designated by the apostle Paul in Galatians 5:20. In that context it is associated with moral impurity and indecency, with idolatry and sorcery, and with drunkenness, orgies and things of like nature. It is distinctly said that those who behave in such ways will never inherit the kingdom of God. The saint has a clear choice between the Holy Spirit and the party spirit, between intolerance and inheritance. He cannot have both. That which is grave enough to exclude from glory deserves our consideration lest through ignorance we forfeit our share of the heritage.

Why is the party spirit, or sectarian attitude, so heinous that it must stand before the judgment bar of God in the company of word felons of vice and depravity? Of what infamy is factionalism guilty that its presence will slam the door in the face of one under its influence? In this brief presentation I hope to suggest to you some of my very serious and sincere feelings as to why the Holy Spirit offers this stern indictment of a sin which is all too often condoned by us rather than being condemned among us.

Strangely enough, among the Greeks the original term had no evil connotation. Nor did it have an inherently bad reputation when used in a Judaistic framework in the gospel records. It is only when we come to the letters addressed to the communities of the ransomed ones that it becomes a word of obliquity and is never again used by a sacred writer except with demerit and disapprobation. We must look for the offense involved, not in the nature of the word, but in the nature of the community planted by Jesus on the bedrock fact of his own Messiahship and Sonship. Our question is not what there is about the term that is vicious, but what there is about the Way of life which makes the attitude expressed by the term so unseemly and improper.

Nothing else is more emphatically taught by Paul than the singularity and uniqueness of the body created by God with Jesus as head and those who are incorporate with him as members. On this point there is no room for doubt or disputation. "There is one body and one Spirit, as there is also one hope held out in God's call to you; one Lord, one faith, one baptism; one God and Father of all, who is over all and through all and in you all" (Ephesians 4:4-6). "For just as in a single human body there are many limbs and organs, all with different functions, so all of us, united with Christ, form one body, serving individually as limbs and organs to one another" (Romans 12:4, 5).

There are two enabling ordinances provided by divine wisdom. Both are directly related to this oneness. The first of these is initiatory and introductory. It furnishes entrance to the one body, and thus is enacted but once. The second is repetitive and continual, serving to exhibit to the world that unity into which we were born. The first is baptism, and I read, "For indeed we were all brought into one body by baptism, in the one Spirit, whether we are Jews or Greeks, whether slaves or free men, and that one Holy Spirit was poured out for all of us to drink" (1 Corinthians 12:13). The second is the Lord's Supper and I read, "When we bless 'the cup of blessing,' is it not a means of sharing in the blood of Christ? Because there is one loaf, we, many as we are, are one body; for it is one loaf of which we all partake” (1 Cor. 10:16, 17).

Now we are ready to enunciate a principle which must be corollary to the truths which we have read in the new covenant scriptures. Since it was the divine purpose and will to gather all of the called ones into one body, and through that one body to exhibit the unity of all things in heaven and on earth, any action taken or spirit manifested by the called out ones, which indicates or implies that the body is not a unit, is in direct contravention of the divine purpose and can be maintained only in opposition to the divine will. Factionalism is a rebellion against heaven, a revolt of the citizens against the will of their King. The division and splintering of the family of God into rival tribes and clashing clans is a sin of such deep dye as to forfeit the heritage of heaven for the factionalist.

It is here that the Arch-deceiver does his most deadly damage. With his cleverness and cunning he convinces us that we exhibit loyalty to the Father by separating from his other children. Every sect in the Christian spectrum was born of pure motivation. Every party was produced with the announced purpose of preserving truth. The fallacy lies in the fact that we have not been raised up to save the truth, but the truth has been sent down to save us. Truth existed before we were born; it will still be here after we are dead. It will not perish with us and may actually thrive more because of our funerals. Truth can no more be confined behind our little partisan walls than new wine can be contained in old skins which have lost their elasticity. You might as well try to can up the atmosphere as to bottle up universal truth.

But now I trust that you will allow me to present to you some of the reasons why I think that the party spirit is so heinous in the eyes of God.

1. It supplants the cross of Christ as the magnetic force which makes unity possible, and substitutes something else as the center around which men must rally to be considered worthy. Jesus said, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." The sect is willing to exalt something else in order to draw some men unto it. Our union is created by the blood of Jesus. We are blood brothers— his blood, not ours. "But now in union with Christ Jesus you who once were far off have been brought near through the shedding of Christ's blood" (Ephesians 4:13). The party separates and ties men off from the rest of the body and it must be sustained as an artificial growth, and kept alive by intravenous feeding of factional pap, and regular injection of the prescribed partisan plasma.

"This was his purpose, to reconcile the two in a single body to God through the cross, on which he killed the enmity" (Ephesians 2:16). The cross was God's chosen reconciling medium. It accomplished its purpose by welding two into a single body. It produced fusion where fission had existed. Mark it down that whenever and wherever a single body is divided into two, the enmity has not been killed. Something has become more important than the cross. Retaliation supplants reconciliation. Every faction among us today bears testimony to the frightened, trembling world that we pay lipservice to the cross while giving our lifeservice to the sect. We have forgotten the "cross purpose" of God and we are now at cross-purposes with each other.

2. The party spirit reduces the majestic ordinances of God to mere factional rituals. Baptism is regarded as initiation into the party. It is a little like assuming that one who is born in the maternity ward of St. Joseph's Hospital, does not thereby become a member of the human family, but belongs to the hospital. Yet in all my experience I have never yet heard of one who applied for work in a hospital where he had not been delivered, being required by the personnel manager to enter the second time into his mother's womb and be born again in their own loyal maternity division— and I do mean division! In its final analysis what this kind of thing means is that one is saved by the grace of the party and not by the grace of God at all.

No one was ever, by the Holy Spirit, baptized into the Methodist party, the Baptist party, or the Presbyterian party. Nor has any person, by that same Spirit, been baptized into the Disciples of Christ party, the Christian Church party, or any of the Church of Christ parties. If we are baptized at all under the influence of the Spirit we are all baptized into one body. The baptism authorized by the Holy Spirit is a key which fits no sectarian gate or creedal lock. The partisan administrator who baptizes a sincere believer in Jesus is like a blind obstetrician who can deliver the baby but cannot envision the great world into which he introduces the child. He is like a nearsighted shepherd who thinks that he is opening the gate into his own corral when he is letting down the bars into the Lord's abundant pasture.

The table of the Lord can never be made a factional weapon of discipline without destroying the one who wields the weapon. The congregation at Corinth was fractured into four sects composed of the Cephasites, the Paulites, the Apollosites, and the Christites. These gathered in their little cliques to eat the love feast with each selfish clan separated and segregated from the rest. In such a state of affairs they could not eat the Lord's Supper because it was a fellowship of the body and blood of the Lord, portraying the one body by their joint participation in it. The apostle wrote, "To begin with, I am told that when you meet as a congregation you fall into sharply divided groups . . . The result, is that when you meet as a congregation, it is impossible for you to eat the Lord's Supper."

I do not gather from this that the various factions did not physically eat bread and drink the fruit of the vine. The indication is exactly opposite to any such conclusion. I have little doubt that each sect, in its exclusiveness, blessed the cup and broke the bread. But there is no spiritual significance attached to the mere physical act of eating and drinking aside from the divine purpose and motivation. So the record says, "It follows that anyone who eats the bread or drinks the cup of the Lord unworthily will be guilty of desecrating the body and blood of the Lord." What does "unworthily" mean? In this case, by the context, it means to regard the body of Jesus as having been killed for a faction, and the blood as having purchased only a part of the saints. To so reason is to desecrate the body and blood of the Lord. Jesus died for the whole company of the saints. He is the head of the entire body, the Shepherd of all the sheep, the Captain of all the enlisted men, the King of all his subjects.

In view of this, one should scrutinize his inner consciousness before participating in the Supper to determine if he is doing so as a branch of the vine or as a splinter of a sliver. There is a difference between being a stone in the temple and a rock in a lean-to. "A man must test himself before eating his share of the bread and drinking from the cup. For he who eats and drinks eats and drinks judgment on himself if he does not discern the Body." Let me here commend C. H. Dodd and his fellowlaborers in production of the New English Bible New Testament, for capitalizing the word "Body." I once thought to "discern the Lord's body" meant to see mentally an image of the physical body of Jesus when the bread was passed, to have an inner vision of the scene at Golgotha while you ate. Now I know better.

The body we are to discern at the Supper is not the body writhing and dying in the agony of the crucifixion. It is the whole body composed of every believer who has been made a part of the new creation. It is the one body. If I separate and segregate myself in self-righteous partisan pride, and regard as my brothers only those who side with me in some point of controversy, I drink damnation to myself when I touch the cup to my lips for I desecrate the blood which freely cleanses us all.

If I slam a partisan gate to exclude God's other children I shut myself in. The others are still free. It is those who build walls around themselves who are in prison. Paul said of the meeting of those who were bigoted and intolerant partisans, "Your meetings do more harm than good" (1 Corinthians 11:17). The party spirit is frightening in its consequences because it transforms the sacred ordinances into spiritual pork-barrel projects to be administered in the behalf of their constituents at the whim of political theologians.

3. The party spirit is reprehensible because it captivates our hearts which should be the sacred citadels of the Holy Spirit, and causes us to drive out the best Friend we ever had, or shall ever have, in the mistaken notion that we thus prove our fidelity to the cause of righteousness. Our relationship to God is not conditioned upon our being right about a number of things. If it were so, we would be saved by knowledge rather than by faith, and our hope of heaven would depend upon our intelligence quotient rather than upon our love for the Father and his love for us.

When I build a party around the pro or con of any opinion, view or interpretation, and demand allegiance to it as a test of loyalty to Jesus, I have substituted human judgment for divine will as a criterion. There is nothing wrong in having an opinion. There is nothing wrong in holding or expressing an opinion. Sin lies not in discussion of opinions but in division over them. Unity in Christ does not depend upon conformity in views. It does not demand that we all meet in the same building or do everything in identical fashion. A family is not divided when some of the children become married and live in their own homes. We are not seeking geographical proximity but spiritual affinity. It is essential that we grant recognition to all of God's children as our brothers. Division occurs when we conclude that we are God's children by brain instead of by birth, by grasp instead of by grace.

The party spirit proposes and promotes tests of fellowship which demand that one be something else before he can be a Christian. This has been true since the very days of the primitive community of the sanctified ones. The Jewish element sought to bind circumcision upon the Gentiles who believed in Jesus. It was their contention that one must become a Jew before he could be in Christ. The sin of schism growing out of this unwarranted attitude was the first recorded error to threaten the body with disruption. Ananias and Sapphira operated only to their own destruction, but the schismatics who came down from Jerusalem threatened the very congregation at Antioch with their legalism. "Unless you are circumcised according to the law of Moses you cannot be saved."

The kingdom of heaven has been riddled with these "unless you are." Unless you are willing to do this or that, or unless you are willing to give up or divest yourself of one thing or another, you cannot be saved. This removes salvation and justification from the realm of trust in Jesus as proclaimed by God and places them in the domain of the "unless you are" pronounced by men. But these have no avail in Christ. "For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but faith which worketh by love." There was really nothing wrong with being circumcised provided that one did not regard it as meritorious or essential to salvation, or bind it upon others as essential to their proper standing with God.

When the dogmatic "Unless you are . . . you cannot be" was applied to salvation it virtually repealed the divine principle of justification, destroyed the bond of Christian union, and dethroned Jesus from his position of authority. It meant that faith in Jesus was not sufficient, but one must correctly pronounce the partisan shibboleth as bound by those who controlled the faction. It was not enough to be a Christian but one must also pledge himself to be a sectarian. He must be recognized by the official badge of the clan or the password of the exclusive fraternity rather than by the demonstration of love for others which Jesus said would be the criterion by which all men should recognize discipleship.

After the garment has been cleansed by the blood of Jesus, and become “the fine linen white and clean which is the righteousness of the saints,” it must again be dipped in the party colors which constitute the distinctive uniform of the school or sect, so that all will know what kind of a Christian the wearer is. He must be a Christian-and something else! And that “something else” means more to a sectarian than being a Christian. It is for this reason that I have resolved never to make anything a test of fellowship which God has not made a condition of salvation. If you are good enough for God to receive you are not too bad for me to accept. If he welcomes you with open arms it ill becomes me to approach you with a closed heart.

You have been courteous and amiable in inviting me to share with you in this consultation. My vocabulary is too meager and sparse to express my deep feeling of appreciation for your fraternal welcome. And you have every right to question what my future will be insofar as attitude and disposition are concerned. And inasmuch as I have availed myself of your hospitality you have a right to query me as to how I propose to implement the things I have suggested here and in my writings. You are aware that I have grown up within that segment of the disciple brotherhood where opposition is voiced to the employment of mechanical instruments in rendering our corporate praise unto God. Once I was member of an anti-instrument party. At that time I judged your relationship to God by my understanding of this matter. In those days if you had been big enough to invite me to such a meeting I would have been too little to come.

I thank the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ who through the Spirit has purged my heart of such an unlovely, unspiritual and uncharitable disposition. I am ashamed of it! I am sorry for it! I have repented of it! I have prayed earnestly that I might now devote my life to plucking up the thorns of factionalism which I once helped to plant and sow instead the seeds of peace and tranquility among the heirs of this once great movement which began as “a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects.” I find my position as to instrumental music unaltered and unchanged. If you receive me at all in such meetings as this you will need to do so in spite of that conviction. Yet I think you may well do so, for I predict that in this age of decaying values our future problems will not lie with brethren who have diverse convictions but with those who have none. And we dare not forget that when the day comes that “anything goes” everything that is worthwhile has already gone.

I have resolved with the help of the Spirit, during my remaining days, to be simply a Christian and a Christian only. I do not intend to switch parties but I intend to renounce them all insofar as my own humble life is concerned. I can relieve the fears of those of you who may have been troubled as to what to do with me if I applied for membership with you. I am not leaving anyone; I am not going to anyone. I belong with all of you because I belong to Christ, but because I belong to Christ I belong to none of you. I shall move among all of my brothers as they allow. I shall share with them in love as they permit. I will thrust myself upon none, nor will I make myself purposely obnoxious to any. I will be cooperative among the Independents, and independent among the Cooperatives. I trust that I may be instrumental among those who are vocal in helping them see that the only instrument of our salvation is the cross of Jesus.

Of course this will not solve all of the problems. For that reason I make no demands that others order their lives as I expect to order mine. Nothing will solve all of our problems so long as we are in the flesh. I expect to be beset by the questions which occupy the minds and fill the hearts of every group which I visit. What will you do about individual cups? What will you do about Sunday Schools? What will you do about institutional orphan homes? What will you do about Herald of Truth? What will you do about instrumental music? What will you do about restructure? What will you do about merger? What will you do about the ecumenical movement? Perhaps I shall be fortunate enough to die before these are resolved and new ones are introduced. If so, I trust that it will be my good fortune to enter that home where such questions will never trouble. I am not so sure but what in the other alternative available some of the brethren may continue to debate them, knowing the interest which the president of that realm must take in some of the current discussions about them.

But what will I do about them? I am not sure that I am required to do anything about them except to keep them in proper perspective. All of these are means and methods which my brethren have devised to get where they are going, although in some instances, the prayer of the elderly colored preacher at the funeral service of one of the more reckless members of his flock may be in order— “Lawd, we hope this brother has gone where we think he ain’t.” I shall never confuse the means of locomotion which men have invented with their inventors. When brethren drive up to the meetinghouse I am not obligated to love only those who drive Fords. I shall distinguish between the men for whom Christ died and their means of transportation for which he did not die. Thus I can love both those who travel by Jaguar and jalopy-something imported, or something distorted.

Jesus did not die for plans, programs or performances. He did not give his life for machinery, movements or monuments. He died for men, sinful men, hapless, hopeless, helpless men like me. And he did not tell me what my attitude must be to the things which mean so much to men, but he did tell me what my attitude must be to the men who mean so much to him. I am not obligated to love individual cups, Sunday schools, organs, societies, agencies, unified support or direct support. But I am obligated to love my brothers— all of them! And I do love them.

You see, I did not renounce my faction for another. I renounced my factionalism. I am sick and tired of the whole sorry, sad and sordid mess. And I shall counter it with the only weapon with which I can wage effective war against it— love of my brethren. I love you all. I do not love you because of where you are any more than I love myself because of where I am. I love you because of Him in whom we are. You are all my brothers because you are his children. It is just that simple—and so am I!

The Church of God

Mission Messenger (May 1966)

[Abstract]

The Church of God referred to in the sacred scriptures is not a human organization, but a divine organism. It is not a sect nor is it composed of a combination or coalition of sects. Sects were conceived in the opinions of men; the church was created by the power of God. The church does not consist of denominations or congregations, but of individuals who have been born again. Every saved person on this earth is in it, having been called out of sin and into Christ.

We should never use the word “church” in a universal sense except to include all of God’s children in the universe, nor in a local sense to exclude any who are members of his family in the locality. To talk about “the Lord’s church” as limited to a certain party, movement or segment, is to sectarianize the expression and to reveal our ignorance. The Lord’s church embraces every one of the Lord’s people and it is true that these are not all in the same partisan corral. The flock of God is still scattered over the sectarian hills.

Parties and sects are regrettable because they divide God’s family into rival camps, but they do no more harm than for one of them, born of historical exigency, to appropriate to itself the title, “The Lord’s Church” and to arrogantly imply that those who do not belong to it do not belong to the Lord. No person on earth knows the numerical strength of the Lord’s church and no one can ascertain it. The figures of total membership that are published for the various parties only reveal which sects are increasing or decreasing. They say nothing about the growth of the Lord's church. There is no such thing as "the fastest growing church in America" for there is only one church, although sectarian parties may thrive or wane, and do.

We become members of the one body by acceptance of the great universals of the faith, we become adherents of sects by emphasizing unduly peculiarities or distinctions within the faith. That which makes one a child of God is relatively simple but to become a sectarian one must engage in mental ramifications and metaphysical speculations. One becomes a child by adoption, a partisan by deduction elevated to dogmatism. Christian stature is measured only by faith in Jesus, partisan attainment is measured by knowledge of the group requirements for fellowship.

Each new party that is spawned makes it that much more difficult to be a Christian only, and increases the probability that we will not be such. The real test of the non-partisan child of God lies in his ability to ignore all artificial walls and barriers erected by men, and to associate freely with all of his brethren. These walls are transparent when looked at through lens of love and one can walk through them if he wills to do it. Many are mere paper curtains hung by editorial usurpers who labor under the mistaken view that their journals are the official organs to publish supreme court decisions for the kingdom of the Lord.

There is no reality to these barriers since only God can give reality to anything in the divine-human relationship. They are simply mental blocks and figments of over-wrought imagination inflamed by partisan zeal. Let us cease to be confined and accept the liberty which we have in Christ. Then we can begin to answer the prayer of Jesus for the unity of all believers in Him. The time is ripe for freedom to serve one another.

The Life and the Joy

Do you know how a toothpaste tube looks when someone has flattened and pressed it in an attempt to extract from it the last quarter inch of flavored dentifrice? Or a football which has been punctured by a spike when it accidentally lands on top of the iron fence? Or a ripe tomato in the street which has just been run over by a passing garbage truck? Then you know what happens to some words when they are put through sectarian wringers and the idea-content is squeezed from them leaving them limp and flabby. This can happen to words that are rich and full, words that are plump and rounded out with meaning intended to cheer and comfort, to stimulate and encourage.

I'm thinking of such a word right now, a word which came straight from the throne of God, filled with promise and vibrant with hope. Men have taken it and pounded and pummeled it, and forced it into their little peculiarly shaped partisan moulds until it no longer shouts with the joy of heaven, but speaks with the raspy voice of theological politicians. All of the grace and glory have been mashed and ground out of it in sectarian vices and it whispers now of manipulation and maneuvering by usurpers who despise the conscience of others and play God with their fellows.

A few years ago the glorious thought exploded inside my heart with a burst of light that God really wanted me, and that he was willing to go to any length to make it possible for the two of us to be together and share with one another. When the message finally got through to me (it wasn't easy because I had been preaching so long) I could not figure out why. I still do not know. I've wrestled with the problem until I have just about decided to accept it as a fact, like I do the Milky Way or the love of my grandchildren, and wait until I can talk with Him face to face about it. Probably when that happens I'll not have to even ask Him. I have an idea that the minute I see him I'll know perfectly all that has been hidden. The most astonishing thing will be that there is no more mystery, no darkness. I'm fully aware that the word "minute" has no place in the Great Event, for there will be no measurement of time or length. I use it here merely because it hasn't happened yet!

The word about which I am thinking is connected with joy, actually with fulness of joy. There's a difference between joy as I use the term (and as the Spirit also used it), and being glad or happy about things. It is much more than laughing at good fortune, or at a clever joke, or at seeing a pompous banker slip on a banana peel. The joy of which I speak may know acute suffering from cancer, or teeth-gritting pain. It may know hardship, privation, cold, hunger, or imprisonment. I'm not so sure but what it might actually thrive better under such circumstances if they did not result from one's own indifference, indolence or criminality. I recall that the one who wrote most about it was constantly in difficulty and danger. He talked about his perils almost as much as he did joy, but the joy was what counted. The perils didn't really matter.

This was the outstanding attribute of this joy! When you had it nothing else— absolutely nothing else— really mattered. I do not like that sentence because I rather think that one did not have this joy at all. It had him! It moved in and took over and when you were in its grip you were surprised to find that your life was completely changed and transformed. It was as if another person had moved in and nudged the old "you" out and had taken possession. You couldn't really tell the difference when you looked in the mirror while shaving. There was the same scar in the eyebrow that resulted from the fall from the bicycle when you were a boy. There was the wart on the lower jaw and you still had to steer around it with the razor. Yet you had the impression that you were looking at a new person, a stranger, a calm and unperturbed stranger who probably wouldn't make a lot of mistakes such as you had made, or if he did make them would know Who to go to about them. And there was joy, unmistakable, unmitigated, genuine joy in knowing that Who.

The joy (sometimes I think it ought to be spelled with a capital "J," it is so personal) may come and identify itself, and move in and take possession, under all kinds of varied circumstances. No two of us are alike. No two of us have identical experiences in the same event. Even if we are sitting in the front seat of a car which starts to skid and goes out of control and rolls over down an embankment, our reactions are different. That is why, if we live, each of us must recount it for himself. And each of us gets bored with the other's account. We can be in the same place and go through the same experience, and still it is not the same at all. Joy— the joy— comes only to you as it comes to you!

You are sitting with head bowed and scalding tears running down your cheeks, almost oblivious of those around you as you think of the loved one lying cold and stiff in the sepulcher. You are bowed in grief at the thought that the eyes which once looked at you with love are sightless. Death has blown out the candle and pulled down the shades. The light that once gleamed through the soul's windows is extinguished. You are left lonely and in the dark. Then you feel a hand touching your shoulder and a voice whispers in your ear, "The Master has come and calleth for thee," and you arise and go to Him, and he speaks just to you, "I am the resurrection and the life. He that liveth and believeth in me shall never die!" Joy!

You are on the sea in a small boat, and darkness has fallen swiftly and silently, as the moon and stars are blotted out by the ominous clouds. The wind ceases to moan and begins to shriek through the rigging. The waves increase in height and you are tossed from side to side, fighting to keep your balance and knowing that this time the fight is vain. Then you see Him coming, walking as calmly as if he were in a quiet country lane. The towering waves which seemed so frightening, rush toward him and become like frolicking puppies playing about His feet! Joy!

It isn't always that He comes. Sometimes you have to go. He has come often and you laughed at the thought that He could give you anything you needed or wanted. You had everything. And you thought you had joy. Then you awaken one morning with a bursting head and a thick dark brown taste in your mouth. The room is untidy. The empty bottle is turned over on the night table. Cigarette ashes bestrew the floor. You have a momentary thought between the throbbing splitting pains that the place looks like the pigpen down on the farm when you were a boy. You think of the old place again sheltered under the large maples. You think of the neat room you shared with your older brother. And then you think of yourself— of the parties, the flasks, the tantalizing women, the sordid apartments, the stale smoke, the taunting, haunting mockery of sex. You cannot believe that it is you— you who once bowed your innocent head while your father offered thanks at the breakfast table, you who took your little lunchbox from mother's hand and walked to the road to wait for the schoolbus, turning to wave to the figure in the door as you boarded it.

Of a sudden you feel dirty, loathsome, foul. You lie back down on the rumpled bed and start shaking, crying, sobbing, with uncontrollable grief. You remember what you said when you left three years ago, "Give me my share. I'm getting out of this dump!" What a fool! All of a sudden it bursts in upon you what you should do. Why didn't you think of it before? It is so simple. “I’ll arise and go to my father and say, I’m no longer worthy. I’m not asking for anything. Really I’m not. I’ll be a servant. I just want to come home, that’s all, just come home!” And you get up and begin getting ready to go. As you walk toward the shower you find yourself humming a tune. What are the words? It’s been years since you heard them. Ah, there they are. “Just as I am, without one plea, but that thy blood was shed for me!” Joy!

In every instance joy is associated with being with someone, or with the prospect of it. It is having someone share your grief, not merely cry with you. There’s a difference. It is having someone share your danger, someone who can do something about it. It is the prospect of being under the same roof with those you love, sharing at the table, sharing in the pleasantries and small talk, sharing in the intimacies of the family. It is association, but it is more than that. It is belonging!

And now we come to that word to which I alluded when I began this article, the word that has been crushed and cramped and strangled by sectarians and schismatics, until now it is more frequently associated with narrowness and littleness than with joy—the joy! The Christian Pharisees have squeezed the life out of it. Remember that expression. It is very vital. The word has had the life choked out of it. And when the life went the joy fled with it.

The Greeks spelled it koinonia. The English call it fellowship. It means “sharing,” but do not jump to conclusions. It does not refer to the mere sharing of things, tangible or intangible. It is not simply sharing your lunch, or your car, or your ideas, with someone else. Koinonia is the sharing of a common life. Whatever creates that common life creates fellowship, for fellowship is that life! When we come into that state of life with God, joy overtakes us, captures us, enters into us and radiates through us. That is what God’s word says and I believe it! And ever since I began to believe it I have been a willing captive. Thank God for fellowship! Thank God for joy!

The apostle of radiant love, John, in his first epistle writes about the wonderful word of life and the life of the wonderful Word. He declares that “this life was made visible; we have seen it and bear our testimony.” He identifies the life. “We here declare to you the eternal life which dwelt with the Father and was made visible to us.” You must distinguish between the word of life which was made visible and the words which John writes in description of that life. The word of life dwelt with the Father from the beginning.

There is a difference between a person and the testimony of another about that person. An individual is never the same as a declaration about him. We will become guilty of a tragic error if we equate the apostolic account with the word of life. It would be like mistaking a history book for George Washington, or a cookbook for a cake. John says, “What we have seen and heard we declare to you, so that you and we together may share in a common life, that life which we share with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ. And we write this in order that the joy of us all may be complete” (1 John 1:3, 4).

It takes five words— “share in a common life”— to translate the one word koinonia. Fellowship is sharing in a common life. The common life is “that life which we share with the Father and with his Son.” The purpose of John’s writing was not to give life but to inform us that we had it so we could be wholly surrendered to joy. “This letter is to assure you that you have eternal life. It is addressed to those who give their allegiance to the Son of God” (5:13). Koinonia is a glorious sharing of life with the Father and Son, and with all others who have that life. It is a thrilling, overwhelming entering into all that is involved in being related to the Father, that is, in being one of His children. Whatever makes us a child of God brings us into the fellowship, into the life we share with the Father.

It at once becomes obvious that it is silly to talk about this fellowship as something we can extend or withdraw. It is quite as absurd and asinine to think of it as merely a mutual relationship to things. Fellowship is not, for example, allowing someone to share in the use of your lawnmower. “Yes, you may use my mower but if you do not treat it with proper concern I’ll withdraw your privilege.” Fellowship is related to life and it hardly seems quite as rational for a mother to say, “Yes, I bore you into this world and if you do not behave as you ought to do, I’ll withdraw you and put you back where you came from.” One cannot even put a living chicken back into an egg. How can he think of putting a child of God out of the divine family.

The expression “withdraw fellowship” is not in the Bible and for a very good reason. Fellowship is a state created by God. One enters it by the new birth exactly as he begins to share in the family life by his original birth. Anything which men can extend or withdraw is probably not too important spiritually, and could be merely the result of human whim or caprice. One does not enter life by vote of his fellows, and as long as he is living with joy) whether they recognize him or not, does not necessarily affect either his origin, destiny or wellbeing.

All history attests that generally those who have been put out of synagogues are the purest and best, far better than those who remained. Heretics are simply heroes ahead of their time. Saints are “cannoneered” in one generation and canonized in the next. The monuments we behold above the bodies are frequently made of the same stones hurled at them by our fathers.

To be excluded by the smug and self-righteous who consider themselves the favorites of God and the pets of heaven, may actually be the best thing that can happen to a genuinely spiritual person. If a plant starts growing until it fills the solarium it will always be stunted at that level unless it has the good fortune to be placed (or thrown out) in the yard where heaven becomes the limit of height.

Of course this is not intended to offer comfort to cranks and eccentrics who suffer from a martyr complex and exert every effort to make their presence a bore so they will be evicted and can complain of mistreatment and persecution of “pseudo-saints.” This is often a case of the pot and kettle calling attention to the darkened condition of each other. Most of us will be difficult enough to get along with at best and we will gain little by specializing in the art, or making a science out of it. We should heed the admonition to “aspire above all to excel in those gifts which build up the church” (1 Cor. 14:12).

To “share in a common life” does not mean that all participants will have the same degree of knowledge or understanding because then we could never be in the fellowship with the Father and Son. It does not demand that all be equally perfect. Those who predicate fellowship upon conformity or mutual attainment seal their own doom. The basis upon which they grant recognition to others will force God to withhold it from them. There are some fairly ignorant people in fellowship with the Christ, and some people in Christ who are fairly ignorant about fellowship. We should be generous in receiving others, knowing as we do what God has had to endure in order to let us “share in the common life.”

Those factions and parties which have pressed the life out of the sharing always suffer from the same delusion. They think that by an act of providence they have been allowed to find the key to the mystery of divine affection and because of their use of it have become the chosen people. They have the right combination, they have stumbled upon the secret code. Standing with God depends upon being correct about the one thing that really counts. That one thing differs with each party. That is why there are so many of them! It’s a little like a jigsaw puzzle. You can never see what it looks like because every one has his own part, and all stubbornly refuse to lay theirs down until every one else does first. In some cases there are those who think they have the whole puzzle. To them the kingdom of heaven for which Jesus died and over which he resigns is a very small territory.

Sometimes the partisan test relates to what you are for. More frequently it has to do with what you are against. A man is not loyal because he loves Jesus with all his heart and seeks to surrender wholly and unreservedly to him. He must also have the right quirk to be recognized by other members of the family. He cannot be saved by grace through faith. He must have something else, something of his own, if he is admitted to the inner circle and allowed to participate in the party conclaves. It is not sufficient to love the Lord your God with all your heart, soul, mind and strength, and to love your neighbor as yourself, to pray without ceasing and to bestow all of your goods to feed the poor in deep love and affection. You are still a “brother in error” unless you can parrot the party line and give the right answer when asked for the password. Then you are no longer in “error” for to be in error means to be in Christ with all of your heart, but without the identity card certified by the “powers that be” to whom every soul must also be subject. You must not only know the Savior of all men but the shibboleth of some men, for to be right is to be endorsed by the right people!

The sad thing about all of this is that it leaves the devotees of the party always hungry, emaciated and starving. And they are like all who are hungry with a gnawing at their vitals—snappish, quick-tempered, ready to take offence. They crave something but they cannot define it. Like a sick man who dreams of some tantalizing food which he cannot describe) they realize that despite all of their protestations of loyalty their lives are vapid, vacuous and vain.

They must be always alert that they do not walk into a trap. They must be fearful, frightened, suspicious of their brethren who make overtures of goodwill. They must never associate with one of another party enough that they get to liking him. When they demonstrate some growing sense of true bigness of spirit they must always go back and cover their tracks, like a fleeing criminal or fugitive from justice who scatters pepper along his trail to elude the bloodhounds. For the hounds of the heretic detectors bay relentlessly at the heels of all who seek to escape from the shackles of the schismatics. And it is not pleasant to be torn and ripped to bits in bloody jaws before you reach the higher ground, when your longing eyes see the hills of freedom beckoning. It is especially ironic when the hounds are the ones you trained yourself to overtake others who once sought to escape.

I can tell you what is lacking in the lives of all of these. No partisan, no sectarian, no factionalist, no front man for any cult on earth, can have it in its fulness. It is joy— the joy! And it comes from sharing the common life with the Father, the Son, and all of the saints. To think you can experience this by being a member of a faction with its artificial, arbitrary, authoritarian tests of fellowship, loyalty and faithfulness, is like trying to dip the ocean dry with a thimble or drink the water of life from a sieve. To the extent that you make fellowship a relationship to things you squeeze the life out of it. Then it is no longer the life but the things you hold in common. And the party becomes a corpse with a necklace clutched in fingers stiffened by rigor mortis. You may have the form but the power is gone. It is like a woman who cannot find a husband and marries a wooden cigar store Indian! He will take up as much space in the living-room as a real man, but there's no life— and no joy!

To all who have been feeding upon the dried and shriveled husks of partisan antagonism, whose lives have been circumscribed and throttled by the party spirit instead of enriched and ennobled by the Holy Spirit, whose only associates are those who agree, whose only companions are those who conform, we issue an invitation to join the whole family of God and share in the reunion of all of the saints. Do not forget that those who band together because they share in the same knowledge actually stay together because they share in the same ignorance.

Break the lock on the party door which keeps you confined to your little room and move out into the Great Hall with the rest of the family. Free yourself from the uncommon life and start sharing in the common life. Fill your spiritual lungs with the tingling air of fellowship in Christ and see what happens as your heart beats faster and you fill up with joy! Not the false joy that things bring but the real joy the Savior shares. Joy! The Joy!

The Supreme Court

Mission Messenger (June 1966)

[Abstract]

Any communication whether divine or human, must be interpreted to be understood. The constitution of the United States creates a series of courts, culminated by a Supreme Court as the court of final appeals, and empowers these to be the authoritative interpreters of the intent and meaning of the law. What court can sit in judgment to determine the meaning of the revealed will of God and enforce sanctions upon those who do not concur in the ruling and refuse on the basis of conscience to subject themselves to it? Perhaps no other question in the long, and sometimes sordid, history of Christendom has been fraught with graver consequences than this. We propose to approach it by setting forth a number of propositions in sequence to which we invite the attention of our readers.

1. It is impossible to transfer an idea directly from one mind to another without a medium of communication recognized and accepted by both.

2. The most common and effective means of communication utilized by man consists of language.

3. Language employs words as the symbols of ideas, and all words act as bridges upon which ideas cross from one mind to another.

4. Words may be either spoken or written. The first medium makes use of certain sounds and the second of certain characters to which definite values are attached.

5. The receiving mind must accept and evaluate the language of the conveying mind and honestly weigh it to deduce from it exactly that which the other seeks to convey. This is interpretation.

Revelation of God

6. Revelation is the uncovering of the thoughts in the divine mind and the making of them available to the thought processes of the human mind. Interpretation is the application of those processes to the communication in an attempt to determine what is meant. Revelation is what God said; interpretation is what we think he meant by what he said.

7. Since the word of God was to be of universal application and benefit, and not limited to scholastics or philosophers, it was revealed in the common language of universal currency in its day.

8. Our problem of interpretation is augmented by our remoteness in time, place and circumstance from its original presentation.

9. Since the message was conveyed in the language of the day and its connotation was the same as that involved in the common affairs of life, the word of God must be interpreted by the same rules as govern the interpretation and understanding of any other literature of that day and place.

10. The deductions from the sacred writings made under such conditions and circumstances may fairly be called the doctrine of divine revelation.

Interpretation of Scripture

11. For all practical purposes it is not the constitution but the interpretation placed upon it which becomes the functioning and governing law. Men will act in accordance with what they determine is implied in the law.

12. A careful study of the divine revelation will demonstrate that God has authorized no official interpreter or official interpretation of that revelation.

13. The nature of the church must be correctly understood or we will use the body to defeat the purpose of the head. We believe that there are at least three false concepts of the nature of the church which have helped to thwart the divine plan of the ages. These are as follows:

(A) The church is a monolithic structure with a universal authoritarian head who is recognized as the official interpreter of the will of God.

(B) The church is a guardian of orthodoxy with traditional views and interpretations expressed in a written or unwritten creed recognized as the norm or pattern and identified with the one faith. This sets up an official interpretation. In the episcopal form enforcement is upon a diocesan level through bishops. In the congregational form, elders or other local officials are invested with authority to interpret, define and decree what shall be recognized as the official doctrines or dogmas and no dissent or appeal from their decision can be made.

(C) The church is purely a social agency with interest primarily directed toward alleviation of physical or temporal distress, and the changing of climate and environment. Under such arrangement the revelation from God is interpreted pragmatically, that is, whatever works to achieve the desired end, or seems to do so, is considered to be the will of God for the age. Whereas the first two abrogate freedom, the third advocates license in interpretation.

14. We hold that the church is an organism and not an organization, and that it is not composed of sects, denominations or parties, but of individuals who are joined by the Holy Spirit unto Christ as the head. These comprise a unit or unity because they are joined to the head. Their unity is found in him. But they are born into the relationship as individuals, they continue to be responsible and will eventually be judged as individuals. No one can impose his interpretation upon others. The supreme court is the individual conscience, enlightened by an honest and unprejudiced investigation of the truth. For this reason, and to ensure justice, we will be judged by the law with which we judge others. This provides a restraint against all undue stringency.

15. By the same token anarchy will be avoided because each person is restricted in exercise of liberty by the conscience of his brother (1 Corinthians 8:7-13; Romans 14:7-20). No one can be coerced into doing a thing as God's will further than he can see and understand it to be God's will. This holds forth no hope for those who deliberately rebel against God's will, but it provides for men to continue in the fellowship while they seek to grow in grace and knowledge of the truth.

Approach to Authority

Mission Messenger (July 1966)

Seldom indeed is a thinker in the theological realm able to divest himself of all concern for the immediate segment of that sphere with which he is more directly affiliated. We survey the world through a porthole rather than from the lofty summit of a mountain and while we may see afar we can never denude ourselves of the environment which limits the sweep of our vision. Perhaps it is best this way for it creates a sense of dependence upon each other if any of us is ever to gain a knowledge of the whole spectrum. We must rely upon the testimony of others who are also looking through their portholes.

Our situation or station is created by many factors. Not all are by voluntary choice directed toward a planned position. Many attitudes are the result of a fortuitous concourse of events which tend to shape our destinies in ways of which we do not dream. Thus we can never divorce ourselves from the history which reveals the origin and unfolding of the movements with which we are allied. This fact alone provides a sufficient ground for directing our attention to the current status of a restoration movement which received its greatest impetus in the early part of the preceding century under the brilliant leadership of such men as Thomas and Alexander Campbell.

This movement grew in response to the need for a solution of the problem of increasing schism and division within the ranks of the army of believers in Jesus. It was described as “a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects.” Today it is one of the most divided movements on the American religious scene. From the date of its first division it lost its potency as a unitive force. From that day forward a dubious world would ask how those who could not stay together could expect to bring all others together. It is obvious that the heirs of this movement must solve the problem of division among themselves or forfeit any significant role in the unfolding drama of unity discussion.

To reach a solution to the problem these heirs must go back to the initial division and heal this primary breach. Until this is done the movement will remain divided. The division cannot be healed by simply patching up later rents in each segment while ignoring the fact that these segments are themselves indications of a major disruption. Such a course would be symptomatic of the sectarian spirit. Yet it must be admitted that this latter has been the only approach to which the divergent groups have given their unstinted efforts and energy.

The several parties have employed only one type of confrontation in the past— partisan debate— in which the main objective was not to produce peace but to defend as wholly justifiable the positions of the respective factions. Every scripture related to these positions has been examined and a great many which have not the remotest bearing on the issues have been wrested and twisted from their context by forensic champions whose aim was victory rather than virtue. It is apparent that what is needed is a bold new approach to the problem which places relationship in Jesus above every thing which creates a tension or strain upon that relationship. Such an approach will permit a candid examination of all facets of the problem, divested of hereditary and traditional emotionalism. It will preserve a sense of brotherhood regardless of the circumstances which affect the brethren.

Such an approach will avoid the use of outgrown and worn cliches and slogans. It will not expect to arrive at a solution by over-simplification. These methods have been tried for a century without effect except for encouraging partisan rivalry. Rather, it will seek by depth and penetration to analyze and understand the motivations of all, while constantly refusing to think of any one fragment or splinter as the one body to the exclusion of others. It is in this spirit we propose to make certain suggestions to all of our brothers in the restoration movement leading to a re-examination of certain traditional attitudes and assumptions in the hope that we can inaugurate steps leading toward our mutual goal of "peace on earth to men of goodwill."

There are now many facets to our problem but in the mind of the average member these are all an outgrowth of an original attitude toward instrumental music employed in public corporate expressions of praise to God. This is exhibited in the tendency to distinguish between our major groups as "instrument brethren" and "anti-instrument brethren." It is seen in the tracts and other documents of the latter who make a capella singing a mark of identity of the "true church." It is observable on sign boards along public highways which use parentheses under the title "Church of Christ" to enclose the modifying term "Vocal Music."

No one can deal with our divisiveness in the restoration movement without facing up to this issue sooner or later. Yet to do so hurls one into the thick of an emotional turmoil in which any genuine attempt at pacification generally results in the would-be peacemaker suffering attack from all sides. The reason for this is obvious. The instrument has become a symbol for a great many invisible feelings, including subconscious fears, frustrations and animosities on the one hand; and freedom, assertiveness and aggressiveness upon the other. It is the tangible token of certain intangible evils or values.

To one group it is a mark of apostasy adopted in rebellion against the will of Jesus and they would as soon see Satan speaking from the platform as an organ on it; to the other group it is an insignia of liberty in Christ Jesus and they would as soon see “Old Glory” snatched rudely from the flag staff and trampled in the mire as to relinquish this emblem of victory over “reactionaries.” No doubt the careful student of human behavior can see reasons for regret that people would so closely identify a human invention with either Satan or Jesus, but we must face conditions as they are, and not as we would have them. This entails recognition of the fact that men do not always respond rationally to religious involvements.

The leaders of both sides affirm that instrumental music is not the real problem. All agree it is but an overt symptom. They disagree in their diagnosis of the underlying malady, of course, but all learnedly agree there is one. This raises the question as to why there should be so much attention given to the instrument. I suspect that it is simply because it can be seen and heard. It is visible and audible. A philosophy cannot be seen or heard in a man’s heart, and even when expressed the masses may not grasp it. But those who must have criteria for loyalty— whether seeking for signs of secularism to avoid, or symbols of security to accept— can readily see a piano, and they can flee from its presence, or bask in its nearness, and thus feel they are pleasing God by the action in which they engage, whether flight or fancy!

Sooner or later every reformer of the restoration movement must face this issue. When he does so he is generally finished insofar as effective impact is concerned. We propose to face it squarely. Do we thus invite murder or suicide for our simple effort of reform? We do not think so, and we will tell you why. It could be that we are mistaken in judgment and that our brethren in all segments will see fit to banish us to that religious Siberia where we can be marked off as a force to be reckoned with. Instead, we have high hope that our exploration of a thorny problem may encourage a sensible approach. Here are the reasons for “the hope that lieth in us,” on this issue.

1. We do not intend to engage in shallow partisan debate as a means of settling our difficulty. It is no exaggeration to say that we have read at home and abroad enough books on instrumental music to fill a twenty foot shelf. Many of these have been recorded debates. A great many were products of men within our restoration movement, but some of the best were written by Presbyterians and Primitive Baptists. We seriously doubt that any undiscovered scripture can be found to bolster a new argument either pro or con. Our hope of surviving where others have perished is by rising above the whole arena of controversy which has engaged the thought of all on both sides. If the instrument is but a symptom we shall penetrate behind the symptoms rather than fight over them.

2. We shall not allow our fellowship in Jesus to be affected by either the ongoing study or its outcome. I am a brother to all of God's children in a relationship so transcendently superior to all who compose it, or to any views, opinions or interpretations to which they cling, that I steadfastly refuse to allow it to be negated or denigrated by any interpretation of those who differ with me in Christ. I am not told how to treat instrumental music but I am told how to treat my brothers, and I shall not allow the silence of the scriptures to drown out the voice of God in my consciousness. A brother in Christ is much more important to me than any view he may hold as to vocal or instrumental music. Man was not made for music but music was made for man. I shall not destroy him for whom Christ died with my view about music.

3. The real hope lies in the spirit of our present generation. There is a revolt against the stereotyped, sterile and static attitude which characterizes all of our feuding factions. Earnest young men and women are tired of being regimented and forced into a lock-step on the partisan treadmills. There is a spirit of adventure in the air which distinguishes between loyalty to the Son of God and fidelity to the traditions of the fathers. Men are sick of the glib answers and shallow responses which they are expected to swallow simply because they once proved effective in silencing ignorant protagonists. They are weary of hearing over and over the answers to questions which no one is asking. It is time for an examination in depth of things which we have accepted without question, not always because they were part of the apostolic tradition, but sometimes because they were part of our own traditions.

Such an examination will reveal that the restoration movement did not divide over the missionary society or instrumental music when these were introduced, nor for a long time thereafter. The former was first started in 1849, and the latter was brought into a congregation in 1859. It was not until 1889 that it was first proposed that those who endorsed these and other “innovations,” should “no longer be regarded as brethren.” Even then division did not occur because those who had abandoned sects with their creedal tests were reluctant to create new parties with factional standards. Finally, agitation from both sides aroused such bitterness that the fabric of brotherhood was strained until it gave way.

Those who sought to inject instrumental music acted from various motivations. Some were anxious for the movement to progress with the cultural changes taking place as the nation passed from a frontier society to an industrial complex. Others were frightened at the thought of losing the more “respectable” members to the glamorous sects about them. Increasing numbers and wealth made possible the erection of more ornate meetinghouses and these encouraged the formulation of a ritualistic approach to worship. Feelings ran high, families were divided, neighborhood tensions increased. Men vowed that instruments would be brought in only over their dead bodies. Locks were changed on doors, and these were battered off with sledge-hammers. Conspirators met and spirited an instrument in at night under cover of darkness, the opposers entered the following night and battered the offending organ into bits with their axes.

Worshippers were given an option of worshipping with the organ or leaving the meetinghouse they had helped to build. When they went forth under this ultimatum they frequently entered civil suits to recover the property. Courtrooms were filled to overflowing with witnesses and spectators, and whatever the decision, animosity reigned in the hearts of many, only to be passed on in unabated measure to their children. The camp of the saints was split into clashing clans and warring tribes whose followers spoke sneeringly of others as "Progressives" or "Antis." When an occasional gentle soul remonstrated, "My brethren, these things ought not so to be," he was accused of soft-peddalling, compromising, or being wishy-washy. Both sides denounced him because he would not parrot the party line. Only the debating champions were popular. These were trained professional warriors, skilled in strategy, apt at ambush, and talented with the tomahawk. They were generally imported and they taunted, threatened and challenged the opposition. Many were fluent on the platform and facile with the pen. They were out for victory while protesting their love for the truth and praying for the triumph of right. If division had not occurred before their arrival it followed soon thereafter. Brotherly love was stabbed to the heart in their partisan encounters and left gasping, writhing and twitching on the sanded floor of the arena.

Now, almost a century has passed and we can with a greater degree of calmness survey the scene of battle and assess the changes that have taken place. One thing is apparent at first glance. The seeds which were sown in the original division have continued to bear fruit, with both sides suffering further fragmentation and splintering. The arguments now used to defend the use of instrumental music are not the ones employed at its inauguration, and the basis of justification varies from one area to another. A new generation has grown up whose members have come into parties well organized. These find the instrument or the opposition to it already entrenched and a part of the party program to be accepted without question. They are surprised that there was ever any disagreement over such a matter, and surprised too to learn that they are heirs of a restoration movement. The interest in such things as instrumental music must be kept alive by the preachers. It has become a battle of mercenaries, rather than of the enlisted men in the ranks.

But the whole ecclesiastical atmosphere has changed. Once there was open sectarian hostility as circuit riders went forth to do or die for their denominational establishments. Now the whole religious world regards division as the scandal of Christianity in our day. There is a continual exploration of the means by which schism can be eliminated. Mergers rather than divisions, make the newspaper headlines. The world is asking for the prescription of peace from those who claim to be following the Prince of peace. Any movement selfishly talking only to itself, or with nothing to offer except an example of strife, is strangely out of place, and is as irrelevant to the present as a Dodo or pterodactyl.

The heirs of the restoration movement must solve the problem of division among themselves or forfeit all right to sit as peacemakers at the council tables of our day. It will not do to freeze our schismatic state at its present status, or declare a moratorium on further division. It is imperative that we remove and repair the breaches among ourselves as proof that it can be done. At present this seems absolutely impossible to most of our brethren because they can see only one alternative. Either those who use instrumental music must give it up and confess that its use is a sin, or those who oppose it must cease their opposition and condone its use. In other words it appears that the only terms of reunion are absolute surrender of one party to the other.

So long as this type of rationalization prevails little will be achieved. There will be an occasional debate between the more rabid advocates of the various viewpoints. Some will desert one party for the other, but the reasons will generally be social, rather than conviction as to the instrument. When a defector is received into the opposing ranks there will be a brief flurry of sectarian hope that soon the whole problem will be solved by wholesale capture but a little time will serve to dispel this forlorn partisan expectancy. If the current parochial attitudes prevail the various factions are doomed to a war of attrition until Jesus comes. But they need not prevail. They do so only because superficial thinkers have not sought for another alternative. There is one! It consists not of surrender of one party to another party but in the absolute surrender of both (or all) to the Spirit of God.

It was loss of this Spirit, and not instrumental music, which created the first division in our ranks. Certainly instrumental music placed a strain on our relationship, and will still do so, but it was failure to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace which produced the separation. Until we restore that unity and that peace we are not in any shape to discuss differences, and the increasing number of divisions in all of our segments is proof of this fact. We can never attain the unity of the Spirit by debating our differences on instrumental music, but we must regain the unity of the Spirit in order to logically discuss our problems as brethren. I propose to enter more deeply into our task than the superficial attention usually given to it. There is real hope in such a course!

That hope lies in what has previously been stated, that all admit that instrumental music is not the basic cause of division but a symptom of that cause. What is the real cause? It is an attitude toward the authority of Jesus as expressed in the revealed word of God. That attitude is the direct result of a philosophy, or principle of interpretation. When instrumental music was introduced and parties crystallized about the pro and con of its use, these took a position by rallying around one of two standards, each of which represented a particular postulate as to interpretation.

To put it in another fashion, when the conflict was joined, each side withdrew to prepared fortifications upon hills facing each other across the valley. There they have remained to this day with each insisting that his hill is the promised land to be defended at all costs. Actually the valley between where men meet as brothers in spite of differences may be the true vantage point for God's people. Here is a brief statement of the two divergent views.

1. Whatever is not specifically authorized in scripture as an expression of worship is forbidden, and its introduction and employment constitutes a sin against the authority of Jesus.

2. Whatever is not specifically forbidden in scripture as an expression of worship may be allowable and permissible provided that it does not violate some other clearly stated principle of divine revelation.

Not all of those who use instrumental music in this day justify it upon this basis. Many deny that it is used in worship, as worship, or as an expression of worship. Some affirm it is merely an aid to keep the pitch as a tuning fork is an aid to securing the pitch. Occasionally these demonstrate the inconsistency of their argument by playing the instrument while taking up a collection or during a prayer. We are convinced this is primarily an accommodative position to which strategists have felt forced to retire in some areas and is more for public consumption than for private conviction. Generally speaking we believe that the two statements above are a fair exposition of the ground for its original introduction and the opposition thereto.

We must not forget that there is a difference between the authority of Jesus Christ and any philosophy of that authority in the light of which we examine it and seek to implement its requirements in our lives. The authority of Jesus is a fact created by the infinite source of all authority. It is divinely bestowed and is unalterable by any human power or by any combination of human powers. A philosophy of interpretation is adopted by man, and is therefore adaptable in the light of increasing wisdom and deepening insight. But the authority of Jesus is as unvarying as the ordinances of sun and moon. There is as much difference between them as there is in the planetary system and the telescope through which that system is studied, or the human body and a fluoroscope through which fleshly organs are examined. Both telescope and fluoroscope are useful instruments provided one does not confuse the means with the object and conclude that because he cannot improve upon the planets or the human body he cannot improve upon the telescope or fluoroscope either.

At this juncture the casual reasoner will interject the question "Why do we need a principle of interpretation? Why can't we just accept the Bible for what it says and forget about modes of approach to authority and revelation?" Although the answer to this is apparent little will be gained by attempting to explain it to those who ask such questions and compassion can probably be better bestowed upon them indirectly since it does not require so much expenditure of time or tension. One might as well enquire, "If man wants to visit Mars why does he not just go, without messing around with space capsules and satellites?" Obviously the reason he cannot do so is because he is human. No doubt an angel would have no difficulty at all in making interplanetary visits without benefit of a capsule, but angels are not human beings. Or, should we state that in reverse?

Because we are human we even have to seek for a means to understand what other humans are trying to say to us. The Constitution of the United States is written in rather plain and unadorned fashion but the Supreme Court has been trying to interpret it almost since the day it was written. Even among the trained and scholarly men on the bench there is seldom a unanimous consensus. Undoubtedly this results from divergent philosophies of interpretation but without an approach to understanding there would be no understanding attainable at all. How much more must we utilize our rational powers to understand the will and purpose of God.

We do not question but what God could have so constructed us that he could have imposed the divine will upon us and forced our automatic and involuntary response to it, but to do so he would have had to make us less than human. The granting of the right of choice meant the possibility of making the wrong choice. The creation of rational beings meant they could act irrationally. The divine will is not imposed but the thoughts of the divine mind are exposed, for that is precisely what revelation means. We are forced to deal with these thoughts for they are a part of the body of truth. Coming from God they cannot possibly be in any other category. But we must face them as human beings, and in all the mistakes and frailties to which such beings are subject. We must encounter a divine communication without divine insight. Revelation is divine, but interpretation is human.

We must recognize the sovereign right of God to speak to us, to direct us, to demand obedience of us. But we must also realize that while his lordship is exercised in perfection, our understanding and execution of his will are not perfect. We must be always seeking and searching for the ideal. We can never count unto ourselves that we have arrived. It is because of this that grace and mercy are so precious unto us and our hope lies in our love for Jesus, our commitment unto him, and our willingness to do his will. Being human, we will out of our abiding affection for him, formulate a course of procedure for our lives based upon our understanding of his revelation.

One is not necessarily a rebel against the authority of Jesus because he cannot in good conscience concur with my postulate relative to the understanding and interpretation of that authority. He may be honestly striving to know and do the will of God to the full extent of his present knowledge and ability. If so, we have a great deal in common, for that is precisely my status also. Neither of us will gain anything for the common cause of him whom we both serve by assuming that the other is dishonest, stubborn or rebellious. In both cases such would be a false assumption. We will find it far more profitable to grant the integrity of one another and use this common ground as a basis for mutual aid and research.

We will also find it helpful to constantly remind ourselves of the difference between God and ourselves, a very necessary distinction which is frequently overlooked by those who engage in judging their brethren. Nothing else is more positively condemned by God's word than such judging, and yet no other sin is more frequently committed by those who claim to respect that authority. Unless we wish to be tried as "gods" and measured by a yardstick of perfect knowledge, infallibility of understanding, and unrepachable conduct, we had better quit playing at being God with our fellows, for with what judgment we judge we shall be judged. We are literally "writing our own ticket."

This brings us to an evaluation of the two divergent rules of interpreting the authority of Jesus Christ for our lives. Both of these rules are pre-suppositions. No one is so ridiculous as to say he can read either of them in the sacred scriptures. Both attempt to measure what God has said by something he did not say. Each is a pair of spectacles donned by men to aid them in reading the word of God. Each contains lens ground according to criteria which have been deemed to be correct. But spectacles are put on before one starts reading. In both cases men have searched the scriptures in an endeavor to understand the basis of authority and they have selected and tied together various scriptures which seem to substantiate and lend credence to the position they have adopted. But they are still spectacles and not the word of God. That they may help us even as do spectacles, goes without saying, but we need to be careful lest we fall into the error of thinking we can best exemplify the spirit of the Word by arguing about the respective merits of our spectacles.

Both rules are conclusions resulting from deductions and these deductions are themselves attempts to interpret the scriptures in order to determine a proper basis for interpreting the scriptures. Thus they actually stem from an attempt to peer behind the scriptures— to look through them by looking into them— and understand the intent and motivation of God, although using as tools in the process his various acts and words.

We will be asked, “Is not one of the rules safer than the other?” In plain language this is meant to enquire “Isn’t it better not to do a thing which may prove to be wrong than to do something which no one can prove is right?” This sounds good at first thought, but the moment you shift ground from dogmatism to safety you forfeit the whole argument based upon absolute authority. Safety is a relative term. Followed to its ultimate along a certain tangent it will result in doing nothing, because if one does anything he takes a chance. Men have been killed on almost every kind of job, or have been killed on the way to work. The safest thing, then, would be never to take a job, or, if given one, never go to it. Certainly one could never become an apostate who never accepted Jesus, and any person who does accept him might become an apostate. Shall we conclude it would be safer never to accept Jesus and eliminate the risk of apostasy?

Safety lies within the realm of human judgment but divine authority does not. One should accept and implement in his life what he conscientiously believes divine authority requires whether it appears safe to do it, or not. Careless and superficial thinkers will jump to the conclusion that we are here affirming that conscience is a safe guide, but the truly thoughtful will see that there is a great difference. Conscience is a monitor, or arbiter. It is no more the source of authority than a referee is in a football game, or an umpire is in a baseball game. If challenged, each must make appeal to a source of authority which all must recognize and accept or there can be no game.

Let us now come directly to our present state in the restoration movement. Let us face up realistically to the cleavage resulting from our initial division. We were once a united movement making a terrific impact upon the sectarian realm. We are now divided. We were brothers before we divided, we are brothers still, children of the same Father. What holds us apart? The answer lies in two divergent rules to govern our attitude and approach to the authority of Jesus. All of us recognize Jesus as the Son of God, all acknowledge his authority in heaven and upon earth. All of us seek to do his will, all want to please God, all crave to be with him forever. We are not divided over whether Jesus has absolute authority for all claim him as the Lord of life. We are not divided over whether the new covenant scriptures constitute a revelation from God, for we accept that as factual.

Our problem lies in the realm of human judgment as to how that revelation which we regard as an expression of authority must be applied in our lives. We have two well defined pre-suppositions for approach to the authority of Christ. These have not been given by his authority. The appeal to scripture for substantiating either of them is an appeal to the tenor or spirit of the word. They have been compiled through our deductions and formulated by our consciences, the rules appeal to us as being a valid approach for ourselves to the authority of Jesus.

Our past attempts to bind our deductions upon each other have been wholly unsuccessful. Our debates in which we have sought to define and defend our presuppositions as valid, and to convert all of our brethren to acceptance of them have proven to be futile. They have worsened rather than helped our condition. In this sad state of affairs many have despaired of our ever being able to recapture even a semblance of unity and have resigned themselves to the task of building up our various sects and parties with the hope that God will understand and take into consideration their ardent and unfulfilled longings for brotherhood. While I sympathize with such discouraged persons

I do not share either their resignation or pessimism. Our division is a scandal and a shame and I shall not fold my hands and conclude there is nothing to be done about the sin of our own sectarianism. I intend to do something about it in both word and deed.

But what can be done to restore a sense of brotherhood and oneness? Are we not staggered, stymied and stalemated? Have we not reached an impasse which provides no alternative except to cut and slash away at each other as rival factions until we force the surrender of one party or kill each other off? Suppose our real problem isn't the instrument, is it not true that as long as we have these divergent approaches to authority we must continue our fratricidal feuding? These are the questions asked by the sectarian in heart.

I have no doubt that the same questions in substance were asked by Jews and Gentiles at the time when Jesus was born. How could the circumcised be received in their insufferable arrogance by the uncircumcised? How could the uncircumcised be accepted in their foreignness to the covenants of God by the covenant people? There just simply was no answer. And then it happened! Here they were—raised up together and made to sit together in heavenly places. The circumcised still had their circumcision, the uncircumcised were still uncircumcised, but they were made nigh by the blood of the cross, they were members of the same body and partakers of the same promises in Christ by the gospel! Study those last five words.

We are all of us already in Christ. We are there by the gospel! We are in Christ by his authority expressed in the dynamic of the good news! Whether we justify the use of instrumental music or oppose it we are in Christ and we are members of one body. We may not understand all God approves and God may not approve all we understand, but we are all members of God's family by the new birth. We have formed two parties (and more) but we were all baptized by one Spirit into one body. Our unity lies not in what we accomplish but what God has accomplished for us.

But what about our divergent rules or principles for interpretation? Let us place them in proper perspective. Let us remember they are “ours” and not necessarily “His.” Let us not bind our deductions upon others farther than their own knowledge commends acceptance of them. But is not one of these correct and if so are not all bound to accept it and be governed by it? No one can be governed by something which he does not personally believe is correct. You cannot govern other free men by your own standards of correctness. But go back and study the two principles again and do so without bias. You may reach the conclusion that each is only partly correct. The authority of Jesus is absolute, but no human theory of it based upon deductions from the scripture need be so.

There is every evidence that both schools of thought realize that they cannot practically apply their rules in an absolute degree. Those who postulate the exclusiveness of silence are constantly called upon to explain and justify the things which they have adopted without specific mention or authorization. Those who accept the theory of the permissiveness of silence are ever seeking to lay down laws of restraint to control their membership. Both groups have engaged in mental gymnastics and semantic performances which entertain only their own members while amusing outside observers. Thus far both have been fairly successful because of the widespread indifference and ignorance of the masses. Both resent specific questions as to application of the rules, preferring their acceptance in generalities without examination. Both are in for stirring times in the future because of increasing intellectual status which will probe the fiat of the “infallible interpretation” of the party.

What can be done now to heal the gaping wound of a hundred years standing? There is much to be done. The first thing is to restore the right of every individual to go to the Word of God for himself without benefit of clergy. The second is to make effective the function of congregational autonomy. This means that if a congregation of God's children decides to use instrumental music their right to make such a decision must be respected even by those who deplore the judgment exercised in reaching it. Those who choose to use the instrument do not give account to those who do not, but to the Lord. Men must be allowed to be answerable to him who is worshiped and not to other worshipers.

We dare not destroy men for whom Christ died over our views about instrumental music. Brethren who cannot see this issue alike and who worship in separate edifices because of their convictions should still regard each other as brothers. They should work together in such projects as do not require compromise or abdication of conscience. They should call upon each other in public meetings in spite of their differences, and should labor to narrow the chasm and reduce the tension between themselves. One need not sacrifice his personal attitude toward a thing to have brotherly love for one who does not share his views about it.

For reasons which appear to me to be good and sufficient I am opposed to the use of instrumental music in the public praise service of the saints. I shall not here detail the reasoning upon which I have reached that conclusion, but it will suffice to say that my position is more nearly that taken by J. W. McGarvey than any other person in the restoration movement. I realize that my position presents some problems to those who use the instrument when I go among them but I cannot compromise my personal conviction based upon my understanding merely to please men or to be popular, and I will not do so. Those who receive or welcome me must do so as I am, for I refuse to sail under false colors, or put on the mask. All of our factions have enough Pharisees and hypocrites without me contributing another to the number.

Occasionally, good brethren seek to soften the shock of my presence by introducing me with the words, "Brother Ketcherside prefers singing without the instrument." This actually does an injustice although I never allow myself to be bothered by it. My feeling on the matter goes deeper than mere personal preference. It has been reached after a great deal of prayer and research and is not a mere question of opinionated infatuation with an idea or attitude. My view is consonant with my goal and with the means by which I shall attempt to attain unto it.

But I shall steadfastly refuse to impose my views about this, or any other matter in the same category, as a test of fellowship or condition of brotherhood. No one is my brother because he does not use instrumental music, no one ceases to be my brother because he uses it. The only instrument through which I am related to my brothers is the cross of Jesus, and I shall allow no other instrument devised by man to break up the relationship created by the instrument designed by God to bring us together. When men forego the use of the instrument as a consideration for the feelings of those who cannot in good conscience condone it, I rejoice at the demonstration of their brotherly concern, but I would never impose this as a demand nor demonstrate an unbrotherly lack of concern for those of my brothers who do not think of it, or would not do it if they did.

I doubt that we will ever settle the problem by one side giving up the instrument, or the other side adopting it. Perhaps such a course would not settle our difficulty any way. It might actually intensify our troubles for a long time. But we can overcome the sin of schism right now. We can do it by declaring that we will not set up our philosophy as a measuring-reed for loyalty to Jesus. We can do it by refusing to permit instrumental music or anything else to keep us from loving our brothers, or from sharing and associating with them and helping them. We can do it by bringing both groups together for prayer and Bible study, perhaps on Wednesday nights. If the instrument is a stumblingblock, forget about singing in these meetings. You do not need to sing every time you meet to pray or study. We will begin to grow together when we begin to associate together. Let's take steps now to end this senseless feud which our fathers began a hundred years ago. No one need give up a single conviction about the right or wrong of anything to share with others and treat them with a sense of decency and respect. No one thinks it is wrong to pray and study the Bible with others. Then here is something all of us can do together! If we do this we will demonstrate to the world that men who differ can be brethren. Why should a little handful of people meet for midweek study in one house while a few blocks away another little handful do the same thing— and all of them members of the same family? Rise above the littleness, intolerance and bigotry of the past. Act like mature men! We've been acting like children long enough! We have it within our power at this very moment to turn the tide of strife, sadness and sorrow which has dogged us as a people for a century. We can exhibit our oneness in Jesus and no one surrender a single truth he has ever held. Have you the courage and the vision to really face up to the prayer for unity of all believers as uttered by the Son of God— Jesus Christ our Lord?

Our problems of division in the restoration movement are not the only schismatic demonstrations among those who believe that Jesus of Nazareth was the Son of God. Historians have accorded one split the dubious honor of being titled "the great schism." It occurred in 1054 when Pope Leo IX of Rome and Patriarch Michael Caerularius of Constantinople excommunicated each other at the same time. The result of their reciprocal act was the East-West cleavage manifesting itself in the antagonistic Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches. On December 7 of last year the successors to these usurpers of divine prerogatives took steps to heal the wound. Pope Paul VI in Rome and Patriarch Athenagoras in Istanbul each read a document voiding the excommunications.

I do not attach the same significance to this action as do many other observers. I am always glad when dissident factions make up after their quarrels, and I rejoice when my neighbors resume talking over the back fence after nine centuries of throwing their ecclesiastical garbage across it into the yards of each other. Unfortunately for those whose optimism is so unbounded, I cannot forget my history lessons, and I do not equate a mending of a big tear in the garment of the aging “mother of all sects” with the donning of a freshly laundered robe of righteousness by the chaste virgin espoused to Jesus. What interests me most is the changing climate which makes it almost essential that even rifts of long standing must be repaired by those who would speak with any hope of being heard by our modern world. Perhaps the impact of this will gradually seep into the consciousness of some of my brethren who are still talking to themselves and mistaking the echo of their own voices for a general “response.”

I thank God that I am a priest of God in my own right. No pope or patriarch can bind or loose anything for me. Only the chosen envoys of Jesus can do that and I can read their words for myself. I am not bound by the actions of my fathers nor the attitudes of my contemporaries. A hundred years ago our fathers denounced each other and excommunicated one another, making a test of fellowship out of something which God did not make a condition of salvation. Now I must personally face up to their action. I must decide for myself whether I shall be bound by their conclusions based upon a philosophy of interpretation by which they sought to implement the authority of Jesus. I must determine whether I shall continue to walk in the circumscribed sectarianism which resulted from their conflicting principles.

I know not what course others will take, but as for myself, let it be known that I have voided in my own heart the decree of excommunication made in the bitterness of partisan strife a century ago. I refuse to go to my grave and to the judgment, while “setting at nought my brothers” over their views related to cups, classes, colleges, music, methods or movements. I am no longer brainwashed into believing that we can serve God in the restoration movement by each party putting factional salve on its own festering wounds or trivial abrasions. We will continue to be divided until we return to the place where we first defended schism as the way of righteousness and restore a genuine sense of brotherhood. I have spanned that chasm in my own soul and I invite the frightened cowering devotees of the cult of conformism to cross back and forth upon the same bridge. Then and only then, can you speak to an ecumenical world about unity based upon restoration.

In my heart I have banished the fears and phobias, the hates and hypocrisies; the despair and disillusionment, of ten long decades of mutual animosity. I do not deprecate the work of my sires. They did the best they knew how to do. But I will not perpetuate their mistakes in my own life nor hand on a heritage of habitual heartache to my children or my children's children. I shall love all of my brethren while realizing the imperfections of us all. I shall not confuse any approach to an interpretation of authority with the authority of my Lord. One thing I know and that is, he has placed me under obligation to nourish and cherish all of my brothers. On this point of authority there can be no question! It is not based upon silence but upon repeated assertions of the One who died for the sins of all of us.

Neither the use of instrumental music, nor opposition to it, has been made a condition of salvation by my Father in heaven. For that reason it will never be made a test of fellowship by me upon earth. I deplore its introduction and its present employment, both in purpose and in manner, but if it is to be made the ground of acceptance of one another, it will have to be by those who use it, for I refuse to reject them. They will have to constitute an instrument party, for I will never create an anti-instrument party. They are God's children. They are my brothers. I love them all. I will never allow any opinion or interpretation of mine to void my relationship with any of my brothers in Christ. To do this would be to deny the plain authority of him to whom I am committed as the Lord of my life.

Introduction to Worship

Mission Messenger (August 1966)

Were these glittering vestments and soaring columns so absolutely essential to the cult of the manger-born God? —Israel Tangwill in “Italian Fantasies.”

Man is a “worshiping animal.” This is the verdict of the philosophers. The implication is that while there are many things man shares in common with other animate beings, in this respect he is in a class apart from the rest. Since animate creatures respond to needs and seek gratification for them, we must conclude, if this evaluation is correct, that man cannot be satisfied by indulging in food, drink and sexual relationships. There is a hunger which bread cannot assuage, a thirst which water cannot quench, and a longing which physical intimacy leaves unabated. Jesus put it very simply: “Man does not live by bread alone.”

Theodore Parker, in “A Lesson for the Day” said, “Yet, if he would, man cannot live all to this world. If not religious he will be superstitious. If he worship not the true God he will have his idols.”

There is a difference between worship and religion. The first belongs to man because he is man; the second belongs to him because he is fallen man. Religion literally means “to bind back,” and if man had never separated himself from God by sin, he would have needed no religion. Like the clothes which cover our bodies, religion which covers our spirits, is a badge of our shame. Instead of being proud of either we should be humbled by the thought of how naked we would be without them. Worship belongs to man because of his nearness to God, religion because of his distance from God. Worship is the longing cry to God across the chasm which sin created, religion is the bridge which spans that gulf. For that reason, worship must always be essentially internal, while religion, like any other bridge, will be external.

The problem of dealing with “worship” in a Biblical context is intensified by the fact that so many different original terms have been rendered by the word, and the distinctions are thereby either blurred or lost. Perhaps it will enhance our understanding of, and simplify our approach to the meaning if we begin with the English word and determine its significance. The Anglo-Saxon ancestor of our term was weorthscipe, and even the casual reader can see enfolded in it the word “worth.” Literally it means to attach worth or value, and thus, to regard as worthy. By extension, it easily came to mean to pay homage, to revere.

Worship seeks to express itself openly, but the discriminating student will detect the difference between the form in which it is expressed and the worship itself, just as there is a distinction to be made between love and its expression. Worship is not necessarily restricted to a divine being, for man attaches great worth to many things. He may revere that which created him, or that which was created. But it is axiomatic that the more man worships the more he becomes like the object of his devotion. The character of that object, or the character which he attaches to it, whether genuine or unreal, will mould his own character and be reflected in his conduct and attitudes.

To avoid becoming unduly tedious we will come directly to some of the terms used in the new covenant scriptures which are rendered “worship,” especially in the King James Version. We crave your patient consideration of these.

1. The first is doxa, which is translated “worship” only in Luke 14:10. Jesus observed how those invited to a feast hurried to secure seats near the head of the table to make it appear they were special dignitaries. Since a certain protocol was followed in assignment of places, he urged those who were invited to take the remotest places. The one who invited them would publicly insist that they “go up higher,” and the conclusion is, “Then shalt thou have worship in the presence of them that sit at meat with thee.”

The word doxa is from dokeo, to seem, and literally means “an opinion or estimate.” It is found in our words orthodoxy, right opinions; and heterodoxy, other opinions. Eventually it came to refer to the honor or glory which resulted from a proper estimate or opinion. Thus it is rendered glory 133 times, honor 6, glorious 6, praise 4, dignity 2, worship 1. It is obvious that it means “honor” in Luke 14:10.

2. Another interesting word rendered “worship” only once (Acts 17:25) is therapeuo. Paul affirmed to the Athenian philosophers that God did not dwell in temples of human construction, “neither is worshiped with men’s hands, as though he needed anything.” We get our word “therapy” from the original which is translated heal 38 times, cure 5. The heathen believed that their gods were actually sustained by the offerings presented at the cult temples and they were regular in their provision of food and delicacies, for a hungry god was an angry god. By contrast, the God that made the world and all things therein does not dwell in earthly temples, requires nothing from man, but rather “giveth to all life, and breath, and all things.” We do not supply the needs of God because he has no needs. The word “served” is a better rendering in this case.

3. Another interesting term, although a little farfetched in this article is neokoros, which occurs only once in the sacred scriptures although it is used by Josephus in a different sense. In Acts 19:35, the townclerk of Ephesus, seeking to quell a riot by the guild of silversmiths, said, "The city of the Ephesians is a worshiper of the great goddess Diana, and of the image which fell down from Jupiter." The word for "worshiper" is neokoros, which means "temple-keeper." This was an honorary title awarded to certain cities which thereby became the official centers for the cults formed around certain pagan deities. Ephesus was the recognized guardian or protector of Artemis, or Diana. "Worshiper" does not convey the right idea.

4. There is the word eusebeo which Paul uses in Acts 17:23, "Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you." This term occurs in only one other place, I Timothy 5:4, where children and grandchildren are told "to show piety at home and requite (repay or recompense) their parents." It means to show respect or reverence for any who are deserving, and especially in a practical fashion. The people of Athens, according to their custom and understanding, had demonstrated a pious regard for "the unknown god" in the only manner they could, by dedicating an altar on which to offer him gifts and sacrifices. Paul commends them for their piety but proceeds to show that their demonstration is based upon ignorance of the nature of the God who made the world, and all things therein. He supplies for them the information required to properly appreciate the nature of God.

5. Again, there is the word latreuo, which means "to serve." It is translated serve 16 times, worship 3, service 1, worshiper 1. In Philippians 3:3, Paul writes, "For we are the circumcision which worship God in the spirit." The English Version has it, "we whose worship is spiritual." In Acts 7:42 it is used of the worship of the planets. "Then God turned and gave them up to worship the host of heaven." In Acts 24:14 Paul employs it for the worship of God. "After the way which they call heresy (sect), so worship I the God of my fathers." In both of these last two the Revised Version has “serve.”

That there is a distinction between this word and the one most frequently translated worship is evident from their usage in the same context. “Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve” (Matt. 4:10). “Who changed the truth of God into a lie, and worshiped and served the creature more than the Creator” (Romans 1:25). But the fact that the word latreuo is translated worship shows the close relationship to worship and service. However, a word of warning is needed. Nowhere does the word of God speak of a “worship service.” The saints did not “attend services.” The word serve was related to actual work performed, for latreuo is from latris, a hired servant, and one does not hire a servant to merely go as an occasional spectator to watch a performance. There is a difference between serving and observing.

6. Now we come to the word which is most important of all in this study. It is proskuneo, and it is translated worship 58 times. It is never rendered by any other word at all. It is at once obvious that here is the principal word for “worship” and a failure to understand its implications will mean that we have completely failed in grasping our subject. It is a combined form from pros, towards, and kuneo, to kiss; and literally means to kiss the hand towards, that is, as an indication of homage, adoration, or respect. Thus it can be used for making obeisance to one in honor of his person; to prostrate oneself in reverence. It is an indication or demonstration of the attitude which one feels toward another who is worthy of great respect. It is recognition of worth-ship, or worthiness.

Perhaps we can best understand it by recounting those who are said to have worshiped. The astrologers who came to Jerusalem said, “We have seen his star in the east, and we are come to worship him” (Matt. 2:2). It is not in vain that the classic painting of their visit is called “The Adoration of the Magi.” “And when they were come into the house, they saw the young child . . . and fell down and worshiped him” (verse 11). “And behold, there came a leper and worshiped him” (Matt. 8:2). “Behold, there came a certain ruler, and worshiped him” (Matt. 9:18). “Then they that were in the ship came and worshiped him” (Matt. 14:33). “Then came she and worshiped him, saying, ‘Lord help me’” (Matt. 15:25). There is no need for multiplying these citations. In every instance there is simply a recognition of the power and presence of Jesus with reverence.

CHALLENGING CONCLUSIONS

Our purpose is not to press the technical aspects of this study but to reduce it to practical consideration so that all may profit. For that reason we shall make certain statements to challenge thought on the subject. If some of these seem rather daring at first glance we can only say that they represent our sincere views and we trust will be given earnest consideration and not be lightly discarded.

1. Of all the words translated “worship” not one is ever applied to anything we do when we assemble on the Lord’s Day.

2. The expression “the worship” is not in the new covenant scriptures and the very idea represented in our use of it is foreign to those scriptures.

3. The term “acts of worship” is not in the Bible. The very thought of “five acts of worship” is absurd and ridiculous in the light of the teaching of the Word.

4. Christianity has no sacred places. It has no sacred days. It has no sacred rituals. There are no holy places, seasons or liturgies, in a special sense, for those who are in Christ Jesus our Lord.

Indeed it was just these truths about Christianity which made it distinctive as “the way.” It was loss of these truths which has bound it in fetters and made it grind in the prison-house of theology, as the blind Samson was shorn of his strength when “he wist not that the Spirit had departed from him.” Nothing is more frightening than the fact that we have fragmented and compartmented our lives into some areas that are “spiritual” and others that are “secular.” The very purpose of the teaching of Jesus was to show that every facet and feature of life was to be worship rendered to God.

James S. McEwen, M. A., B. D., in “A Theological Word Book of the Bible” says: “A further consequence of Jesus’ teaching is that the barrier between sacred and secular, worship and daily living crumbles away. Since worship means the service of God, and this in turn implies loving one’s neighbor, it follows that every kindly act performed in this spirit and intention is an act of worship (Matt. 25:34-40; James 1:27).”

The implications of this are startling when brought to bear upon our traditions. Few who have been reared in those traditions will dare to think seriously about these implications. Many will become incensed at the questioning of that which has been regarded as “scriptural” simply because it is commonplace and accepted. However, we cannot really be loyal to Jesus by sweeping these things under our ecclesiastical rugs or by returning our heads to the sand in our theological deserts in the hope that they will go away.

MOUNTAIN OR CITY?

In John 4 we have the familiar account of the encounter of Jesus with the woman at the well of Jacob, near Sychar. She was an outcast Samaritan who had married five times and was then living with a paramour, but to her were revealed profound truths about God’s desire as related to worship. When she became convinced that Jesus was a prophet she pointed to nearby Mount Gerizim, where lay the ruins of the temple erected by the Samaritans to be a rival to the one at Jerusalem. She said, "Our fathers worshiped in this mountain; and ye say that Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship" (verse 20). Note the expression "the place where men ought to worship." "Place" is from topos, and the question is whether God confronts man in a sacred mountain or in a holy city. The answer of Jesus is plain. "Neither in this mountain nor yet at Jerusalem." The hour was coming when there would be no need for pilgrimages to a sacred spot. Every spot touched by a "true worshiper" would be holy. "But the hour is coming when the true worshiper shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth; for the Father seeketh such to worship him." Spirit and truth would supplant mountain and city!

This is the only time the word proskunetes, worshiper, occurs in the scriptures. It is preceded by alethinos, true. In his concordance, Cremer says of this word "Alethinos defines the relation of the conception to the thing to which it corresponds—genuine." The true worshiper, then, is the person who grasps the truth that since God is Spirit, the only genuine worship is spiritual, and cannot be confined to places and things, which are temporal. Places become holy not because they are places but simply because believers are there; things become holy not because they are things but because they are used by believers. All things and all places are holy when the true worshiper touches them, but the sanctity is not in the places or things.

William Barclay aptly states it thus: "The true, the genuine worship is when man, through his spirit, attains to friendship and intimacy with God. True and genuine worship is not to come to a certain place; it is not to go through a certain ritual or liturgy; it is not even to bring certain gifts. True worship is when the spirit, the immortal and invisible part of man, speaks to and meets with God, who is immortal and invisible."

This encourages us to mention what is probably a perversion of a favorite funeral text— John 14:2, 3. "In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am, there ye may be also." It is generally thought that Jesus was here speaking of the eternal abode after his second coming, but the entire context is against such an interpretation of his words.

It is obvious that if heaven is a state of being with God, Jesus did not have to go and get it ready, for he declared that he would say to the righteous, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world" (Matt. 25:34). The "place" is where Jesus receives us unto himself and where we abide with him. And the key is in the word "mansions." These are many, that is there is one for each individual. The word for "mansions" is mone and it occurs but twice. Both times are in this speech. It means "place of abode" and in God's house (estate or economy) there is a place for all, but that place had to be prepared, and it required that Jesus go away to prepare it.

Thus he said, "I will not leave you orphans: I will come to you . . . At that day ye shall know that I am in my Father, and ye in me, and I in you." He then declared that, "He that loveth me shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him and will manifest myself to him." Upon being asked how he would come and manifest himself, Jesus made a significant reply, "If a man love me, he will keep my words: and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him" (verse 23). Note that he does not say in this instance, "We will abide with him," but rather "make our abode with him." The word "abode" is mone, the word for "mansions" in verse 2, and these are its only appearances in the scriptures. The place prepared where God dwells is the human heart and he dwells in us in and through the Holy Spirit.

Jesus said, "It is expedient for you that I go away, for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you" (16:7). "And I will pray the Father, and he will give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever; even the Spirit of truth; whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him; for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you. I will not leave you comfortless: I will come to you" (14:16-18). The many mansions are the many hearts which have his commandments, keep them and love him.

God's only sanctuary since the cross is the human heart. The only acceptable meeting place for worship with God is worship itself. There is no sacred law, no sacred furniture, no sacred garments, no sacred building, sprinkled with the blood of dedication. Ours is "a new and living way," in which we "draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience" (Hebrews 10:25). "How much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God?"

The sanctuary of God is always where his covenant is kept. In the days before the true tabernacle was pitched, the tablets of stone were kept in a sacred chest or coffer, first in a tent, later in a magnificent temple. But the Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands. The new covenant is not inscribed on tablets of stone, nor written with pen and ink. It is a spiritual covenant and must be kept in an abode of the Spirit. "And as for you, it is plain that you are a letter that has come from Christ, given to us to deliver; a letter written not with ink but with the Spirit of the living God, written not on stone tablets but on the pages of the human heart . . . Such qualification as we have comes from God; it is he who has qualified us to dispense his new covenant— a covenant not expressed in a written document, but in a spiritual bond; for the written law condemns to death, but the Spirit gives life."

A knowledge of these truths always makes me smile inwardly, in spite of my sadness when men show me through their piles of brick and stone, while they glow with pride. We enter through the nave arcade, we see the apse, and then I am conducted into “the sanctuary.” The voice is lowered because of the dim light filtered through art windows. I am shown the matching aisle carpets and pew cushions and am taken to the front where “the communion table” and pulpit furniture received a special dedication at a recent meeting which was like “a high holy day.” Frequently I receive programs of elaborate dedication ceremonies. The only thing that impresses me is how far from Christianity and how close to Judaism most of my brothers are even yet.

When will we learn, that only the sprinkling of blood can consecrate and that God no longer consecrates gold and silver and stones graven by art and man’s device? Franklin W. Young of Princeton University, in his article titled, “The Theological Content of New Testament Worship” writes: “It is an historical fact that the New Testament Church had no holy place, spatially located, which could be designated as the place where God, in some special sense, was present to his people.” A bit farther on the same author aptly declares, “The phrase ‘going to church,’ is an impossible linguistic construction in the New Testament.”

Dr. Young is correct. We do not “go to church.” It is the church which does the going. If those who go were not the church before they left home they will not be the church after they get where they are going, regardless of what is said or done when they arrive. Our speech betrays us. We hear a great deal today about “churchly” things and one can hardly pick up religious literature without reading about “churchly structure.” This is the language of ecclesiasticism, not of the Holy Spirit. Our tongues are still confounded by our modern Babels.

Just as absurd is “the call to worship” which consists of intoning in the sepulchral pulpit accent— the holy voice— “I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go up to the house of the Lord.” What is a call to worship among those who worship in spirit and in truth? Can we turn worship on and off like the timer on an automatic oven? When does the true worshiper stop worshipping so that he has to be started again. If he is not a true worshiper, is he worshipping or merely going through certain mechanical motions after the call is given? I can understand why a muezzin in a minaret would call the Muslims to prayer, but does Christianity have its muezzins and minarets?

When David wrote Psalm 122, Jerusalem was the holy city of God. One had to go up to the house of God. But today we are the house of God in Christ. “You are God’s field, God’s building” (1 Cor. 3:9). “Do you not know that you are God’s temple and that God’s Spirit dwells in you” (1 Cor. 3:16). “Do you not know that your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit within you) which you have from God? You are not your own; you were bought with a price. So glorify God in your body” (1 Cor. 6:19, 20). God only has one house on earth and you cannot go up to it if you are already in it and an integral part of it. Our brothers who talk about going up to the house of God are still moping in Judaism. They are living B.C. lives in an A.D. world. They are sitting on the premises instead of standing on the promises.

This much will serve as an introduction to what we shall further say about the Christian concept of worship in our issue next month. Let us close our first installment by pointing out that true worship is the tuning of the heart to throb in harmony with the pulsation of the infinite. Certainly it is proper for God’s family to gather about the thanksgiving table to show that they do remember him, but the place where they gather is not holy because it is a place. The holy place is the heart of a Christian who is risen with Christ; the most holy place is the risen Christ. To be in him is to be in God’s holy of holies where the Father meets his priests before the mercy seat.

Failure to realize this makes us mistake rushing about for reverencing God, attending meetings for attaining maturity in faith, and confusing mobility of the body for nobility of spirit. Because we have been taught, at least by implication, that the first and greatest commandment is loyalty to the Establishment, many of us “go to church” so much we do not have time to serve God.

Holy Places and Days

It is significant that Hebrew has one word to denote work, service and worship; in Biblical thought there is no watertight division between daily work and the adoration of God— R. Martin-Achord in “A Companion to the Bible,” page 472.

I remember the house where I was born. It was a two room miner’s shack with a summer kitchen at the rear. The summer kitchen was a small building, not attached to the house, where food was prepared in the hot days of midsummer to keep the house from becoming unbearably warm. I can also remember how the family lived in those faraway days. There were but four children then, the other two came later. I was the oldest of the lot.

Our mother came from immigrant stock, and had never gone to English school. My grandfather was from Copenhagen, my grandmother from Schleswig-Holstein. They lived in a tightly-knit Lutheran colony where only German was spoken. My mother met my father when she visited her married sister. He was a tall, devil-may-care young blade who had gone underground as a miner before he was sixteen years old. What caused this reserved Lutheran girl to be attracted to this youthful skeptic who laughed at God no one could ever tell. I think he was relatively considerate of her feelings since he regarded religion as being more adapted to women, most of whom did not care to drink and fight anyhow, and were entitled to some diversion. And their marriage did take her from the fields where she had been plowing, harvesting, and spreading manure from the cattle shed since she was twelve.

It was a long walk to the Lutheran church edifice but as we came along mother carried us in her arms and had us christened, and was very careful about the selection of a godfather and godmother for each of us. But she could not carry us all, and as a new baby came along, the others were forced to stay home with our father. This was much more fun because we would go for walks through the woods looking for paw-paws (the poor man's bananas) in season, or he would make a kite and help us loft it into the sky, or spin tops or play marbles. All of this came to a grinding halt, however when our father was converted.

I was almost six when it happened, and I recall seeing him immersed in the pond behind the shaft where he went down each day to mine out the ore. He gave away his shotgun with which he always won every shooting-match from which they did not debar him, and also disposed of the violin on which he used to fiddle for dances (shindigs, he called them), and threw his sack of Bull Durham and little book of cigarette papers in the heating stove. The living-room (which was also the bedroom) smelled like a tobacco factory for a little while, and this gave our mother, who was angry because he had "joined the crazy Campbellites," a chance to vent the Teutonic spleen which was deeply buried, and after it had burst out, always left her in a flood of tears.

Life was altered for all us. Now we got up earlier on Sunday and had to wash with special care, because our ears had to pass inspection. We had to don clean clothing and be otherwise uncomfortable. We had our meetings in the front room of an uncle's house, and to get there we walked up the road past houses where the more fortunate youngsters hung on the fences and stuck their tongues out at us as we passed by.

This required making mental notes of those to fight on the next day, for we had already learned that you did not fight on Sunday. On especially good days the list grew quite long by the time we reached our destination, and we knew we'd have a full day of activity on Monday.

I remember the meetings. All of those present were relatives except one or two. The Lord's table was simply the library table with the kerosene lamp pushed back for "the emblems." At first we just used a biscuit left from breakfast for the bread, but later someone came through and objected that it was leavened, so after quite a discussion as to what should go into it we began to use "unleavened" bread. I say "we" instead of "they" because it was just sort of a family and all of us seemed to belong. The little rug with the big shepherd dog woven into it, which lay in front of the table, was the same one on which we wrestled during the week if our aunt was gone.

Too, there wasn't any "preacher," and when an occasional one came and was "given the time" it wasn't nearly so much like a family gathering. Generally he talked louder and stood up. We ordinarily sat and read and talked about the Bible like we visited at Thanksgiving or birthdays. Only when the time came to "wait on the table" did one arise and remind us that this was the real reason we had gathered. When summer came the room was too hot and crowded and the meetings were transferred to a walnut grove and held under the open sky. This was a most interesting experience for a little lad. There were dung beetles to watch on the ground, or squirrels chasing each other through the trees. Occasionally a soaring vulture set his wings and caught a thermal current and was wafted heavenward with no apparent effort. It was years later before I came to know and to love poetry and to learn that, "The groves were God's first temples."

I've written all of this to tell you again that any place where God touches a human life is holy ground, and that no place is a sanctuary merely because it is a place. The outstanding feature of early Christianity was its recognition that all one had was God's when the heart was given to God. Any house was the Lord's house when the Lord's people were there. The common expression was "the church which is in thy house." The table of the Lord was the family table, and it was the table of the Lord simply because he was Lord of the table. No building was sacred because none was secular.

There was no "worship service" because all service was worship. The husband who loved his wife as his own body was worshipping God and so was the wife who revered her own husband. One who worked quietly for his living was fulfilling an appeal made in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ (2 Thess. 3:12). Those who gave to charity with all their heart and those who cheerfully helped others in distress were using gifts allotted by God's grace as certainly as those who publicly prophesied, taught or exhorted (Rom. 12:6-8). C. F. D. Moule in "Worship in the New Testament" writes, "Christian worship is indeed service — hard work— but it is the responsive service of obedience and gratitude, not of flattery or of 'mutual benefit.'"

Service to humanity, the relief of human suffering, the supplying of human need— this was the greatest expression of worship. Even before Christ came the prophets caught the vision of the real liturgy of life. Isaiah, in his dissertation on the kind of service God chooses, pointedly reveals that it is not fasting to quarrel and fight, to bow the head like a reed in the wind, or to spread sackcloth and ashes under one. "Is not this the fast that I choose: to loose the bonds of wickedness, to undo the thongs of the yoke, to let the oppressed go free, and to break every yoke? Is it not to share your bread with the hungry, and bring the homeless poor into your house; when you see the naked, to cover him, and not to hide yourself from your own flesh?" (Isaiah 58:6-7).

Jesus refused to allow even the law of the sabbath to take precedence over humanitarian principle. When his hungry disciples plucked ears of grain and were censured by the Pharisees for such unlawful action, he cited them to the case of David “when he was in need and was hungry.” David “entered the house of God, ate the bread of the Presence, which it is not lawful for any but the priests to eat, and also gave it to those who were with him.” Then our Lord laid down a principle of such magnitude that most of those who profess to be his followers even now are still stunned by it. “The sabbath was made for man, not man for the sabbath.” He then added, “So the Son of man is lord even of the sabbath.”

Note that word “even.” To the Pharisees the attitude toward the sabbath was the test of one’s loyalty to God. Jesus repeatedly and habitually broke the sabbath law as they interpreted it. He showed that the need of man took precedence over law since law was given for the good of man. Keeping the sabbath was a part of ritualistic religion but relief of human need was an expression of worship, that is reverence for God, the pure and undefiled religion. The point is that our compassion and mercy must be as full and free and as continuous as that of God. No day must ever be made an excuse for withholding aid that may be provided. Nothing must ever become more hallowed than the provision for suffering humanity.

Of course, in the Christian concept, there are no special days. There can be no holy days for the simple reason that there are no unholy ones. In the primitive community of saints Sunday was not a taboo day. L. Duchesne says in his Origin of Christian Worship:

The idea of imparting to the Sunday the solemnity of the Sabbath, with all its exigencies and in particular its prohibition of work, was an entirely foreign one to the early Christians.

Many of the primitive saints were slaves, owned as chattels by the masters. They had to work a full day in the fields. Pliny the Younger, who was governor of Bithynia, wrote that the Christians met very early in the morning. Tertullian said of the Lord's Supper, "We take it in assemblies before daybreak." This prompted A. B. McDonald to write in Christian Worship in the Primitive Church:

The choice of the early morning hour would be dictated largely by the fact that most worshipers were busy people and had their day's work to do as usual.

Augustus Neander, in his History of the Training and Planting of the Christian Church places the attitude of the disciples in proper focus in these words:

On the standing-point of the gospel, the whole life became in an equal manner related to God, and served to glorify him, and thenceforth no opposition existed between what belonged to God and what belonged to the world. Thus all the days of the Christian life must be equally holy to the Lord; hence Paul says to the Galatian Christians . . . "After that ye have known God, or rather (by his pitying love) have been led to the knowledge of God, how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage?" . . . The apostle does not here oppose the Christian feasts to the Jewish, but he considers the whole reference of religion to certain days as something foreign to the exalted standing-point of Christian freedom, and belonging to that of Judaism and Heathenism.

E. De Pressense, whose work The Early Years of Christianity became a sensation, both when issued in France, and when translated into English by Annie Harwood-Holmden, writes:

There is no apostolic decree or episcopal ordinance appointing the celebration of the first day of the week any more than the watch-days or the hours of devotion. Sunday is the offspring of Christian liberty, not the inheritance of Jewish bondage.

This makes some of our "sacred cows" look silly as sacred cows always do. Think of the signboards reading: “9:45 a.m., Bible Study; 10:45 a.m., Worship; 11:45 a.m., Communion.” The more orthodox brethren, driven to extremes by those who oppose classes, have sought to avoid their charges by neatly arranged compartments, so they can argue that the Bible study ends before the worship begins. What is “the worship”? Where do those who speak where the Bible speaks find any such idea in the sacred scriptures? Do we not study the word together out of reverence for the Author? Then it is an expression of worship. Not only is Bible Study part of “our worship” but so is getting the children up, bathing them, dressing them, preparing breakfast and returning thanks, driving to the place where the saints assemble and waving a friendly hand to the neighbors along the way. We do not start worshipping “when the bell rings.”

Those good brethren who oppose Bible classes have a warped idea of the very nature of worship, but it is not one whit more twisted than is that of those who condone and defend classes. All of them are legalistic and Judaistic in their approach. All exhibit a lack of spiritual maturity. When we once grow up in the Lord, we will learn that Bible study, prayer, singing, contributing to needs, visiting the sick, plowing corn for a crippled neighbor or taking flowers to a shut-in, are all part of our “communion” and there is no such thing as the communion, although there is a communion of the body and blood of the Lord. We do not observe it; we participate in it. That is why it is a communion instead of a mere ritual.

Jesus only once gave a picture of the final judgment and in it he provided the basis for acceptance or rejection. It had nothing to do with liturgy, litany, rubric or ritual. Ceremonials and sacraments were not even mentioned. Those who received the Father’s blessing, who were invited to possess the kingdom that had been made ready for such as themselves since the world was made, were those who had fed the hungry, given drink to the thirsty, received strangers, clothed the naked, helped the sick, and visited those in prison. This is the real test of true worship, not the kind that is rendered at a certain mountain or in a certain city, but that which is in spirit and truth (reality).

This renders picayune and paltry a great many of the occasions of conflict now in vogue in which brethren constantly bombard each other with paper pellets from partisan blowguns. One segment of the non-instrument “Church of Christ” has engaged in an attempt to send clothing and other commodities to the stricken regions of the earth where famine stalks on silent feet. In one instance they sent purebred bulls and cows to Korea for breeding stock and paid men who were skilled in animal husbandry to go along and help the native peoples to improve their herds. This has brought them under constant attack by another segment who have accused them of forsaking the gospel of Christ for the “social gospel” philosophy.

Since I am simply a Christian and a Christian only, I am looked upon with suspicion as “a brother in error” by both the “cow party” and the “anti-cow party.” This is good because it makes me free in Christ to say what I honestly think. I have nothing to lose but my soul. This gives me a tremendous advantage. Since in Christ Jesus there can be no separation between secular and sacred, it remains that the only thing which is secular is sin! Peter learned that no created thing is unclean. God has removed the taboos and phylacteries by washing them all away in the blood of his Son.

Did you not die with Christ and pass beyond reach of the elemental spirits of the world? Then why behave as though you were still living the life of the world? Why let people dictate to you: “Do not handle this, do not taste that, do not touch the other”—all of them things that must perish as soon as they are used? This is to follow merely human injunctions and teaching. (Col. 2:20-22).

In our day the time of the sectarian professional missionary is growing short. It is just about over. If we had wanted to preserve it we should have kept the natives in abysmal ignorance so that any cult representative would have looked good to them. But we established schools and shared educational advantages. In doing so we doomed our narrow sectarian hopes. Too many natives now speak with an Oxonian dialect. This means that the time is fast approaching when men who only go to the jungles to “grind an axe” will be supplanted by those who can swing one. This is no real loss and it may be a gain if the latter are committed Christians.

A schoolteacher in a native village, a doctor in a remote clinic, a visiting nurse in native huts, an expert in soil conservation, an operator of a bulldozer digging ponds for a water supply— all of these, if God’s dear children, are ministers of God for good. And if they let the light of the indwelling Spirit shine through them, and let the leaven of life touch the lives of those about them, they will serve God in the most effective manner in reaching men today. The poorest place on earth to reach those who need to be reached is from a pulpit, because those who need to be reached are not going to come and sit supinely before a wooden stand. If one really wants to witness for Christ in our day perhaps the worst thing he could do would be to quit teaching a biology class in college and “take up preaching.”

We are being forced to do what Jesus did— leave our nice comfortable heavens and go into the world where people are living, dying, fighting, fornicating, loving and lusting. And we might just barely be allowed, some of us, “of helping to complete, in our poor human flesh, the full tale of Christ’s afflictions still to be endured, for the sake of his body which is the church” (Col. 2:24). The Spirit is driving us into the wilderness and we will be tempted a thousand ways. A lot of us will not be coming back!

I really think that one may minister more effectively for Jesus at the time by showing starving natives how to raise more food than by passing out tracts to skeptical hands, entitled, “Why I am not a Buddhist!” A man whose belly is writhing and cramping from hunger and whose clothing is soiled from diarrhea, is not too much concerned with what a sleek, well-dressed American is not! If brethren can increase the milk supply in a village where puling infants sob and moan as they tug at dry and withered paps, I say, “God bless them!” And I think He will. This does not mean that I want to substitute cow’s milk for the sincere milk of the word, any more than Jesus wanted to substitute the loaves and fishes for the bread of life. I do not derogate the value of the soul in ministering to the body. Those who reach such a conclusion will only prove how the sectarian mind can corrupt and defile anything that it touches with its venomous thought.

Of all the sects or movements on earth, the orthodox “Church of Christ” is the last to be accused seriously of espousing the social gospel because it sends bulls and cows to improve the herds of famine-stricken lands. I do not want to be critical of the motives of any of my brothers, but the writings of some of them about such humanitarian projects smack more of what I call “corn dangling” than the social gospel. When we had a recalcitrant mule who would not go where we wanted him, we learned that by dangling an ear of corn about two feet in front of his face we could take him right on into our stable. If sharing with the hungry and destitute becomes partisan bait and is used as a foundation for planting a “Texas style Church of Christ” and transplanting American culture to Tibet or Taiphong, the hungry will benefit, but the brethren over here may not. When there are any strings attached to sharing except the cords which bind our own hearts to Jesus we are part of a sectarian Establishment which prostitutes even deeds of mercy to its own growth and gain, and trades on human suffering for its own advancement. Competition makes compassion a farce; rivalry reduces religion to a racket!

We must never forget that while man does not live by bread alone, without bread he does not live at all upon this earth. Jesus was “worshiping” the Father as much when he blessed the loaves and fishes as when “he took bread and blessed it, and broke it and gave it unto them saying, This bread is my body which is broken for you.” Come to think of it, did Jesus ever cease to worship God? Should we? Is not our problem that we are still choosing mountains and designating cities as “the place where men ought to worship.” Will we ever be able to cast off the shackles of Judaism and “worship in spirit and in truth”? If God wills, next month we will deal with “Acts of Worship.”

The Church Christ Founded

My reading includes many journals outside of the restoration movement which forms our historical emphasis. Recently I have given attention to two periodicals published by Catholic organizations. I have found them interesting and provocative. One is America, the other is Ave Maria. The editor of the latter is John Reedy, C.S.C. He writes with a human touch as you'll learn if you read his lead editorial in the June 25 issue of his magazine. I wish all of you could read, "The Catholic School: Protector or Prophet?" in that same number.

One editorial recounts the work of a missionary, Joseph Spae, in Japan. He tells of an aged man who sidled up to him in a streetcar, took a New Testament out of his pocket, and said: "Tell me, whatever happened to that church Christ founded? Is there no way of starting it in Japan? We need a church like the one Christ speaks about."

Let it be said to the credit of our Catholic editorial friends that they did not use this as an opportunity to propagandize. Instead they showed how far short of the ideal of Christ is the Christian witness in Japan. I suspect most of our brethren would have told the elderly Japanese gentleman that the Lord's church was in his land and would have offered to debate the proposition that what they represented was identical in origin, name, doctrine, worship and practice with the New Testament church.

Once I would have done the same thing.

Somehow I like the Catholic editorial approach better. It does not sound nearly so arrogant or presumptuous.

1. The church Christ founded was a Spirit-filled church. The members did not confuse the person of the Spirit with the word which he revealed unto them. The indwelling Spirit was their divine Helper or Advocate during the absence of Jesus from the earth. He was the seal of their redemption, the source of their inward strength, and their intercessor in prayers with groanings which could not be made vocal. He furnished the power for crucifying the deeds of the flesh and poured out the love of God into their hearts. They lived in the Spirit; they walked in the Spirit; they rejoiced in the Spirit. They experienced personally “how tremendous is the power available to us who believe in God.”

2. The church Christ founded was a community of daring adventurers. There was nothing staid or static about their faith. Through sheer audacity they probed and penetrated and formed cells of witnesses in every level of pagan life, including the very palace guard surrounding Caesar. Justin Martyr wrote: “It is certain that nothing can make us deny our faith, neither the sword of the slayer, nor the cross of agony, nor the teeth of fierce beasts, nor bonds, nor fire, nor tortures of any kind. The more men multiply our sufferings, the more does the number of the faithful grow, the more are the disciples found on the side of Christ.”

In the age of Valerian when a great plague swept the land and the pagans fled the cities abandoning their dead and dying, the Christians stayed and risked all to minister to their former accusers. Because they hazarded their very lives to save others they were called “The Gamblers” by those whom they helped.

3. The church Christ founded was vibrant with hope. The return of Jesus was real. The members saluted one another with the words: "The Lord cometh!" They comforted one another with the thought: "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven!" In this consciousness they labored together, loved one another with pure hearts fervently, and longed for the time when he would change their wretched bodies to resemble his own glorious body "by that power of his which makes him master of everything that is." They were overflowing with the joy of expectation. They were happy on their way to glory. This hope tinged the cold, cruel, cynical world about them as the rising sun bathes the earth in its soft glow. It dispelled the darkness of doubt and the dense fog of despair.

4. The church Christ founded was a fellowship of the Spirit. It was not composed of those who had perfect knowledge but of those who know the Perfect One. The members of the body accepted one another as they were, for this is the way He accepted them all. They had no artificial lines of separation, no arbitrary tests of fellowship. They did not exhibit the sad, sorry, shameful scandal of division as does the restoration movement in Japan. How tragic to divide the children of God who believe with all their hearts that the Messiah has come and who have accepted him as their Savior, into warring factions over how he will come again! Of the church which Christ founded it was said: "Among the large number who had become believers there was complete agreement of heart and soul. Not one of them claimed any of his possessions as his own but everything was common property. The apostles continued to give their witness to the Lord Jesus with great force, and a wonderful spirit of generosity pervaded the whole fellowship."

It is no wonder that an aged Japanese reading such an account as this would ask: "Whatever happened to that church Christ founded?" It is no wonder he would add: "We need a church like the one Christ speaks about." We know of no better way to close this than with the words of the Catholic editor. "Christians today will not be known in any other way than were the first Christians about whom their neighbors were forced to exclaim: ‘See how they love one another.’”

Acts of Worship

There is a great difference between truth and custom. Truth is found when it is honestly sought, but custom, whether true or false, is received, not by judgment but by prejudice, at haphazard, on the opinion of those who have lived before; and it is not easy to cast aside the ancestral garment, although it be proven to be utterly absurd.— Clement of Alexandria in “Exhortations to the Heathen.”

Let us preface our remarks by reminding our readers that nothing which we do when we assemble on the Lord’s Day is ever referred to as “worship” in the new covenant scriptures. The expression “the worship” is not in the Christian scriptures. It is true that, in our day, a ritual has been devised which is designated “the five acts of worship,” but neither the language nor the idea signified by it, is found in God’s revelation. It has been created and fabricated by the dubious method of searching out isolated passages and from them weaving a pattern of action which is then deemed to be the revealed mode of acceptable worship of the Father.

In the language of Jesus and in the practice of the primitive saints every thought, word and deed, engaged in by those in Christ, out of a sense of reverence for God, was an expression of worship. There was no distinction between the spiritual and the secular. There was no specific ritual unvaryingly observed for the simple reason that the whole body was offered as a living sacrifice and whatever was done in the body was worship. One did not go in and out of Christ, and everything performed was offered to him as a part of the life of the fellowship.

The first disciples were Jews and they did not cease to be Jews when they acknowledged Jesus to be the Messiah. They continued to observe the sabbath as well as the passover and other feasts. Those in Jerusalem daily went to the temple at the hours of prayer. All circumcised their male children. In outlying provinces, the Nazarenes, as they were called, continued in the synagogues which they had been accustomed to attend. When Saul breathed out threats and murder against the disciples he went to the high priest “and asked him for letters to the synagogues at Damascus, so that if he found any belonging to the Way, men or women, he might bring them bound to Jerusalem” (Acts 9:2). Later he said of the saints, “I punished them often in all of the synagogues” (Acts 26:11). The thousands who believed in Jerusalem were all zealous for the law.

There was one feature of the gathering of the disciples which was distinctive— the breaking of the bread. At first this was done daily and in conjunction with the regular meal shared by those who gathered in private homes. It was not regarded as a sacred service as opposed to other meals, for every occasion of eating together was sacred to the Jews. Jesus had introduced the practice of eating and drinking in memory of his death at the passover, which was always a family feast and always observed in the homes. He had simply taken the bread and cup used in that feast and blessed them for his purpose, and the disciples at first continued the practice of observing it in conjunction with their daily meals.

As the predominant consciousness of the enjoyment of redemption brought under its influence and sanctified the whole of earthly life, nothing earthly could remain untransformed by this relation to a higher state. The daily meal of which believers partook as members of one family was sanctified by it. They commemorated the last Supper of the disciples with Christ, and their brotherly union with one another. At the close of the meal the president distributed bread and wine to the persons present, as a memorial of Christ's similar distribution to the disciples. Thus every meal was consecrated to the Lord, and, at the same time, was a meal of brotherly love. —Augustus Neander in “The History of the Planting and Training of the Christian Church.”

The Lord's Supper . . . was not kept distinct at this period from an ordinary meal; it was the conclusion of ordinary meals, as it had been the conclusion of the Passover feast. The commemoration of redemption took place every time that Christians gathered around the family table. St. Luke says positively that it was observed from house to house . . . From all these observations, it appears that the distinction between the ordinary and the religious life had no existence for the primitive Church, because its ordinary life was raised to a height truly sublime. —E. De Pressense in “The Early Years of Christianity.”

The love-feast, in which were combined the ordinary meal and the religious service of the primitive Christians, was originally celebrated in Jerusalem every day. At its conclusion the broken bread and the consecrated cup was passed around to every one at the table. In the Jewish congregations the Jewish sabbath and festivals were observed. Paul denied that any one was bound by positive law to show a preference of one sacred day above another. —Dr. Charles Hase in “A History of the Christian Church.”

As time went on, the agape, or love feast, came to be shared as an overt demonstration of classless fellowship. The wealthier members brought hampers of food and the table was spread so that all, including those who were slaves, might eat together. The Lord's Supper was observed in connection with the meal, and it came to be reserved for the resurrection day, the first day of the week. From the simple act of eating together one change after another took place until a special ritual supplanted the simplicity.

Gradually the repast was parted from the religious act. The repast became more and more secular, the religious act more and more sacred. From century to century the breach widened. The two remained for a time together, but distinct, the meal immediately preceding or succeeding the Sacrament. —Dean Stanley in "Christian Institutes."

This last word (sacrament) calls for mention of the fact that the Lord's Supper is not so-called in the sacred writings. The word "sacrament," used to denote the soldier's oath of allegiance to the Emperor, was first applied to the breaking of the bread by Tertullian. Of equal importance is the observation that the Supper is not called "the communion" as so many, some of whom should know better, thoughtlessly refer to it in our day. "Communion" is a translation of koinonia, the word for fellowship or joint participation. All that we do as members of the one body or as joint partakers of the one Spirit, is part of our fellowship or communion. Singing, prayer, sharing of funds to relieve the needy, are all part of the communion. In fact the very word koinonia is used to designate the latter. The Lord's Supper is the communion of the body and blood of the Lord, but this is only one phase of our communion.

We believe the unbiased student must conclude that the early disciples had no procedural form for their meetings in which they broke bread from house to house. Their expressions of inner adoration by outward demonstration were no doubt spontaneous, and when they sang or prayed, it was not to conform to a ritual but in response to an inward motivation produced by the occasion. It is interesting to note that in a previous generation brethren actually regarded Acts 2:42 as "an order of worship” and debates were held and congregations divided over whether God would accept “worship services” in which the various items did not occur in the sequence mentioned. We are grateful that an increasing maturity is making both such ideas and the debates over them belong to the past and our brethren are outgrowing them.

With no intention of shocking our readers we suggest that if a community of saints fully grasped the significance of the Supper they might gather in solemnity and bless the cup and break the bread, and having remembered the Lord, retire to their own homes, or remain to eat together at a common table in mutual love for one another, and be wholly pleasing unto God. This in no sense argues that it would be wrong to sing, pray, exhort or teach, but it does point out that to make of all of these combined a ritual is without scriptural foundation. The tracts which declare that the Church of Christ is scriptural in “worship” because it has “the five acts of worship”— singing, praying, giving, preaching and the Lord’s Supper, are ridiculous when one takes off his party glasses and looks at the Word of God objectively.

The stress laid upon congregational singing, for example, shows how easy it is to read a practice into the text which you cannot find in it. And the passages cited to sustain it are twisted to confirm a point to which they were not even remotely related. In Ephesians 5:19 the recommendation to “address one another in psalms, hymns and spiritual songs,” is clearly set in a context of daily living. The apostle contrasts the conduct of the saints with that of the devotees of paganism who became drunken at their feasts and engaged in lewd and suggestive songs. The saints are urged not to get drunk with wine wherein is debauchery but to address one another in songs which will strengthen and elevate, “always and for everything giving thanks in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ to God the Father.” The apostle was telling brethren how to behave instead of getting drunk. He was not regulating their “public worship.”

The fact is that no one can take the new covenant scriptures and prove that the saints had congregational singing when they assembled in one place. It can be shown, I think, that they had solos when someone was moved to break forth in a chant which conveyed a message to the assembly. It is a commentary on our absurdity that in many places if a man has a good reading voice and stands up at the Lord's table and reads the twenty-third psalm he is commended; but if he has a good singing voice and sings the same psalm in moving fashion he is reprimanded. In the community of saints at Corinth Paul says, "When you come together each one has a hymn, a lesson, a revelation, a tongue, or an interpretation." The modern congregation which follows "the original pattern" would not tolerate any of these. It is apparent that the pattern we seek to impose upon the scriptures originated with our fathers, and not with our grandfathers, the apostles.

The very best that could be done with Ephesians 5:19 and Colossians 3:16 would be to establish responsive singing or antiphonal chants if it could be shown (which it cannot) that these passages relate to public and corporate expression of praise. We do not teach and admonish one another while all singing the same thing at once. If we already know what we are singing we cannot be taught it. If we do not know we cannot be teaching others. Our four-part harmony would not make it possible to address one another, or to instruct and admonish one another, in any event. We like to sing if we can, and to try if we can't but we should admit candidly that the way we do so is pretty much our own traditional devising. There is nothing wrong about it and no doubt the Father is as glad to hear us sing as we are to hear our children do so. He is not happy when we fall out over means and seek to clout each other over the head with either our traditions or hymnbooks.

This brings us to the place where we can inject the thought that all of us may worship the same God and yet that worship may be expressed in different ways. It is doubtful that worship can ever be divorced from our own personal temperament and it is probably not desirable that it should be. In the final analysis all worship is individual by its very nature, and all of us are not only products of our own genes and chromosomes, but of our environment, training and association. As members of the one body we engage in certain communal expressions, but one community differs from another, as “one star differeth from another star in glory.” The true worshiper worships in spirit and in truth, but this worship does not always take the same outward form in every place.

A congregation near a large college campus whose singing director is professor of music at the university may be so trained in music appreciation and technique that their reverence could only be expressed in selections such as “The Hallelujah Chorus” by Handel, or “O Sacred Head” from Bach’s “Passion According to Matthew.” At the same time a rural congregation down in the hills, such as the one from which I came, would be bored if forced to even listen to such stately strains and would use after-beat songs or such mundane numbers as “I’ve Got a Mansion” or “On the Jericho Road.” Let not the Hallelujah choristers despise the after-beaters, and let not the after-beaters judge the Hallelujah choristers, for God has welcomed them. Let every one be fully convinced in his own mind.

By the same token, if Christ is taken to the people in Africa who express themselves by clapping their hands and swaying to a chant, they should not be compelled to conform to our culture as the only proper way to worship God. There is a difference between Lubbock and Lusambo, or Greenville and Gondokoro. An American restoration movement in Southern Rhodesia makes about as much sense as a Southern Baptist Church of Outer Mongolia. Congregations should never seek to plant others “according to their own image and after their own likeness.” There are enough imperfect ones already.

composed of stones in the area. Not all stones are alike and a house built with hewn limestone in one territory will not look like one of field stone or cobblestones in another. So it is with God's house. It is not the conformity externally but the indwelling Spirit which is vital to the divine-human relationship. The building of God in Corinth did not look like the one at Jerusalem but both were a habitation of God through the Spirit. It is righteousness, not ritual, which joins us to the Lord.

Closely allied to the misunderstanding of worship and ritual is a controversy now creating tension and division among non-instrument Churches of Christ. It has to do with installation of kitchen and eating facilities in the meetinghouses. Strange as it will seem to the majority of our readers, congregations have actually been divided over such matters. I have been to places to speak where arrangements were made for the sisters to serve coffee and cookies after the lecture, and brethren have informed me that they would not attend and by their presence sanction "eating in the church house." I respect their scruples of course, but I regret they have not yet learned there is no such thing as "a church house" and there cannot be. There is a church and there are houses, but what is "a church house"? All of us use the term and I suspect that all of us thereby demonstrate our ignorance.

The problem is complicated because those who provide the facilities often refer to the room containing them as "the fellowship hall." Frequently the brethren in attendance are invited to remain for "the fellowship" following "the service." This is the language of Ashdod. The peculiar thing is that one group limits worship to a few ritualistic acts performed in "the service;" while the other limits fellowship to a few physical acts done afterwards. Is not singing a part of fellowship? Is not prayer? Is not mutual study of the word? Then why announce that after dismissal the brethren are invited to stay and enjoy a period of fellowship? Do we have to retire to a special room for fellowship? It is apparent that if the brethren are not in the fellowship before the coffee is poured they will not drink or nibble their way into it.

Everything we do in relationship to Christ is done in the fellowship and is a part of it. We do not go in and out of the fellowship by going in or out of buildings and halls. By the same token, all that we do in word or deed, whether assembled or alone, when done to revere God, is worship. We belong to Christ as a whole and we must glorify him in both body and spirit which are his (1 Cor. 6:20). We worship the Father when we eat together in mutual love as certainly as we do when we eat the bread and drink the cup. Whether the early saints congregated in the temple to give a corporate expression of worship or ate dinner together in a private home, they were praising God. "And day by day, attending the temple together and breaking bread in their homes, they partook of food with glad and generous hearts, praising God and having favor with all the people" (Acts 2:40).

All of God's children are being turned into schizophrenics by an attempt to legislate differences between secular and sacred areas. No such distinctions exist in God's word. All we have comes from God. We have nothing that has not been given us. Every good gift is from above. Every exercise of life done with an eye singled to his glory is a manifestation of worship. In this day of urbanization with its lonely crowd, we need to share our time and our lives with each other more often than ever. The early Christians in a cruel pagan world banded together, visited together and ate together, strengthening each other to combat the forces of evil about them. What difference does it make where the food is prepared or served? God has no sacred buildings. He has no shrines or sacerdotal cloisters. There is a difference between eating because of the love of a feast, and partaking because it is a feast of love.

It is true that brethren can abuse the act of eating together. But this is no argument against doing so when the abuse is absent, and the abuse comes from motivation and not from the act. Perhaps the greatest abuse of all comes from separating and segregating the various facets of life until worship is relegated to a certain day, a certain place and a certain ritual, to the utter exclusion of the daily life. We are the victims of traditions which have been equated with the will of God, and which force us once again into the throes of the Judaistic spirit.

Worship and Money

Error is none the better for being common, nor truth, the worse for having lain neglected.— John Locke.

Worship is not the mere performance of acts. It is not engaging in a prescribed ritual. Worship is the prostration of the heart, filled with a sense of dependency, before the presence of God. It is tuning the soul to vibrate in harmony with the infinite, the reaching out of the hands of the inner self to draw God close and to draw close to God. We do not worship because we sing; we sing because we worship. We do not worship because we pray; we pray because we worship. Worship is the fountain of the great deep within us. Singing and prayer are two of the vessels which draw the water to the surface. There are many different vessels and the true worshiper reaches for the one which best suits his need of the hour.

Public praise and community sharing in the expression of worship may be regulated by calendar and clock, but the true worship is always that of the true worshiper. It is constant and consistent. It is the breathing of the spirit of one who is dead and whose life is hid with Christ in God; the palpitation of the inner heart of one in whom Christ dwells as a royal tenant in a frail tenement of clay. To such a person there is no distinction between what is God's and what is his. All artificial distinctions between secular and sacred are broken down and wafted away upon the winds of the Spirit.

A lack of recognition of this causes men whose vision suffers from spiritual astigmatism to make it seem that differences exist where none appear. We are constantly treated to meticulous arguments, elaborately prepared, dealing with what the church may do and what the individual Christian may do. This is a little like arguing what the arm may do apart from the body, or what fruit may be borne by a branch apart from the vine. In the final analysis all of this comes down to what the congregation of saints may do to further the cause of Christ and the answer will be found in the thinking of those who compose the community, as that thinking has been formulated by study of the word of God, meditation upon it, and mutual exchange of ideas concerning it.

It is true that those in Christ Jesus may be mistaken about the divine requirements of service as to nature, extent and subject. They may also be mistaken as to the method or mode by which such service should be accomplished. But if they are governed by integrity they will be compelled by conscience and commitment to fulfill that which they believe to be His will for their lives, in that manner which commends itself unto them as being best adapted, under His grace, to achieve His ultimate purpose through themselves. Any mistake of such nature, regardless of how grave it may appear to me, does not negate the relationship or responsibilities of brotherhood. I must not destroy or dissolve the family ties simply because my own understanding leads me to question either the extent or the method of such service rendered in an attempt to give recognition to the Lordship of Jesus.

Those who are my brothers in Christ and who mistake what the Father wants them to do, or how they should do it, made no mistake in becoming children of God, but as children of God they may make mistakes. This is one thing they have in common with all of the other children. If I refuse to have anything to do with them, it is not a perfect, or infallible child refusing recognition to those who are mistaken. Rather it is a case of one who makes mistakes shunting aside those who make different mistakes. None of us have any difficulty with those who make the same mistakes as ourselves. They are “loyal” for loyalty is actually being ignorant to the same degree, when used in a partisan sense. That is why it is so difficult to be a good partisan— one must be so selective about his mistakes, and be certain that he is always mistaken about the “right” things!

TO BE LIKE JESUS

Men have peculiar notions about how to become more like Jesus. It is generally believed that we should study and investigate the sacred scriptures and amend our thoughts and lives in conformity with God’s revelation, by eliminating our mistaken views and ideas. This is eminently correct. But it is also thought that by doing this we must cease to respect, revere and associate with those who still hold the same mistaken views. Thus, as our knowledge broadens, our circle of fellowship narrows. We not only put off our outgrown clothing but we also put out of the house all who do not immediately order the same size suit as our new one, in spite of the fact that they have not altered in mental girth.

It does not require a philosopher to figure out that, on this basis, the first one to arrive at perfect understanding of God’s will would not be in fellowship with any other person. I am certain that most of us will agree that Jesus perfectly understands the Father’s will. By such fallacious reasoning as has guided us in the past he should have nothing to do with any of us. Yet he loves us all, mistaken though we are. It seems certain, then, that the more we become like Jesus, the greater number of mistaken brethren we will love and cherish. Our problem is that we have forgotten we are to “grow in grace and knowledge of the truth.” Knowledge cannot tolerate ignorance but grace can. When knowledge is extended ignorance is driven out to the degree of extension, but grace can be extended to some fairly ignorant individuals, a fact of which we are all living examples.

Increasing knowledge, unaccompanied by expanding grace, can transform men into intellectual snobs and insufferable bores. Knowledge puffs up but love builds up. It is a wonderful thing to see a man climb to a higher ledge of understanding but knowledge which only concerns itself with one's present status and forgets those who are still struggling below suffers from memory lapse. Certainly it is a hindrance when one must pause upon each ascending plane to worship himself awhile before going on. Our readers must pardon these preliminary and diversionary observations. I want to devote the remainder of our space to an actual problem which is divisive among the non-instrument Churches of Christ.

THE SCHISMATIC SPIRIT

The brethren, including myself, have generally divided what we term "the work of the church" into three separate departments— evangelistic, educational and charitable. I'm about ready to challenge in my own thinking the whole arbitrary arrangement. In the light of maturing concepts it seems a little childish. You cannot draw a line between work and worship. They are the same as God views them! And you cannot sort out the various facets of our intricate and interwoven relationships with each other and the world and toss them into three bins neatly labeled with compartmental tags. I think that a great deal of the writing appearing in partisan journals in which brethren have the one body going off on tangents leading in three different directions at the same time is really a great deal of political maneuvering calculated to make the average saint so dizzy he will settle for the easy way out and turn his money over to the Establishment and let those "that appear to be somewhat" take the responsibility for dispensing it.

Currently the more orthodox segment of the non-instrument division of the disciple brotherhood of the restoration movement (it is becoming ever more difficult to keep things straight), is being harassed by pressures from a number of brethren about the support of institutional orphan homes, Herald of Truth, etc. In a good many localities brethren who once sat together at the table of the Lord are now separated into warring camps. They castigate each other with the old familiar designations of “Liberal” and “Anti” borrowed from other civil wars of the past.

I am not attached to either party. For that reason one of the few things left upon which they both agree is that I am “a brother in error.” This is good! It makes it possible for me to love them all. I am not the least bit interested in injecting myself into their factional conflict. Of course I am distressed that they have turned the sword of the Spirit against each other and have further shivered and splintered the family to pieces, however, I am practical enough to expect these things to occur until brethren come to be led by the indwelling Spirit. I am interested solely because the spectacle which they present to a startled world grows out of some interpretations which are probably baseless. A good deal of the argument centers around implications drawn from the scriptures which have been woven into a pattern of creedalism. I shall deal with one example. It is a part of modern Church of Christism that there are “five acts of worship” which the congregation must observe on the Lord’s Day, and that one of these is “laying by in store,” that is, contributing money to the congregational program. The rules, regulations, and legalistic traditions which have sprung out of this are about as ridiculous as they are deemed binding.

In many places men are taught that they must contribute every Lord’s Day if they truly worship God. This is the responsibility of every individual. If one is paid on the first of the month, he divides what he intends to “give to the church” into four or five equal parts, depending on the number of Sundays in the month, so he can perform this little ritual each Sunday. If he is married he may allot his wife a dollar to drop in so she can also “worship.” Single women and widows are expected to “worship” in contributing but are forbidden to “worship” in deciding upon expenditures, being barred from “business meetings.”

In some places, regardless of circumstances, no collection is ever taken at any other meeting upon any other day, although brethren have become adept in evading this while making it appear they do not. It is not uncommon to hear men say, “We only take up one contribution, and we do it on the day the Lord commanded, and just as the pattern dictates.”

There are brethren who believe that every charitable act must be done “through the church,” which means “out of the treasury,” so that “the church will get the glory.” The giving of alms has been outlawed in favor of organizational dispensing of funds. A more modern dogma is the exact opposite. It affirms that only a member of the church can be helped out of “the treasury” and “the Lord’s money” must be used to feed no one but a saint. A saint is one who is a member of the party! Others must be fed by individuals. One can keep enough out of the plate (it does not become the Lord’s until you turn loose of it) to feed the children of a non-member who are starving, but once he has dropped it in the basket he cannot get it back and feed that same family. The intricacies involved in the applications and interpretations of these laws have developed some outstanding legal talent which would have been the envy of the scribes and Pharisees with whom Jesus contended. They did a fair job of it but were handicapped because they did not have the advantage of doing it “in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ.”

BASIS OF THIS LEGALISM

All of these fantastic rules have grown out of interpretations of 1 Corinthians 16:1, 2, with certain other unrelated texts brought to bear. For obvious reasons, which we will not trouble to enumerate, the saints in Judea were in hard straits economically and required a sustained “poverty fighting program.” The brethren in Jerusalem requested Paul to remember the poor and he declared he was eager to do this very thing (Gal. 2:10). He conceived the idea of taking an offering from the Gentile congregations for this special need for several reasons. First, he considered that the Good News had been originally proclaimed in Jerusalem and sent from there to the Gentiles, and “if the Gentiles have come to share in their spiritual blessings, they ought also to be of service to them in material blessings” (Romans 15:27). Second, he hoped to batter down prejudice through such sharing although he was concerned that the brethren in Jerusalem might resent taking anything from the uncircumcised and he urged others to pray “that my service for Jerusalem may be acceptable to the saints” (Rom. 15:31). Paul probably came to Corinth about 52 A.D. and when he planted the community of saints he apparently said nothing about “taking up a collection as an act of worship” when they met. There is not a hint that they practiced such an arrangement and a good indication they did not. Five years later he wrote his first letter to them and in it directed them to take a contribution for the poor saints in Jerusalem as he had already instructed the communities in Galatia to do. This was in no sense an apostolic command for a “public act of worship” as our more legalistic brethren so glibly refer to it.

1. Paul specifically states it was not a command. “I say this not as a command, but to prove by the earnestness of others that your love is also genuine” (2 Cor. 8:8).

2. Although he directed communities in Galatia and Achaia to make contributions he did not direct those in Macedonia who were in extreme poverty to do so. He did rejoice that some of them asked to be included, “of their own free will, begging us earnestly for the favor of taking part in the relief of the saints.”

3. That it was not a regular practice of the congregations to take up a contribution is evident from the fact that the community at Corinth had been in existence four years before they began to do so. “It is best for you now to complete what a year ago you began not only to do but to desire” (2 Cor. 8:10).

4. It was simply a matter of congregational discretion and decision. “For Macedonia and Achaia have been pleased to make some contribution for the poor among the saints at Jerusalem” (Romans 15:26). This is a far cry from “the law of God on worship” as taught in the average orthodox pulpit.

5. It was a voluntary gift and not an exaction of law. “So I thought it necessary to urge the brethren to go on to you before me, and arrange in advance for this gift you have promised, that it may be ready not as an exaction but as a willing gift.”

LAYING BY IN STORE

In a rather exhaustive study of 1 Corinthians 16:1-4, which was published in Restoration Review I showed that the weight of scholarship is in favor of the idea that the contribution on the first day of the week was laid up at home and not brought until Paul and his fellow-travelers arrived. At that time the members produced what they had saved and turned it over to them to be taken to Jerusalem. This seems to be the only way to satisfactorily view the original language employed.

On the first day of every week let each of you put on one side and store up at his home whatever gain has been granted him; so that whenever I come, there may be no collections going on. (The Modern Speech New Testament, Richard Francis Weymouth).

The day after the Sabbath let each of you put by savings as he has prospered, so that collections do not have to be made when I come. (The Authentic Version, Hugh J. Schonfield).

Every Sunday each of you is to put aside and keep by him a sum in proportion to his gains, so that there may be no collecting when I come. (New English Bible New Testament).

On the first day of the week let each of you put aside and save something from his earnings; so that the money has not all to be collected when I come. (The New Testament in Plain English, Charles Kingsley Williams).

Dr. Augustus Neander, in his History of the Training and Planting of the Christian Church, is one voice among many, saying virtually the same thing. He writes:

But Paul, if we examine his language closely, says no more than this: that every one should lay by in his own house on the first day of the week, whatever he was able to save. This certainly might mean, that every one should bring with him the sum he had saved to the meeting of the church, that thus the individual contributions might be collected together, and be ready for Paul as soon as he came. But this would be making a gratuitous supposition, not at all required by the connexion of the passage. We may fairly understand the whole passage to mean, that every one on the first day of the week should lay aside what he could spare, so that when Paul came, every one might be prepared with the total of the sum laid by, and then by pulling the sums together, the collection of the whole church would be at once made.

All of the talk about “our money” and “the Lord’s money” is without foundation, notwithstanding the interpretation commonly imposed upon the case of Ananias and Sapphira. All I have is the Lord’s, and I am Christ’s and Christ is God’s. The new covenant scriptures know nothing about a “church treasury” or a “church budget.” There is not one iota of authority for taking up a collection to erect a meetinghouse, to own real estate, or to promote and advertise an evangelistic campaign. This does not argue that any of these are wrong.

Probably the best and most efficient way to deal with our financial obligations is to take up a collection when needed. We do not object to a congregation of saints having a bank account, a treasurer, a financial statement, or a weekly (or even daily contribution and distribution) collection. That is probably none of our business. We simply object to quoting scriptures for such arrangements when those scriptures are not remotely connected with our traditional “pattern.” We will probably be more honest if we quit trying to quote substantiating (?) scriptures for all we do and admit that we do a lot of things as we do because they work better, or because we have borrowed some ideas from our sectarian neighbors and friends who tried them out and proved their workability.

Certainly there are things we should do without involving the whole community. We have various relationships in Christ. These are not discarded in the act of becoming disciples, although they are sanctified. A good example is the care of widowed parents or grandparents. “Where a widow has children or grandchildren let those first learn to discharge their filial duty and to make suitable return to the authors of their being, for this is well-pleasing in God’s sight.” Filial duty is not cancelled or negated by our relationship to Jesus. God smiles upon our continual recognition of it.

“Should any believers have widows to look after, let them give them assistance and not burden the community, so that lone widows may be provided for.”

There is nothing said here about how widows should be cared for by either the believer or the community. Paul was not intending to lay down a comprehensive rule or law, nor to spell out details. The point is that the community of saints is obligated to see that widows do not suffer from neglect. The community may, or may not, create a common fund or treasury from which to dispense aid. This is up to the community to determine. Different communities will probably approach the problem in various ways.

But to include “giving each Sunday” as “an act of worship” and as an identifying mark of “the Lord’s church,” and to make this a criterion of loyalty to Jesus and even a test of fellowship, only shows how creedalistic and legalistic we can become under guise of being scriptural. In doing so we demonstrate a woeful ignorance of worship and the nature of the community consisting of the called-out ones. To divide the brethren into warring factions over such opinions is to do despite to His Spirit of grace. Our brethren need to cease playing God and start loving Him, for this is the real essence of worship!

This is the last article in our series called “Deep Roots.” It may not endear us to a great many of our brethren. We would probably be better off personally if we wrote upon an entirely different theme and there is no lack of other material crying for discussion. Yet there is a sense of editorial integrity and responsibility which makes it imperative that we take some risks for what we believe to be the common good. It may be that we are mistaken as to what is best for us all but our only recourse is to proceed prayerfully to do what seems proper to us and leave the eventuality with Him “whom having not seen we love.”

Read as far as you wish and if your interest wanes, do not go on. We will love and revere you as much as if you shared our concern and agreed with our method of approach. It is not at all necessary for you to concur in our personal convictions, or to acknowledge the timeliness of what we say. It is our hope that you will credit us with wanting to be helpfully critical even though you may resent the criticism and reject its value. Sometimes one gets to the place where he feels that he simply must speak. This in no sense implies that what he says will be justified or worthwhile.

I think I shall address what I have to say primarily to those identified with the non-instrument “Churches of Christ.” This is not because they are more partisan than other segments, because they are not. But there are some features of this article which will apply more specifically to these brethren than to some other groups, because of the persons involved.

The use of that last word triggers what I really want to talk about involvement. We live in a world that is seething and bubbling with new and strange ideas. There has never been another age in which there has been such a ferment of thought. Almost every standard and criterion which we have accepted as valid is being rudely challenged. It is a different world, a defiant world, a frightening world— yet one which has the greatest potential if its thoughts can be captivated and its energies channeled in constructive fashion. It is made to order for a real test of the vitality of the Christian faith and that test must be made if we are to live with ourselves and our consciences. It is not being made because we are not in real contact with the enemy.

The church has retreated to entrenched positions. It has surrendered ground to the enemy. It has called its forces into medieval fortresses or summoned them behind monastic bastions. It has gone on the defensive and is satisfied if it can repulse attacks. It will do little good to point out our increased foreign mission activity as a denial of what we say. We glory in every effort to take the message of hope to other parts of the earth. We thank God for every man and woman who leaves home to follow the star and seek him in foreign lands. But we dare not overlook the fact that in these days of intellectual growth, of affluence, and of power structures, it may be easier for us to win converts, or to make proselytes, among the ignorant and untutored of the earth, than to face a clever, trained and taunting foe at home. We may glory in our conquests afar to cover up the shame of our failure close at hand. If victory is equated with the number of scalps dangling from a sectarian belt it little matters where we get them so long as we swell the tally. This has no reference to how the converts look at Jesus. It refers to how the faction may look at converts.

For some reason I have the idea that we are in a vacuum of our own creation. As I listen to the talks that are made it is obvious that we are not of the world. That is good! It is also just as obvious that we are not in the world. That is bad! We have created our own little worlds. We are answering questions no one is asking. We know all of the answers but we do not understand the questions. The things in which we glory are often badges of our shame. We point to baptisteries heated in the winter time, and to auditoriums air-conditioned in the summer time, but the warmth of our love for all of our brethren is missing, and our hearts are cold to those who do not line up with our faction.

We are not training spiritual commandos who seek out the enemy and grapple with him on his own terms. We have no infiltrators who penetrate the ranks and fight their way out. Instead we develop men for remote attack and long distance bombardment. We furnish them with sermon outlines which fizzle out when the fuse is lit. We substitute homiletics for hand-to-hand encounter, and well-turned phrases for battle-scarred faces. Yet the only aggressive weapon furnished us is a sword. And a sword must be used for close in-fighting. It cannot be thrown, hurled or flung at a distance. And one does not become skilled in its use by playing mumble-peg with those who agree with him.

Sooner or later we shall have to decide whether we have a message which can captivate the intellectual world for Christ, or whether we must abandon this as a lost province. If we decide to withdraw from meaningful combat with this area on its own ground (the only way you can ever fight with a sword), we are committed to a war of constant retreat and attrition for intellectuality will expand and the Christian concept will be driven into a corner and eventually crowded out altogether in our land. We cannot count, in the future, upon having enough non-intellectuals or anti-intellectuals, to keep our cause alive. God has not guaranteed to keep enough folk ignorant that we can survive if we lose the whole intellectual world.

You will note my use of “meaningful combat.” This is the opposite of fighting merely for the sake of fighting, or of creating the impression that you are really fighting when you are making a noise, beating the air, or attacking a projection of your own imagination under the guise that it is the enemy. This can always be made to appear a victory when you may not have been near the real enemy at all.

GOD IS DEAD THEOLOGY

To illustrate what I mean, let us consider our approach to the “God is dead” movement in modern theology. Its importance cannot be laughed off or ridiculed out of existence. When a magazine like Time, for the first time in its history, appears without a picture on its cover, and has instead the three word question, “Is God Dead?” we are faced with a significant upheaval of thought. How do we react to it?

One good brother out west, whom I greatly admire, exhorts us to keep shouting “God is not dead!” So we take our positions on two hills across from each other and engage in a shouting match to see who can out-yell the other. If an issue can be settled in this fashion it may not appear as important to the people down in the valley as it does to those on either hill. And it will amaze you how many people are down in the valley.

I was at the Abilene Christian College lectureship when the program chairman announced to the packed auditorium that Dr. James D. Bales of Harding College had challenged Dr. Thomas J. J. Altizer, of Emory University, to debate whether God is dead. It was apparent that the great majority of those present were relieved that the Church of Christ had once more come to the rescue of God. They felt that God was in good hands. Moreover, it was another good chance for nationwide publicity. One good Texas brother said to me, “This’ll make the big guns in the east know we are on the map!” To defend God and let the guns, and the sons of guns in the east, know we are on the map, is a double victory. Besides, since God had saved us from our enemies it was deemed only fair that we should reciprocate and save him from his enemies when we could help out!

Please do not think I am sarcastic, cynical or disparaging when I say it is probably one of the best things that ever happened when Altizer did not accept the challenge. That is merely my personal judgment. I may be wrong. But you will note that one of the first things he said was that he did not want our brother from Arkansas accusing him of being a Communist. We had a medical doctor down home once who was a specialist on gall bladders. He had built up a fair reputation in that field, and folks came to rely upon him a great deal. The worst feature about it was that he wasn’t too good at treating other things, so when a patient came in, regardless of what he had, the doctor always diagnosed it gall bladder trouble because he knew how to prescribe for that. Altizer did not want to be diagnosed according to Dr. Bales’s specialty. And you’ll have to admit that Brother Bales is a specialist in his field.

But I think that we have to face up to the fact that the kind of God whom Brother Bales represents could never die. You have to live before you can die, and I am not certain the kind of God Brother Bales projects (and I once did the same thing) ever lived, except in an overwrought partisan imagination. You see, our brother believes that the God of the universe has focussed his fatherly love exclusively on members of the non-instrument Churches of Christ. We are the loyal ones and his special favorites. Our brother thinks that “the Lord’s church” is identical with the branch of non-instrument “Church of Christ” with which he is affiliated and that the Father dispossesses his children and puts them in exile if they do not agree with us on the millennium or music.

I confess that I'm a little perturbed in heart because I wonder if the kind of God whom we have proclaimed may not have something to do with some of the so-called "Christian agnosticism" of today. We have made a pretty small God out of the Almighty. I know one brother who thinks the entire kingdom of heaven consists of six or seven congregations in three states. I know another who says he can count all of the faithful gospel preachers on his fingers, and he lost one of his thumbs in a sawmill accident.

THE MODERN PHILOSOPHY

I've been reading quite a bit that our brethren have written about the "God is dead" movement and the more I read the more convinced do I become that the writers know little, if anything, about what these philosophers are saying. To us it all seems relatively simple. Some philosophical crackpot has suggested that God has been shot down with nuclear weapons, strangled by space explorations, or poisoned by our technological discoveries, and is now a corpse. The thing to do is to quote, "The fool has said in his heart there is no God," and the Bible says to, "Answer a fool according to his folly," which, being interpreted, is to brand him a fool and not answer him at all. There are several things wrong with our approach. One is that it satisfies us but it does not satisfy those whom we seek to answer because it does not touch what they are really saying or questioning. Nothing falls flatter in a dialogue session on a university campus with students drawn from all walks of life, than the average article from The Firm Foundation or The Gospel Advocate. The same thing can be said about a dialogue meeting with representatives of the Roman Catholic and Protestant parties. I know because I am in direct confrontation regularly with all of these. I am driven to go among them and witness to my faith.

To pinpoint the problem we face, let us ask a few questions and understand them, before we start to answer them. What does Thomas J. J. Altizer mean when he says that God is dead? What does he mean by “Christ?” What does he mean by “darkness?” Does he acknowledge that God was manifest in the flesh of Jesus? Who should answer these questions? Obviously, Thomas J. J. Altizer should do so. And when he does we see how much his conclusions are the fruit of the thinking of Dietrich Bonhoeffer, Paul Tillich, Rudolf Bultmann, John A. T. Robinson, and others. Thus we are truly dealing with a “movement” and not with an isolated individual and unrelated ideas.

God is dead. Altizer declares he made this pronouncement only after vigorous mental wrestling with the terms “transcendent” and “immanent” as they are applied to the concept of God. A transcendent God is one who exists above and beyond the world of which we are a part. He looks down upon it and surveys it from afar, as a Being outside of it. He is not one with the world. He is a “wholly other.” A university student in one of our campus encounters told me publicly that the God about whom he was taught as a child was “just not with it.”

An immanent God exists in the world, and to some extent, as the world. He merges or blends with the world and to the extent that he does is indistinguishable from the world. When carried to its ultimate, I think that immanence becomes pantheism. God is identified not only with the universe but as the universe. Nature, including all of its animate forms and man, would be God. I have always conceived of God as both transcendent and immanent, because he is omnipotent and omnipresent, so there has been no dilemma for me. But I am not a theologian, and it seems that theologians thrive better when they have dilemmas.

Dr. Altizer declares that he accepted the incarnation as a historical fact but he reasoned that if God was in Christ, he emptied himself of his transcendence and became immanent.

God was in the world. He was in the flesh. He had become wholly immanent. According to this thinking God did not become all of the universe. He was immanent only in Christ at first, but he did not again assume transcendence, and is still in the universe becoming ever more immanent. He will continue to do so until his immanence swallows up all else, and God will become all in all. When Dr. Altizer talks of the death of God he refers only to the passing from a state of transcendence to one of immanence.

In this modern complex thought “Christ” is made to mean that point at which God divested himself of transcendence and entered the world. Altizer calls Jesus of Nazareth “the original Christ” because it was in him that God broke into the world and became a part of the created universe. He claims to accept the historical fact of the Logos (Word) becoming flesh, and that God was in Christ. But he does not believe in the resurrection of Christ and therefore rejects the idea of the ascension, coronation and glorification. It is his view that God is still in the world, moving ever toward greater immanence, and that there will be a final Christ, a Godhead in which there will be a wholly new creation— a new man, new world, and a new existence all embodied in a God who is all in all. It is his view that if God returned to heaven and again assumed transcendence this ultimate could not occur. God can become all only by being immanent and by conquest of the universe through being a part of it and extending himself to embrace it more fully and completely.

To Dr. Altizer it appears that man is groping in darkness, but this darkness is linked with what he would brand as a misconception of the resurrection. He believes that the body of Jesus decomposed in the tomb and that by pinning our hope on the resurrection of that body we are projecting a false hope. He says that “darkness is the body of the dead God” and it is his theory that if we will acknowledge the incarnation and crucifixion as real and recognize the latter as the end of transcendence we can be delivered from the power of darkness and translated into the freedom and liberty of the immanence of God.

I have taken the time and space to be thus specific for several reasons. First, I hold that we must clearly understand what we face and what we oppose before we develop our attack, lest we be found to fight against an image of our own creation. Secondly, I think it is a matter of personal integrity that I state the views of another, especially an opponent, in terms acceptable unto him. If I have misunderstood Dr. Altizer, or in any sense conveyed a wrong impression of what he believes, I sincerely apologize to him. I think he must also grant that the exponents of “the new theology” are not always clear and definitive in their Statements. They employ a considerable amount of professional clerical jargon.

Thirdly, I would have our readers recognize that we face a clever and subtle foe (I speak of the theology and not of its exponents) which takes terms we have always used and employs them in such fashion as to completely warp their original sense and make them delusive and deceitful. Having said this much I must confess I am not afraid of the ultimate influence of this theology on the Christian concept for the simple reason that it is an old theology warmed over and served up with new dressing, and Christianity faced it many centuries ago.

THE ROLE OF A RESTORATION MOVEMENT

What is the role of a movement such as is partially represented by the “Churches of Christ” if an impact is to be made upon the thinking minds on college and universities campuses in this day? Shall we retreat from the arena? Shall we continue to talk to ourselves and surrender the intellectual field to the devil? If we do so, are we fulfilling the task of the body of Christ in our generation? I am going to make a few suggestions.

I do this reluctantly and humbly and in full recognition of the prejudice with which some of my writings are read by the brethren whom I love.

1. The Church of Christ must come into the twentieth century. It is evident from most of the articles appearing in recognized journals that our brethren are not only heirs of a nineteenth century movement but they are still moving in the nineteenth century. Very little of what is being written in orthodox journals has any relevance to the life or conflicts of men and women in our present world.

2. We must close our ranks and recapture the vital unity of the Spirit. The bitter and frustrating wars of the past over cups, classes, the millennium, orphan homes, instrumental music, etc., no longer have any real significance. The tide of battle has swept on. If we continue our little pockets of civil war behind the lines, bushwhacking and sniping at our own brethren, not only will we not contribute anything worthwhile to the real conflict of the age, but we will not be in on the final victory. This in no sense means that one must surrender his personal convictions or that a congregation must change its practice as to cups, classes, or other things. These matters have absolutely nothing to do with fellowship in Christ or the unity created by the Spirit.

3. We must seek new ways of giving to the world demonstrations of the workability of our plea for unity in diversity, a unity centered in mutual recognition of the lordship of Jesus. Perhaps we need a "restoration Kirchentag." In Germany, each year, on a special day, multiplied thousands of Protestants from various parties meet in a common witness of their allegiance to the cross. This day is called "Kirchentag." What would happen in Los Angeles, Dallas, Houston, or Nashville, if there was a great rally of the members of the restoration movement who still believe in the validity of this ideal and heritage in spite of our disappointing showing in the past? Suppose such a rally was announced in every Christian Church and Church of Christ, and the members came overflowing a huge college stadium, with participants from every segment, even the smallest and most peripheral, reading, singing, praying and witnessing of their faith, without recourse to factional and sectarian attitudes. What a challenge for the Holy Spirit to work through them!

True, the next day all would return to their own factions and segments, just as do those who attend the Kirchentag, but they would never be quite the same again. Neither would the sectarian world around them. Nothing would make sectarianism tremble and quake as such a demonstration of unity. And what makes it impossible to do this but our own narrow, limited, illiberal and intolerant spirit?

4. As a move toward the recapture of a sense of involvement in the ecumenical age and a sane view of fellowship among the saints of God, brethren must start “levelling” with the world. They must quit using propaganda as bait with a hook concealed. Men are not “suckers” in this enlightened age. Let me be very frank with you. Radio and television programs are presented which make their pitch a tie-in with the restoration movement and plead for the unity of all believers. Smooth salesmanship is exhibited in using Hollywood stars who are members of the party. The word “ecumenical” is employed and it is made to appear that we are in the vanguard of the struggle for renewal of the church.

But when the chips are down, the brethren reveal that they are not pleading for vital unity at all, but for the same old sterile conformity. The only unity they recognize is that which would come from everyone becoming like the “mother church” which supervises the program. It is probably only fair to say that some of the featured speakers are dedicated men with high ideals. They are trying to make a relevant presentation. But those behind the scenes who “call the shots” are still making tests of fellowship which God did not make. Their dogmas are law. It sounds nice in polite company to talk about “liberty of opinion” except for one thing. With them there are no opinions, and consequently no liberty. They decide what will be “faith” to themselves, and also decide what will not be “opinions” to others.

Our brethren are still confessing the sin of others in causing division. We need a program in which the speaker will put his head in his hands, and before this whole nation, tearfully confess our own sins. The message of God should be free! The day is past when you can fool men into believing that everyone else on earth “interprets” the word of God, but we do not interpret it. We just take it for what it says. This childish and immature attitude has no appeal to intelligent seekers after truth. They know that elders are just as fallible as the pope, and for the same reason— all are human. Dressing a television program up in color does not alter its sectarian nature. The hooks on a luminous fishing plug are just as barbed as those on a homemade trout fly.

I commend brethren such as those at Hartford, Illinois, for the fact that for several years they have arranged free discussion with members of the Disciples of Christ, Independent Christian Churches and Churches of Christ. The elders are free men in Christ and therefore fearless.

5. The Churches of Christ should at once free their missionaries on foreign fields from sectarian restraint and permit them to share directly in the experiences, knowledge and association of all of our brethren and God’s saints laboring in the same area. If the missionaries do not possess enough stability that their judgment can be trusted they should be recalled. If sent forth to take the message of the cross of Jesus they should not be shackled, hampered and restrained by the sectarian attitudes “back home.”

to set up workshops, conferences, training sessions, and sharing events to which men of every segment of the disciple brotherhood in the region are invited as direct participants. It is silly, senseless, absurd and asinine, in this day of world ferment for us to export to foreign soil all of the trivial partisan divisions of the United States. Let all of the non-instrument Church of Christ men in foreign fields be given the right and freedom immediately to work with all of their brethren in the Lord, and that without threat of censure, reprisal or cessation of funds from their homeland. Our brethren have a hard enough time fighting Communism, atheism, secularism, and indifferentism, without having to fight other members of God's family in order to pamper a bitter sectarian spirit in their homeland. Free our missionaries from fear! Free them from exclusivism, aloofness, shallowness, bitterness and hate for brethren. Turn God's children loose in the Holy Spirit. Let us close the ranks in other parts of the earth so we can face paganism with a united front!

6. We must infiltrate the neo-pagan intellectual world of our day but we must not confuse intellectuality with paganism. Men must feel a distinct urge to train as commandos for Christ. They must risk all to recapture for Christ the lost province of higher education. The most effective "ministry" of our day may not be behind the pulpit but in the college classroom. Men are eager to attend universities. They struggle with examinations. They pay high tuition fees for the privilege. They are not so eager to sit in ecclesiastical structures. The "sacred desk" is not an ornately carved rostrum. It is where God makes an impact on the souls of men. In our day it may be a laboratory table or a teacher's desk in a high school biology class! Let us not be derogatory about the teaching of the saints within their own edifices. This is necessary! But let us not confuse this with the only "ministry" available to us.

We do not follow the example of Christ by remaining in our air-conditioned "heavens" with good people and angelic characters. Christ did not do that. He abandoned heaven for the world of men. He had no office room. He had no place to lay his head. His office was his function in the world. His office was his mission! We are doctoring people who claim to be well. If the sinsick ones want to be healed they must come to the office. We want to share in the glory without first sharing in the suffering of Jesus. Now is the time when we should be partaking of the suffering and shame of the cross. We should be moving among the lepers, the publicans, the prostitutes, the unwashed. It is possible we may exhaust our share of the glory, prestige and pomp on earth. If we do, God have mercy upon us. If we truly follow Jesus we will have to leave our heavens. We must enter the world. We are not acting like Jesus at all. Our pattern is the Pharisee!

7. We must recapture the word “witness” in our confrontation with the world. We must grasp its real significance. I grew up under the teaching that the apostles were the only witnesses for Christ and we must never apply the term to our work. It is true that the apostles were the chosen witnesses of Christ in his post-resurrection appearances. Thus they could testify of the reality of that resurrection. One can only testify to that which he has personally experienced or seen. Most of our brethren have had no real encounter with Jesus in their own lives, so they cannot be witnesses at all.

I am not in that predicament. I followed Jesus for years before I overtook him. We are walking together now. I knew a great deal about him then, I know him now! Regardless of what Dr. Altizer and others may say, I know that I serve a living Savior. I know what he can do because he has done it in my life. I believe that Jesus lived on earth in the flesh; I know he lives in my heart. This has happened to me. I am a witness of it and to it. I seek every opportunity to testify of what the grace of God has done. I will bear witness among philosophers, savants, theologians, publicans, prostitutes, Pharisees, Sadducees, members of the restoration movement or of any other movement.

There isn't anything mysterious or mystifying about it. It does not involve any emotional upset or agitation. I'm coldly practical, pragmatic and businesslike about it. I simply took Him at His word when he said that if I would open the door He would come in. I did, and he did! I know that he is not dead. Neither am I— now! I'm not excited as if company had come and we had to hurry up and do a lot of things before they left. He is here to stay. We've got a lifetime together and it is a life not regulated by time. I do not manifest any visible signs or demonstrations. I do not speak in tongues or have any special gifts. I have a lot of difficulty with English. But I have no difficulty with Jesus.

I know that I have passed from death unto life because I love the brethren. I have crossed the frontier into the life sector after years of patrolling in the dark along the border. I have received the Spirit of adoption and not the spirit of slavery again to fear. Perfect love has cast out all fear! I even find it possible to love my enemies. It is easy to love people whom I simply cannot like!

I have tested myself and I find that I love Thomas J. J. Altizer. If we ever meet I do not think I shall try to convince him that Jesus is at the right hand of God, by reading from the apostolic witnesses whom he does not accept. I shall rather testify that he is at my right hand so I shall not be moved. I shall simply look him in the face and say, "I love you, and I want to tell you about the One who made it possible for me to do so." That's what I mean by witnessing. Love is the power. I am simply the mouthpiece. Someday my mouth will be stopped by the hand of death clamped over it, but love will not be stopped by death. "There is nothing love cannot face; there is no limit to its faith, its hope, and its endurance." I believe that! I believe it with all my heart! I am willing to "bet my life" on it!

The Dynamic of God

The memories of yesterday do not completely disappear. There were the ardent meetings in little houses at rural crossroads, in brush arbors and in groves. We were quite partisan in those days, and as most partisans we were sure in our attitude of dogmatism, sure almost to the point of arrogance. We were the elect of God, the loyal group, the favorites of heaven. All others were outside the pale, sectarian, apostate, rejected, “without hope and without God in the world.”

It was easy then to determine who were the faithful. They were the ones who were sound on “the issues,” they opposed the items which were under the factional ban, they subscribed to and sent their reports to the loyal paper. They constituted the church that was established in 30 A.D. You could ascertain this by looking at the dates carved in cornerstones which were laid recently. They had the proper name as evidenced by embroidered velvet drapes hanging over the pulpit stands and citing Romans 16:16 as proof.

One can look back and see that we confused smugness with soundness, and sarcasm with steadfastness. But the Spirit of God can purge and purify, cleanse and consecrate, and save the souls of some who are steeped in their own self-righteousness. In every generation God needs living proof that His transforming power has not waned. If the life of an intolerant crusader for an exclusivistic party can be altered under the shattering force of the dynamic of grace, there is hope for all of the unwitting or unwilling victims of the factional complex which is a curse to the Christian challenge in our day.

I shall never forget when the Spirit opened up to my soul the full significance of the four-dimensional power of love which makes possible the attainment to fulness of being, even the fulness of God himself. I had often read the prayer of Paul for the saints as recorded in Ephesians 3:14-19. I had even taught the words on numerous occasions. But when I became convinced that I had been looking at the scriptures through partisan spectacles and their real meaning had been obscured, I prayed that my inner eyes would be illumined so that I could behold wondrous things in the Word. And then it happened!

No longer was the word of the Spirit a mere written code of laws, a compilation of sermon texts, or a collection of ammunition to use in verbal warfare with dissenting brethren. It was not something which I looked at, perused, or investigated from afar or from outside of it. It was in me and I was also involved in it. I found myself not with a book in my hand but with my hand in the hand of Another. It was not so much that a book was leading me to someone as that Someone was leading me through the Book. And I was experiencing a new joy, a new life, a sense of glorious fulfillment.

The fulness did not come simply by study, for it was something to know which was beyond knowledge. It was a personal experience, the sharing of life, eternal life, the life of the Spirit. Now I often go back and read the words. And I never lose the thrill. It is not a thrill from what is in them but from what is in me. I borrowed the title of this book— Deep Roots— from these words.

With this in mind, then, I kneel in prayer to the Father, from whom every family in heaven and on earth takes its name, that out of the treasures of his glory he may grant you strength and power through his Spirit in your inner being, that through faith Christ may dwell in your hearts in love. With deep roots and firm foundations, may you be strong to grasp, with all God's people, what is the breadth and length and height and depth of the love of Christ, and to know it, though it is beyond knowledge. So may you attain to fulness of being, the fulness of God himself.

The treasures of his glory! Curiosity prompts me to wish that I knew the extent of the deposit, but commonsense tells me that the moment I learned I would die in a burst of light. Even Moses who talked with God like a familiar friend had to be concealed in a crevice of rock so that the full glory would not shine upon him, and all he could behold was the receding glory.

Although I can never peer into the vault, I am free to step up to the window and draw from the treasure according to my need. And that which I receive does not diminish the supply one whit. The payment is made in the form of strength and power, actually the dynamic of God. This is made available through the Spirit in the inner being. This promise is precious to me. God not only supplies a knowledge of what is required through his word, but he supplies the strength and power to accomplish it through the Spirit.

Before I really knew about "the vast resources of his power open to us who trust in him" (Ephesians 1:19), I thought that I would just read the Bible frequently, memorize enough chapters, and have a proof-text for everything I did, and I would gradually develop into such a good character it would surprise God and he just would not have the heart to slam heaven's door in my face. But deep down inside I think I knew that I did not have the power in myself to overcome. I was frightened at my failures, frustrated by my fears, and worried about my weakness. Then I found out that the Spirit had not just "thrown the Book at me" to stand on the sidelines with divine arms folded while watching me struggle to make the grade.

The power was not in my spirit at all, for I was unspiritual, the purchased slave of sin. The power was in His Spirit. And His Spirit was in me! The very minute I quit trusting in self and began trusting in him, the resources of his power became open to me.

It happened just as he said it would! I have never been the same. Regardless of what happens I can never be the same again. Those who are waiting for me to “come back” to the old factional life might just as well call the dogs, the hounds of heresy, and go home. I am not coming back. Thank God for the strength! Thank God for the power! Thank God for the Spirit’s dynamic in the inner man! This is what makes it possible for Christ to dwell in our hearts by faith! Glorious, joyous, victorious faith! This is the victory that overcometh the world!

The faith, love, strength and power— all of them fruits of the Spirit— drawn from the depository of grace, granted unto us out of the treasury of his glory, these make possible our deep roots and firm foundations. Our roots must penetrate until they can entwine themselves around the Rock of Ages. Our foundations must go down, down, down until they find rest in him. It is not a knowledge of a system, of a way of life, of a moral code, or a creedal confession, which will enable us to stand against battering storms and lashing winds. We must know him, for this is eternal life. He said, “You search the scriptures, for in them you think you have eternal life . . . but you will not come to me that you might have life.”

Deep roots! These make it possible for us to be strong to grasp something with all of God’s people. Not those in a certain faction, or sect, or party, but all of them. And what is it that may be grasped? “The breadth and length and height and depth of the love of Christ.” No man can ever fully understand the love of Christ by merely reading about it, any more than one can understand mother love by studying the dictionary definition of it. He must experience it, be caught up in it and grasped by it before he can grasp it.

Once we come to know how blind and senseless and hideous sin really is, and see ourselves broken and scarred and worthless, and then realize that it was precisely in this abject state that God's love sought us, and kept on seeking until it found us and led us out into the sunlight, we can begin to appreciate its scope. Its breadth is great enough to encompass the whole world. Its length outreaches all of the ages that men can measure or imagine. Love never ends. Its height is such that it towers into the heavens. Its depth enables it to probe to the very bottom of the fathomless depression of sinful nature and rescue the shattered spirit drowning in the sea of its own depravity.

But while all of this is wonderful to think about and the description of it is impressive it does not work. The Transformation until it reaches out and takes hold of one individually. It is like a slave reading a treatise on freedom, or a starving mendicant thumbing through the colorful displays of a cookbook. Such activity is interesting as a means of passing away the time or for personal entertainment. But it is not to be compared with one coming into the dungeon and arousing the prisoner sleeping on his pallet of straw, unlocking his shackles, and whispering for his ears alone, "You are free now. I paid the price!" And that is what happens when you grasp the nature, the quality, the dimensions of God's love, for the first glorious moment.

It is tragic, I think, that most of us never appropriate the fulness which is available to us because we are afraid to love. This is often true in a physical sense in marriage. We are beset by inhibitions, restrained by taboos, and conditioned by lingering adolescent attitudes, so that we never truly mature in love, either in bestowal or acceptance. Of course we live together and share our intimacies, but always there are the anxieties deeply imbedded in the subconscious which prohibit our unrestricted yielding and we miss the fulness of untempered joy. One who cannot surrender all can never capture all.

No less is this true in the spiritual realm. It is probably an invariable characteristic of love. One draws upon the treasure of God, the riches of heaven, for love. And it must be used, not sparingly, but lavishly and liberally. One must never stop to count the cost. If he questions whether his love will be received or acknowledged or reciprocated, if he ponders what he will get out of it in return, he limits its height, or its breadth, or its depth. And when he does he must settle for less than the fulness of God. Love is to be sown in gay abandon, flung out to all, whether friends or enemies, worthy or unworthy. And perfect love casts out fear, all fear— fear of the cross, fear of what men may do to you, fear of the clan, the clique or the claue. Even fear of losing the love!

Love risks everything. It holds nothing in reserve. It never asks what the stakes are, it simply dumps all on the table. It drove a trembling, tearful prostitute to crash the gate at a feast to empty a flask of myrrh on the feet of Jesus, probably the only man she had ever met who loved her for her own sake and did not want her for his. It prompted a man of a despised racial minority to go out of his way to rescue an assault victim on the shoulder of the highway and to stand good for his financial needs without knowing what they would be. Love always “goes for broke.”

One who knows this kind of love knows something that is beyond knowledge. You cannot attain to it merely by the study of books, not even a sacred book. It cannot be caught up in a book, even one bound in leather and stamped with gold. You cannot reason it out and arrive at it for it is irrational by every standard of judgment on earth. But when you surrender to it you have fulness of being. Not just a full existence, but fulness of

I am wholly committed to the dynamic of God's love as the only power in the universe which can ever make whole that which has been broken. It can mend broken hearts, broken spirits, broken lives, broken bodies, broken minds, and broken characters. Nothing else can do so. It is useless to play around or experiment with anything else. Love is the only power which can span the gaps of a broken fellowship. It alone can batter down walls, remove barriers and open gates of access. Argument will not do it. Debating will not do it. Neither will conferences, committees, creeds or concordats. Nothing will do it but love!

Love is greater than tongues, prophetic utterances and supernatural knowledge, all of which can be quite empty. It is greater than voluntary impoverishment, martyrdom or supernatural faith. "There is nothing love cannot face." It faced the cross. There is no limit to its faith, its hope, and its endurance. That is why I have invested all of my feeble stock in Love, Unlimited. I have the key to the treasures of his glory. I have strength and power through the Spirit. I have God's dynamic in my inner being. With deep roots penetrating the soil of mercy and forgiveness, I want to be strong to grasp with all of God's people the four dimensional power of love.

With all of God's people! That is why I shall never again belong to a faction or fragment of the saints. That is why no man will ever again "line me up" with any sect or segment. I am not "coming back" to any party where I must hate some of my brothers to be loved by the others. I am sick and tired of the sham and hypocrisy of the whole sorry, sad and sordid sectarian mess. I intend to be a Christian and a Christian only! I do not intend, God being my helper, to settle for less than the fulness of God.

Whatever I grasp of eternal values from now on I will grasp with all of God's people. They are His and I am His, so they are mine and I am theirs. God grant us all that through the indwelling Spirit we may be able to know that inner dynamic which makes possible the fulness of being, through the four-dimensional power of love!

Words are the ripe fruit dangling from the branches of idea trees. Some of these trees are cultivated, others have sprung up voluntarily. The fruit is sometimes flavorful and delightful, sometimes bitter and acrid, and sometimes tasteless. But we could not exist without words and he who would condemn them must make use of words to do so. Words are the bodies with which ideas clothe themselves and assume visible form, and every word, like every living person, is composed of both body and soul.

In his memorable work On The Study of Words, Archbishop Trench says, “Often in words contemplated singly, there are boundless stores of moral and historic truth, and no less of passion and imagination, laid up— that from these lessons of infinite worth may be derived, if only our attention is aroused to their existence.”

Trench quotes from another eminent writer who said, “In a language like ours, where so many words are derived from other languages, there are few modes of instruction more useful or amusing than that of accustoming young people to seek for the etymology or primary meaning of the words they use. There are cases in which more knowledge of more value may be conveyed by the history of a word than by the history of a campaign.” We have found this true.

Who is not intrigued by the fact that “bootlegger” is derived from the days when men hid a flask of liquor in their high boot legs? Or that union and onion came from the same original and the latter signifies “many skins bound into one”? Or that “nasturtium” literally means “nose twister” because its pungent odor has an effect upon the olfactory nerves? We still speak of a style of writing because men once used a stylus, and we call a writing instrument a pen, from the Latin penna, a feather, because they later used quills.

There is a temptation to wander into a thousand of these little linguistic byways, but our task is a more serious and deliberate one. We propose, if we live and our Lord tarries in His coming, to devote the entire year to a study of words used by the Holy Spirit. Our aim will be to edify the brethren by sharing with them the result of rather intensive research. We will be seeking to lay hold upon the thoughts of God by grasping the words of God. We hope to make a simple presentation but not a shallow one. All penetration implies an approach in increasing depth and we will try to go deeper into His purpose for mankind.

The entire series will be entitled Apples of Gold. The choice of title will at once commend itself to most of our readers who will remember the proverb of Solomon as copied down by the official court scribes of the good King Hezekiah. “A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver” (Proverbs 25:11). A more literal rendering might be, “A word spoken in season is golden fruit in silver carvings.” The setting, or frame of reference for a word, has a distinct influence upon the impression it conveys, and just as diamonds are displayed in proper settings, so words are made distinctive by their context.

Judge Learned Hand once wrote: “Words are chameleons, which reflect the color of their environment.”

We invite all members of the fellowship of the concerned ones to stroll with us through the cool aisles of divine revelation as we pluck and examine the precious fruit of God's gracious Word. Great things lie ahead of us and we invoke His aid for our journey. May this year be profitable unto all of us in the Spirit!

Let us remember that "words once spoken can never be recalled!"

[Abstract]

When I was a little lad attending the village one-room school, we were issued a writing portfolio to encourage our study of penmanship. In addition to the paper with widely spaced lines required by novices, it also contained a heavy cardboard pad with strips of paper at the top, on each of which was printed a line of perfect writing to use as a sample. The student placed the sheet of practice paper with the top line immediately under the example and after copying it, thrust the paper up under it, and brought the next line into the same position. The process was continued until every line of the practice sheet was filled.

The secret of this system lay in the fact that one always had a perfect example in front of him. He did not copy from his own previous line and thus reproduce or exaggerate its imperfections. As a boy I did not realize this method of teaching was more than two thousand years old. I learned that when I came to know Jesus.

In 1 Peter 2:21 we are told, “For to this purpose you were called: because Christ also died for us, leaving us an example, that we should follow in his steps.” The word “example” means “a copy-head for use in writing instruction.”

The Authentic Version translates: “To this end you were called, for Christ himself suffered on your behalf, leaving you a copy, that you should follow in his traces.”

It is only when we pattern directly after Jesus that we are safe. When we use someone else as the example for our lives we tend to adopt his imperfections. Once, when we were erecting a meetinghouse, the carpenter working on the scaffold asked me to saw a dozen boards to fit the space between the window frame and the door. He marked one as a sample, but instead of using it for all, I used each one in turn to mark the next. By the time I handed up the fourth it would not fit at all, for each time I was gaining the width of the saw blade. God has provided an original pattern in Jesus and each of us should measure our lives by His, not by another for whom we have admiration. He is our Example!

I have always been thrilled with the stories of pioneers, men who dared to leave home and blaze a trail through the trackless wilderness so others might follow in their steps. This is the very description given of Jesus. In Hebrews 12:2 he is called “the author and finisher of our faith.” The word “author” is a translation of archegos.

This word can mean the point of origin from which a thing proceeds. Thus J. B. Phillips translates it as “Jesus the source and the goal of our faith.”

It can mean the starting-point of an endeavor, and since the context deals with the Christian race, the New English Version has it, “Jesus, on whom faith depends from start to finish.”

But it can also refer to one whom we describe as “breaking the ice” or “blazing the trail.” This is how I like to think of Jesus. The world was a jungle of sin and a wilderness of wickedness. He left a comfortable abode and plunged into this morass of evil and showed us the way through. He marked the path, put up signs to warn of danger spots, and left encouraging notes along the way for those who falter and are ready to give in or give up. I can think of a dozen such little messages tacked on trees along the road, which have caused me to keep on going when I was tempted to sit down and rest or “throw in the sponge” during the fight.

That is why my own translation reads: “Run with fierce determination the crosscountry race for which you enrolled, keeping your eyes fixed on Jesus who marked out the trail and finished the course, showing what it means to have real trust in God.”

In the days of the apostles the Roman Empire was a teeming mass of slaves, most of them owned by nobles and patricians. The fighting machine developed with living cogs had overrun the world and reduced the bulk of mankind to a condition of abject physical servitude. The Roman politicians lived always in a state of tension and fear produced by the possibility of a universal uprising and revolt of their captives.

As a means of identification of status each slave was required to wear a distinctive garb, a wrap-around apron of white, when he went anywhere in public. Thus his inferior social standing was ascertainable unto all, and his deference in demeanor was understood. Peter uses the very word for this white apron in 1 Peter 5:5, where it appears in the word “clothed.” The passage reads: “Yea, all of you be subject one to another, and be clothed with humility.”

Christians are slaves. The word rendered “servants” in such passages as Philippians 1:1 and Titus 1:1, is doulos, a bondslave. A slave belongs to another by right of capture or purchase. “The free man who received the call is a slave in the service of Christ” (1 Corinthians 7:22). The slave has no life or will of his own.

Our badge of subjection is humility. When we wear this white apron the world recognizes that Jesus is our Master. Humility is not cowardice for it takes a brave man to follow Christ. It is not weakness for one must be strong in the Lord and in the power of His might. It is not spineless servility but sincerity of service. It comes to the disciplined, not to the diffident.

Humility is the ready mind relinquishing rights to encourage others. It is the voluntary sacrifice of personal prerogatives to promote peace. It is sitting down on a lower step while another is elevated because of your effort. It is playing second fiddle while the soloist receives the applause for using the instrument you have tuned. It is calling the signal for another to carry the ball the last foot over the goal line after you have battered your way for fifty yards to place it in that position.

Humility is bending down to shake hands with a little child. It is saying, "Thank you!" to the Negro elevator man in your office without noticing that he is a Negro, and with no thought of being polite because of the civil rights agitation. It is stopping your car to enquire of the garbage man about his sick child because you are interested in the welfare of his family. If you do any of these to be seen of men, or because the neighbors are watching, it is not humility at all. It is pride of the worst kind. It is rank hypocrisy!

The New English Version reads: "Indeed, all of you should wrap yourselves in the garment of humility towards each other." J. B. Phillips translates it: "Indeed all of you should defer to one another and wear the 'overall' of humility in serving each other."

The Authentic Version puts it thus: "Always wear humility's apron with one another."

Strategy for Peace

Volume 29

[Abstract]

The day we first divided we ceased to be a unity movement and became a contributor to the sectarian complex. Our plea was no longer a force, our program became a farce.

When we began to make pieces of one another, our work as peacemakers in a strife-torn world came to an inglorious halt.

The rents in the fabric of brotherhood give the lie to our vaunted boast of loyalty to Jesus. We have denied his prayer, defamed his plan and derogated his purpose. Our factions are monuments to our failures, our parties proclaim our futility.

We must heal our breaches, repair our cleavages, and bridge our chasms, or we shall forfeit all right to speak in the ecumenical councils of the world. If there is not a sufficient dynamic in our program to hold us together it is a foregone conclusion that it can never have the power to draw all others together. Our approach has been immature, impractical and ineffective. While parroting pious platitudes we have become further fragmented. We are strangled by senseless slogans, crucified by childish cliches, and massacred by meaningless mottoes.

In our dilemma of division and in the interest of inspiring a definite strategy for waging peace I suggest very humbly the following guidelines.

1. Let all of us, in a deep sense of remorse and with unqualified repentance, acknowledge our guilt for perpetuating the partisan principles and positions inherited from our fathers. Let us desist from the puerile practice of pointing the finger of accusation at others as the sole cause of our disaster in the restoration experiment. The question is not who split the log, but who is going to put it back together. The need is not for pointing fingers but for helping hands.

2. Restore the cross of Jesus to the center of all Christian concern. Relegate all opinions, interpretations, and personal views to a secondary position. It is absurd, silly and ridiculous to make any view of instrumental music, the millennium, cups, classes or colleges, more important than the blood of God's dear Son, and to allow the relationship created by that blood to be negated by any blunder of those within it. Jesus did not give His life to purchase a non-instrument entity, a post-millennial party, or an anti-class clan.

3. Recapture the local autonomy of the congregation in truth as well as in theory. When a congregation of saints mutually and unanimously agrees to express its praise to God and to propagate His work in a certain manner, allow them to do so without reprisal and answerable to the sovereign rule of Jesus Christ as the only Lord. Let us renounce the rule of editors, preachers cliques and pressure groups. It is useless to oppose hierarchical domination in Rome and practice it among ourselves in America.

4. Recognize that fellowship is not endorsement but a family relationship produced by the indwelling Spirit in children of God. Our goal must be community and not conformity. The only unity possible for finite beings is unity in diversity. Harmony is not essential to fellowship but acknowledgment of fellowship is essential to achievement of harmony.

5. Let us begin at once the recognition both privately and publicly of all of God's children and our brothers. I am resolved never to be a partisan pawn nor to go any place which imposes upon me as a condition of my participation, the disregard of my brethren from another segment or faction. I will not insult the Father by cold disdain of His family. I shall not sell my birthright for the pottage of partisan praise or acclaim.

6. Substitute meaningful dialogue for debate, inviting all brethren to attend, and providing opportunity for all to question. To this end I am ready to meet any brother, or any group of brethren, one or a hundred, in public dialogue, at any time or any place which may be mutually agreeable. I think that the traditional crazy-quilt pattern of "fellowship" practiced by the "Church of Christ" is absolutely inconsistent, untenable and indefensible, when measured by the eternal purpose of God as revealed in the new covenant scriptures. I am ready to examine it and to have my own position examined freely and openly in brotherly fashion.

We can unite in Christ Jesus and point the world to a brighter and better day and none of us give up any truth he has ever held. But we must love Jesus more than we love our private opinions and public prejudices.

Paper Curtains

Mission Messenger (January 1967)

[Abstract]

Forgive me for this little article, but to me it is a tragic thing to see a people lose their freedom and not realize it. This has happened to a great degree to our brethren in many segments of “The Church of Christ.” They are victims of censorship, thought-control and pressure groups. Many hardly know what is going on among other heirs of the restoration movement, and what they learn must come through the “grapevine” or by chance discovery. The party organs filter to them only what “the powers that be” want them to hear. That isn’t a great deal. The paper curtains have been yanked down so no real light shines through the windows.

A short time ago I went to Nashville to visit the editor of one of the more influential journals in what might be designated the orthodox, mainstream, non-instrument segment of the restoration movement. I informed him of some of the tremendous things which are happening across various lines and asked if he would consider printing news items informing his readers of various meetings in which brethren of all factions, including his own, are invited to participate. I came away with two things: (1) A ball point pencil advertising the firm; (2) a very strong impression that the readers will be kept in ignorance, so far as possible, of what is transpiring in the whole church. Only news fitting the emasculated party pattern will be passed on to the subscribers.

This is characteristic also of the smaller factional journals. In each of these “news of the brotherhood” consists only of information of the doings of those circling about and kicking up dust in the party corral. Not a whisper of the activity of the great majority of those in the one body ever leaks through the sound-proofed walls of the clannish covert. In a religious atmosphere charged with electrifying possibilities these brethren dwell apart from the world He created, in little worlds of their own creation. The kingdom of heaven is circumscribed by their factional fences. Jesus is portrayed as a factional monarch whose only subjects are those who dance to the tune of fiddling editorials.

This type of tyranny is not limited to editors. In many areas the minister of the local “Church of Christ” is the self-appointed umpire for the index expurgatorius. A letter addressed to the congregation of saints inviting them to attend an open forum on fellowship and unity never reaches those saints at all. One must go over or around the preacher to reach the church of God, otherwise they will never know anything except what he wants them to know. He may know but they may not! The local preacher is frequently the greatest obstacle the Holy Spirit must overcome in the attempt to answer the prayer of Jesus for the unity of all who believe in Him.

We can present proof that many preachers not only refuse to convey to the congregations the letters of invitation addressed to them, but often do not even inform the elders of such invitations. It is bad enough to have someone pilfer your mail, but it is ridiculous to pay him a salary and provide him an office in which to do it. Hundreds of invitations to share in meaningful forums and dialogue sessions leading to re-study of our divisions are never mentioned to the people of God by the men in the front office, although bulletin boards are frequently cluttered with partisan trivia having not even a remote bearing upon our problems in this age.

What is the reason for this conspiracy to conceal facts from the flock? Obviously the basic motivation is the sectarian spirit. It is the same whether found in Rome or in our congregations. All sectarianism is alike in attitude. It always uses the same old weapons— censorship, boycott and threat of excommunication. But we think that fear also plays a great part with the elders and preachers among us. They know that God's people are becoming fed up with the narrow, bitter, factional programs which have produced division, strife and hate. They do not want them to know that someone is doing something about this sad and sorry mess. The humble brethren are ready for our plea. They do not want to make tests of fellowship out of things which God has not made conditions of salvation. Many of them endorse what we are saying in their hearts although still cowed by fear of reprisal if they voice it openly.

But better days are coming! The Spirit is mightily at work! God's people will be delivered into a full and glorious freedom. Meanwhile we shall continue our effort knowing that we do not walk alone! Not even editors and preachers can always thwart the Spirit of God. The day of sectarianism is doomed. Even that which is peddled under our own brand name must pass away! Cheer up! Tomorrow will be brighter than today. The shadows are fleeing away!

Jealousy and Envy

Mission Messenger (February 1967)

Volume 29

“Envy is a certain grief of mind conceived upon the sight of another’s felicity, whether real or supposed, so that we see that it consists partly of hatred, and partly of grief.”— South.

The careless student usually thinks of envy and jealousy as virtually synonymous. It is our intention to make a proper distinction in them. Envy is a work of the flesh (Gal. 5:21); a product of that wisdom which is earthly, sensual and devilish (James 3:14); and a companion of confusion and every evil work (James 3:16).

It was envy which prompted his brothers to sell Joseph (Acts 7:9); envy which caused the Jews to deliver up Jesus (Matt. 27:18); and envy which promoted riotous mob violence at Thessalonica (Acts 17:5). Envy is always sinful. It proceeds from evil tendencies and produces evil consequences.

Jealousy, which comes from the same word as zealous, may be either good or evil, depending upon its object. God proclaimed himself to be a jealous God, and was actually referred to as the “Lord, whose name is Jealous” (Exo. 34:14). The apostle specifically declares that there is a “godly jealousy” (2 Cor. 11:2).

Jealousy is derived from zelotypia, a compound form consisting of zelos, and typia, to strike or fill. It means to be struck full of passion, or to be inflamed with intense desire or longing. God desires his people with just such a yearning.

Envy is from the Latin invideo. The last part is now used with reference to tapes showing action on television screens, for video means to see. The combined word means looking at from the wrong angle or from a contrary direction.

One is jealous of that which is his own, he is envious of that which belongs to another. He is jealous of his wife, he is envious of his neighbor's wife. Jealousy is always related to fear, for it is ever frightened at the prospect of losing what it claims and cherishes; envy is accompanied by suffering for it is pained to see another enjoy and experience what it covets for itself.

A jealous man may be pacified, an envious man can never be appeased or placated. The first has a definite object to be attained or retained, and a threat to his possession of it. So if a wife expresses detestation of one who is deemed a rival, the jealous husband may be satisfied by enjoyment of her person.

On the other hand, an envious person cannot stand for the object to know happiness. He revolts at enjoyment. He is sickened by the very sight of satisfaction. He has a morbid desire to know of the misery of the other. For this reason we think that when Dryden made the familiar statement, "Jealousy, the jaundice of the soul," he was actually speaking about envy. Jealousy may lift to noble heights, envy is always base and debasing.

"Let us walk honestly, as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying" (Romans 13:13).

J. B. Phillips speaks more to our age by translating: "Let us live cleanly, as in the daylight, not in the 'delights' of getting drunk or playing with sex, nor yet in quarrelling or jealousies."

The Authentic Version renders it: “Let us conduct ourselves with daytime decorum, not in revels or carousals, not in sexual intimacy and licentiousness, not in wrangling and rivalry.”

Carnal Weapons

Mission Messenger (February 1967)

Volume 29

Our battle is to bring down every deceptive fantasy and every imposing defence that men erect against the true knowledge of God. We even fight to capture every thought until it acknowledges the authority of Christ.

The above is the rendering by J. B. Phillips of 2 Corinthians 10:5. It occurs in a setting which has often been misunderstood, for the apostle says in the preceding verse, “The weapons of our warfare are not carnal,” as the King James Version has it. This is taken as a condemnation of even defensive warfare upon the part of Christians. Without entering into the controversy of the right to bear arms under any circumstance, we simply state that this passage is not remotely connected with the problem. The point the apostle is making is not that war is sinful but that the nature of the warfare should determine the type of weapons to be used.

The false teachers who infiltrated the congregation which Paul planted at Corinth concocted every type of charge which they could level against him. They said he was very meek and humble when he was present with them but grew bold and brave at a distance and when absent. They implied that he had a vitriolic pen and wrote daringly from afar, but that “his bark was worse than his bite,” for he became docile when he arrived among them.

This amounted to charging him with a policy of double-dealing. The New English Version says they “charge us with moral weakness.” J. B. Phillips puts it as “reckoning that our activities are purely on the human level.” In reply the apostle asserts that although he is a weak man and leads a normal human life, he recognizes that the battle he fights is on a spiritual level.

His real conflict is not with men but with their deceptive fantasies, or sophistries. His was a war for men’s minds, a conflict of ideologies and thought processes. The weapons must be adapted to the kind of battle being waged. Carnal weapons will destroy men’s physical bodies but you cannot shoot down a fantasy any more than you can a phantom. An idea cannot be blasted with a shotgun loaded with nitro and buckshot. Yet Paul is here talking about a different kind of carnal weapon.

The opposite to deceptive fantasy is true knowledge of God and this last must be our weapon to storm the ramparts, batter down the bastions, and capture the fortress of human minds. The apostle was writing to a divided congregation of saints. His motives were under attack. His character was being assailed. His very integrity was being challenged. He was accused of refusing to take their money personally and sending Titus later on to collect all he could get. He was said to be a weighty and powerful writer but in appearance was weak and as a speaker was beneath contempt.

In all of this Paul refused to retaliate in kind. He did not engage in mud-slinging, personalities or recrimination. These were the carnal weapons he refused to use for he did not fight after the manner of men. We are still engaged in a struggle to capture every thought and bring it under the authority of Christ, but we dare not be led into the ambush of Satan where we will be tempted to use weapons adapted to those on the purely human level.

Partisan debate, factional rivalry and sectarian disorder are all carnal weapons. They do not fit the right hand of the Christian. The apostle wrote: “I fear that when I come . . . I may find quarrelling and jealousy, angry tempers and personal rivalries, backbiting and gossip, arrogance and general disorder” (2 Corinthians 12:20). These are carnal weapons. Those who use them fight after the manner of men. It is as dangerous for a Christian to carry a grudge as it is to carry a gun. It may be as sinful to shoot off your mouth as to shoot off a pistol.

Through the Dust

Mission Messenger (February 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

The most common word for “minister” in the new covenant scriptures is diakonos. It is also transliterated to become our English word “deacon.” The original is a combined form of dia, through, and konos, dust. It is sometimes said to mean “to kick up dust,” that is, of a runner speeding on an errand at the behest of another. A more logical meaning is one who walks through the dust while leading a camel on which another rides, thus serving the need of the rider.

The word has both a general and specific sense. In the latter it refers to the functionaries called deacons (Philippians 1:1; 1 Timothy 3:8). Thus if any are to be designated the ministers of a congregation it should be the deacons. These were the almoners, or those who administered to the needs of the distressed and indigent.

However, the word was never employed in such a manner as to designate any specific or exclusive form of service. One cannot determine the function of another from the word minister, for it is used to designate every form or type of service. There must always be other terms by which one learns the nature of the ministry to which reference has been made. Every Christian is a minister if he serves God and his fellows.

One enters the ministry by baptism into Christ. He cannot be made a minister by a diploma from a school nor by the imposition of human hands. One can decide to “take up the ministry” but to do so is a tacit admission that he has been neglecting the Christian life. He cannot go away to college to become a minister although one who has become a minister may go away to college. A minister of Christ may study engineering, psychology, science, business administration, or automobile mechanics, in order to better his ministry. This depends upon how he expects to support himself in his vocation, which must always be living for Jesus.

But should he not specialize in Bible? My reply is that every minister should do this regardless of how he expects to make a living. The weapon is not merely for the officers but for all the soldiers. And there is a difference in living of the gospel and making a living off the gospel. The gospel must be preached but it must never be peddled. (See 1 Corinthians 2:17 in the Revised Standard or New English New Testament translations).

We must either recapture the primitive concept of the universal ministry involving all of the saints or we will continue the inane practice of enrolling students who never intend to learn, enlisting soldiers who never intend to fight, and delivering infants who never intend to grow. And the stands which once were filled with heathen watching the Christian race will be thronged with Christians watching professional entertainers perform a pulpit adagio.

As a meager contribution of deep conviction I have resolved never to allow my name to appear on a signboard or letterhead as the minister of a congregation. I have no opposition to a congregation placing the names of its ministers on a sign but such a sign should contain the whole roster. An army consists of more than a first lieutenant. Our problem is that we have a lot of folk who want to minister but they are allergic to dust.

Crumbling Walls

Mission Messenger (February 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

The cracks are beginning to show in the artificial walls erected to separate brethren. The spite fences of the past are starting to sag. This is obvious to any observer who carefully scans the partisan journalistic organs of the “Church of Christ.” Not a single segment of this multi-factional complex is escaping the spirit of reform. For the first time in over a century, since disintegration of the restoration movement began, even small peripheral groups are feeling the impact of the witness for fellowship and unity.

A major journal of the largest faction, published in Texas, has been forced to devote more space to teaching on the Holy Spirit than ever before in history, and the Spirit has survived every attempt to explain Him away. One thing is plain, the writers do not agree with each other, but it is heartening to see them continue in “fellowship” with one another. This is proof that the Spirit is active even among some who are apparently uncomfortable in His presence.

A Tennessee journal has had to call up the big guns to bombard the “liberals” as all those are designated who refuse to bow to the edicts and dogmas of the “powers that be.” Some are becoming so “liberal” that they regard all of God’s children as their brethren and freely demonstrate it. It is correct to assume that every real sectarian must be illiberal for this is the very essence of the sectarian establishment. Some of our brethren, not realizing that we now live in the twentieth century, are still breathing out threats and slaughter against those who are in the Way, but they have a hollow ring. The editors of these papers reveal that an enlightened membership is beginning to break the stranglehold of spiritual bureaucracy. The saints are starting to think for themselves.

What is true of the orthodox “Church of Christ” is also true of the lesser factions. Brethren who admit to making a test of fellowship out of cups and classes and who carve and slash the body to bits over such matters as how to break the bread, have had to call up reinforcements to hold the sectarian line. Some of the membership discovered that Romans 14 was in the Bible and that it was written specifically to tell brethren how to treat one another in spite of differences. In one issue of their chief journalistic organ, the editor apologizes for having to suspend publication of some serialized material to deal with “matters of pressing concern.” It is easy to see that some in the faction are starting to receive their brethren as God received them, and the elite corps has been rushed to the ramparts to gun down and purge those who start loving all of their brethren. This will only drive them into the wider fellowship of the family of God.

An editorial in one of the papers sponsoring the premillennial interpretation declares, “Yes, we would like to see the ‘premillennial movement’ die out. We long for the day when all of us will be ‘Christians only.’” The editor adds, “The premillennialists have always maintained that there should be no divisions in the body of Christ.” This is especially interesting because only a few months before the same editor was wanting to print a directory of the premillennial congregations, apparently so the brethren would have a “Who’s Who” of “the faithful churches.”

More and more men are beginning to say things like, “I agree with a lot that Brother Ketcherside is saying, and he makes one think, but his program will not work.” That is sheer poppycock. It will work if we’ll work it. And if a lot of preachers were not afraid of their salaries they’d like to work it. Those of us who are not watching the congregational checkbook as closely as we do the Bible are making it work.

We meet with a little congregation of saints which contains some brethren who are premillennial, some who see no harm in instrumental music, some who claim to have spoken in tongues, some who smoke cigarettes as if they were dying to do so, and others who oppose smoking for fear they will. Some are quite orthodox and some are not. We are free to listen to any brother in the Lord and do listen to all kinds of them. We make no hypocritical pretence that we are all of the same opinion. We rejoice that we strive for community and not conformity. Our unity is in Christ Jesus. It is not in our degree of intellectual attainment or our membership in a faction. Men can surmount their fears. They can be free! It does work!

A great revolution is going on beneath the surface within the frightened ranks of all the factions. Nothing will stop it. There are already signs that the power of editors who once cracked the whip is on the wane. Their papers no longer speak for the members of the party. The sheep on the hills are hearing again the voice of the Shepherd. They are beginning to struggle and straggle homeward and some day there will be one flock and one shepherd. That day is coming. The Spirit is at work!

The Old Lady

Mission Messenger (February 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

This is the rather affectionate designation used by the British folk for The Church of England. This great communion is regarded as being a little dodderly and senile, living in the past and confused by the present. With many sources of income cut off and with inflation taking its toll, the ancient dowager finds herself hard put to maintain her standards of the past. She is laughed at behind her back, criticized to her face, and mocked on the side, even by those who are her best friends.

Most of those who know her feel that she has nothing worthwhile to contribute to an age dominated by Beatles and mods.

She dwells alone in stately aloofness from a swinging world except for an occasional visit to a coffeehouse where the litany consists of the kind of poetry which can only send those who are already gone.

It is the fate of every sect to grow old, and to wonder what the world is coming to since it is no longer going to it. This is just as true of sects which suffer from delusions of grandeur and think “we are the people and wisdom will die with us.” A sect can suffer from dementia the same as an individual. And to be mistaken about one’s own identity does not help him to clarify his relationship with others.

But the church of God is ageless and timeless. It was never wound up and will never run down. Its message is ever the same in content and never the same in its presentation. It speaks to men when and where they are, and as they are. It has no language of its own but employs the tongues of men in order to reach men. It never talks to itself except when it cannot interpret its message.

The church is not drab or discouraging. It never stifles or squelches. Like Moses, its “eye is not dimmed nor its natural force abated,” by the passage of years. It is vibrant, rejoicing, exuberant, filled with faith and filling others with hope.

Those who think that the church has served her time and is on the way out, reveal what is happening to them and not to the church. The one body can never die as long as its head lives, and he will live forever. Even the sepulcher had to release him from its clammy grasp at the touch of an angelic hand. Certainly the fortunes and figures of a sect will rise and wane, for sects are crystallized from movements which begin with men. And anything for which men can now give statistics of membership is nothing but a sect.

The church of God is composed of all the saved of all the earth. No partisan journal can print its statistics. The editors who try demonstrate their ignorance rather than prophetic vision. It is enough for the rest of us to remember that the Lord knoweth them that are His.

The Fiddlers

Mission Messenger (February 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

The classic example of majoring in trivia in time of crisis seems to be that of Lucius Domitius Ahenobarbus, more popularly known as Nero. While Rome was burning on at least five of the Seven Hills, he insisted on limbering up his fiddle and bow and sawing away at the Roman equivalent of “Turkey in the Straw.”

We believe that some of our brethren should be given consideration if there is a modern contest for Nero’s crown, not as emperor, but as king of the inconsequential. A good example is that of the Church of Christ in a Chicago suburb. Far away men were dying in the jungles of Vietnam. Close at hand other men were marching in the asphalt jungles of city streets. Automobiles were being overturned and burned. Rocks and curses filled the air. Obscenities were being shouted at Roman Catholic priests and nuns.

At the height of the tension the congregation imported a guest speaker who valiantly and courageously faced up to the great moral and spiritual issues of the day by proving beyond his own doubt that the Herald of Truth program sponsored by a congregation in Texas had not violated the autonomy of his own congregation, nor obtained their money with a switchblade knife.

If this seems a little absurd under the circumstances, let me assure you that it is the rule, not the exception. In a world of foment and ferment most of our brethren insist upon ignoring what is happening to give lengthy orations on things which it happens the world is ignoring. Nothing makes the dudgeon rise higher than to insist that we need to become relevant. That is a fighting word! One who uses it must be willing to bear the brand of every caustic term in the alphabet of invective from apostate to zealot.

One can now see the true perspective of the problem faced by the great apostle to mankind who was bounded and harassed by the Jewish legalistic party whose members wanted the message to the Greek world presented in the language and forms of the familiar synagogue sermons. To them Paul was a “liberal” who insisted on recognizing as brethren those who had not been circumcised. He would be called the same in our time if brethren ever awoke to the fact that in his epistle to the Romans he mentioned baptism three times, and grace twenty-three times!

Recently I saw a carping criticism of a preaching brother of whom it was alleged that he only quoted three scriptures in a thirty minute discourse. Paul would never have landed a job in the Church of Christ by using his message on Mars Hill as a trial sermon. Not only did he not quote a single scripture in it, but he referred to a heathen poet, Cleanthus, taking what he said in a hymn to Jupiter and applying it to God. Paul would have flunked any homiletics class in a Bible College. He might have flunked a class in Literary Interpretation at the University of Athens also.

But the point is that if you can quote enough scriptural passages you can often conceal both your ignorance and irrelevance. Frequently the audience can quote them right along with you (most brethren use the same ones in every talk) and you are not proclaiming at all, but leading the audience in a joint recitation. It will not harm the participants. It will not help the rest of humanity either. Quoting scripture whether it applies or not does not mean that you are facing up to the world of which the scripture speaks.

Our world is washed over by great problems and is wallowing in the trough of grave concerns— hunger, nakedness, famine, war, fear, racial animosity and economic exploitation—to mention a few. The thundering hooves of the steeds ridden by the Four Grim Horsemen echo all over the universe.

While a million people are threatened with death from starvation and pestilence we fight about such things as whether it is right to eat in the meetinghouse. While teeming thousands in steaming jungles have no written language we debate about the validity of Sunday School literature.

Move over, Nero, and give the professionals a chance. No, thank you, that's all right, you may keep your fiddle, because we do not use instrumental music. But we can all join in and sing "with the spirit and with the understanding" while the devouring flames of hell burn unchecked and the licking tongues engulf our world. Who has a tuning fork so we can get the pitch?

The Baobab Tree

Mission Messenger (February 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

Africa is a land of peculiarities. The baobab tree is one of them. In his beautifully illustrated book The River Nile, Bruce Brander describes the trees as having “fat tubs for trunks and antlers for branches.” Indeed the trunks sometimes reach thirty feet in circumference and the natives hollow them out for huts in which to dwell. There is an interesting legend of the Arabs that the devil picked up the baobab tree and thrust its branches into the ground leaving the roots sticking up into the air.

This may be what has happened to the church in a lot of areas for it would appear that things are the reverse of what they were in the beginning. And we will never turn the world upside down until we get the church right side up. If the church is to be like Jesus it must begin coming to minister and not to be ministered unto. It must also be willing to give its life in order to gain it and to die in order to live.

The early church gathered around a table, the modern church sits before a pulpit. Then they loved the brethren and talked about Jesus, now they profess to love Jesus and talk about the brethren. Then they had no church buildings and sounded out the word, now they have their own architecture and sound the word in. The primitive saints went everywhere preaching the word, their modern counterparts go anywhere there is word of preaching.

Jesus used the cross as a hammer to batter down middle walls of partition; now men use the same cross as an excuse to build them up again. Once the believers would give their lives for the brethren; many now would rather die than give their brethren recognition.

The congregations are not generally lithe, lean, trim runners in the race of life. Many of them, like the baobab tree, are fat tubs, preoccupied with their own little rounds of trivia, living for self, loving their own concerns, leaving the world to flounder in a morass of problems, with no helping hand extended for fear of getting the robe of righteousness soiled and sticky. The world is in a pretty sticky mess and the idea seems to be to stay out of vital contact with it until it straightens itself out and decent folk can again afford to associate with it and take the credit for its improvement.

Actually the church is more affected by social mores and standards in our affluent culture than it affects them. It is like a client of a poverty relief program who learns the technique of profit and loss, and waxes wealthy only to look with disdain upon his former associates. Or like a teetotaler who starts out to rid the world of the curse of alcoholism and ends up taking a nip on the side with the bottle winning the battle.

I suspect the Arab legend about the baobab tree is sheer imagination. I do not think the devil is particularly interested in trees since men quit carving gods out of them. But I think it is quite possible he has turned the church upside down and I wish a lot of the members of it were as interested in it as he is.

The Headless Horseman

Mission Messenger (February 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

In The Inner Hebrides and Their Legends, Otta Swire tells the story of “Ewen of the Little Head,” a warrior of note on the island of Mull in the fifteenth century. Ewen was a swaggering ill-tempered brute who was married to “a MacDougall of Lorn, an equally unattractive character.” When he could no longer control his son, the father of Ewen sent to a relative, Maclean of Duart, asking for help. Duart was only too glad to invade the country.

When word came to Ewen about the attack he consulted a “Wise Woman” who told him that on the morning when he was arming for the fight if his wife served him butter with his breakfast unasked he would be victorious, but if not he and his two sons would be slain.

Breakfast came with no butter on the table so Ewen raved and ranted about the food. When his wife brought no butter he stormed from the house and malevolently turned his hunting dogs loose in her dairy.

Ewen tied himself in the saddle to keep from being accidentally knocked from his steed during the shock of the fray, but when the battle was joined in Glen Forsa a stroke from a broadsword swept off his head. The author describes what followed thus: “His horse, with his headless body still upright in the saddle, bolted from the field and for many days thereafter it was seen careering in mad terror up and down glens and passes and along precipices and paths fit only for goats. At last, utterly exhausted, it allowed itself to be caught and the body taken from its back and sent to Iona for burial.”

This is an apt portrayal of the “institutional church” in our day. It rides high in the saddle and battles the political, economic and social forces which threaten our earthly pilgrimage. It has been so designed, drafted and departmentalized, that it can function automatically, spasmodically and by reflex action. Every reaction has been purposely planned, programmed and perfected by professional promoters, so that even our prayers must fit into a schedule, and one must hang up the receiver on God when the clock strikes.

The Holy Spirit no longer dares to shake the house where the saints are gathered. There is no place in the agenda into which we could possibly work a house-shaking experience. Besides, we would first have to secure permission from the City Architect or from the Municipal Building Code Inspector. So “the church” goes on swinging and swaying without realizing that something vital is missing. The “church” has lost her head!

The world does not realize it because she is roped up with rituals, laced up with liturgies, fastened with formularies and shackled by sacred solemnities. In her own consummate ignorance she thinks God is dead even while she is a corpse in a surplice. Like Samson, shorn of the locks of his strength, she arises as her custom has been, to shake herself, without knowing that the Spirit has departed from her.

But the thrilling thing is that “the institutional church” becomes a phantom when she is beheaded and the simple saints who cling more closely to the Savior constitute the real body. Only those joined to the One Lord by the One Spirit are members of that blessed company. Frequently these are disowned by the headless corpse fastened to the frightened stallion of carnal ambition, but they are recognized by the Head and will be gathered unto Him in that day “when he cometh to make up his jewels.”

Combat Cooties

Mission Messenger (February 1967)

Volume 29

Once when I was a little lad down in the hills we moved into a house which was infected with bedbugs. We did not know it, of course, or we might not have moved into it. Having bedbugs was in the same category as having the seven-year itch, the only advantage of which was that when you'd had it three times you knew you were old enough to vote.

The first night in our new domicile found all of us restless and disturbed. When my mother finally found the matchbox and got the kerosene lamp lighted she gave a gasp. The sheets were covered with bugs scurrying for cover. They had marshalled their forces in the darkness and crawled out of the woodwork to attack in hungry frenzy. Our parents did not sleep the rest of the night although the children dozed fitfully while their elders waged futile warfare.

The next day all of the bed ticks had to be taken outside and the straw from them burned. The wooden bedsteads were taken down and every concealed part sprayed with a solution of carbolic acid poured from the bottle with the skull and crossbones on the label. All of the walls, which were of painted wood had to be washed with special attention given to the cracks between the boards. Bedbugs constituted the worst catastrophe we had ever suffered as a family up to that time.

Now times have changed. Bedbugs are our allies in the war in Vietnam. One of these insects is placed in a small box insulated on three sides, and carried with the fourth and open side directed toward the jungle. The task of the bug is to “sniff out” Communists concealed in ambush. When a bedbug senses human blood by its natural sonar system its “scream” is amplified until it becomes recognized by the carrier who thereupon directs withering fire into the undergrowth where the soldiers are concealed.

My mother is no longer with us but if she were I’m sure she would look askance at enlisting these insect pests to literally “bug the enemy.” But “new occasions teach new duties; time makes ancient good uncouth,” as the poet writes, whether correctly or not. I know of a lot of bedbugs in the spiritual realm which are now being used to discomfit the enemy.

For instance, I grew up in a faction where “uninspired literature” in a Bible class was regarded as a device of Satan. To give little award cards for attendance which contained a religious picture and scriptural verse was almost in the same category as awarding a deck of playing cards in a memory verse contest.

When radio was first introduced it was bitterly attacked by those who several years before had prophesied that God would not let it happen. As I recall I even got into the fight over television, on the wrong side, going so far as to preach a discourse on “TV or Not TV— That is the Question.”

Now all of these “bedbugs” are being employed along with a lot of others to help stimulate interest and arouse concern for the Christian concept. If they belong to Satan he is being whipped over the head with his own weapons!

It will not be necessary for any of you to write and remind me that the insects used near Saigon have not changed their nature and are still bedbugs. I know that. I trust to the good judgment of my intelligent readers not to carry this analogy of combat cooties too far. I can make it ridiculous enough for all of us!

Life's Final Star

Mission Messenger (February 1967)

Volume 29

The poet has sung that “life’s final star is brotherhood.” The word “brother” is from adelphos, which literally means “from the same womb.” It is common origin which makes us brothers. “He makes men pure from their sins, and both he and those whom he makes pure all have the same Father. That is why Jesus is not ashamed to call them brothers” (Hebrews 2:11). Brotherhood derives from fatherhood. Fellowship is the result of mutual sonship.

God wants a family more than anything else and the most important thing to him is the maintenance of the family relationship. This takes precedence over all else, even over formal acts performed as ritual. Making peace with a brother is more important even than bringing a sacrifice to God. “So if you are about to offer your gift to God at the altar and there you remember that your brother has something against you, leave your gift there in front of the altar and go at once and make peace with your brother; then come back and offer your gift to God” (Matt. 5:23, 24). Go at once— then come back!

Men have broken up God’s children into warring clans and have “set at nought their brethren” over such matters as opinions related to music and the millennium, or pertaining to cups, classes and colleges. This is a sin of the deepest dye. It is not a sin to entertain or express any opinion about any of these things, but it is a grave offence against heaven to make any opinion pro or con the basis of our recognition of one another and of our oneness in Christ.

God has received into His majestic family those who differ with me about the validity of instrumental music and the pre-millennial coming of my Lord. But these things have nothing to do with what makes us brothers and if I smite and strike my fellowservants, the Lord will banish me into outer darkness when he comes. If there are adjustments that need to be made because of inequities he will make them.

“For Christ died and rose to life in order to be the Lord of the living and of the dead. You then— why do you pass Judgment on your brother? And you— why do you despise your brother? All of us will stand before the judgment bar of God . . . Every one of us, then, will have to give an account of himself to God” (Romans 14:9-12).

Because I believe that the recapture of the true meaning of brotherhood is the most important task of the fragmented church, I refuse to make any view or opinion of those in Christ Jesus of greater importance than the blessed Holy Spirit whose indwelling presence unites us to Him. Regardless of what my brothers think about the things that trouble us, they are all my brethren. I will do anything to help them, crossing back and forth over the lines as if they were not there. And for me they are not!

The crest and crowning of all good,

Life's final star is Brotherhood;

For it will bring again to earth

Her long lost Poesy and Mirth,

Will send new light on every face,

A kingly power upon the race,
And till it comes, we men are slaves,
And travel onward to the dust of graves.

Come, clear the way then, clear the way:

Blind creeds and kings have had their day.

Break the dead branches from the path:

Our hope is in the aftermath —

Our hope is in heroic men,

Star-led to build the world again.

To this Event the ages ran:

Make way for Brotherhood— make way for Man.

The Need for Reform

Mission Messenger (March 1967)

[Abstract]

Every institution which exists more than one generation has a tradition. The word comes from paradosis, to hand down, to deliver, to pass on. There is nothing wrong with a tradition. The apostolic message falls within that category (2 Thess. 2:15). The harm comes when men pass along the modes, means and methods which they adopted or devised to implement the requirements of apostolic doctrine as being of equal importance and authority with the words of the Spirit.

When this is done the discoveries of the passing generation become a strait-jacket for the next and the forms and customs which were effective in meeting the needs of yesteryear operate effectively against meeting the needs of the present. A standardized form of speech develops and becomes a familiar jargon, and regardless of the condition or circumstance the same grist must be ground by the creaking theological millwheel.

It becomes a test of loyalty to attack certain things to prove one's fidelity, and it is likewise considered a matter of expediency to ignore certain contemporary issues that are dangerous to the status quo of the Establishment. The Roman Catholic Church is a good example of an ecclesiastical mammoth bogged down in a swamp of its own creation. But it has some courageous souls who are trying to pry the behemoth out of the primordial ooze.

Among these is B. L. Wittenbrink, who is permanent secretary of the national Conference of Major Superiors of Men, representing every Catholic religious order. In a recent speech this reverend gentleman assailed the hierarchy for a preoccupation with such questions as shortening or not shortening the skirts of the sisters, while ignoring human needs and injustices. He cited such problems as mental illness, alcoholism and marital infidelity. He declared that the major problem was not lack of obedience to church authority. He said, "The crisis is in communications. Those on top— right to the very top— don't know all things. If they did they'd be God. Those at the bottom don't either. It is essential for the two element— top and bottom— to speak to each other."

Having grown up in the Churches of Christ we know how to sympathize with our friends who are caught up in the web of red tape identified as Catholicism. In a world groaning beneath heavy burdens, and like a trapped animal snapping and tearing at its own flesh in sheer desperation, we are able to pass by on the other side wholly oblivious of the frightful agonies which affect human personalities.

We are still reducing men to bulletin-board statistics, counting noses and making glowing reports of factional gains. While thousands are being enslaved by alcohol and dope, while hundreds are being driven relentlessly to suicide, while millions are pushed back into the teeming streets of the ghettos, we meet in air-conditioned comfort and listen to pleasant sermons on the tragic sin of eating in the basement of the meetinghouse, or of allowing a woman to teach Bible stories to a class of little children, or of breaking the loaf before passing it.

In a world where children are growing up in deprivation, dire poverty and the desperation born of hunger, and already slanted toward a career of criminality and vice, we feel satisfied to allow others to wipe away the filth and sweat and blood, while we fulfill the nobler calling of saving men from a mistaken opinion concerning the millennium or instrumental music. We are fulminating about the fatuous, parroting party platitudes and bombarding a sick and sad world with sheer bombast.

Let us not sneer at the Catholic sect because of its traditions. Let us not laugh at its struggle to extricate itself from its medieval ties. Rather let us pray that God may raise up reformers among us with the bravery of some of those within the Roman pale. If we do not we may see Rome become free while Jerusalem remains bound and enslaved.

Quenching the Spirit

Mission Messenger (March 1967)

[Abstract]

Perhaps the greatest abuse and misuse of talent on earth today is found in the church. The practice of hiring one man to edify the saints exclusively, while others who are sometimes even better equipped, must sit in perpetual silence and are never given opportunity to address the congregation, is a little ridiculous. In some places brilliant attorneys who can plead a case where life and death is involved are not deemed qualified to plead the cause of the King of kings. Erudite professors and schoolmen must be fed on partisan pap week after week although in demand to speak before societies composed of their educational peers. If this type of brain drain was practiced in the business world, bankruptcy would be inevitable.

It was to all of the saints these words were addressed, “For though by this time you ought to be teachers, you need someone to teach you again the first principles of God’s word” (Hebrews 5:12). You ought to be teachers. This is God’s ideal. God never bestowed a useless gift. Every gift is intended to be exercised and developed. It is the duty of the congregation to provide and maintain an opportunity for the growth and development of every member to his highest potential. I unhesitatingly charge that our current method not only fails to do this but actually operates to prevent it!

The devil has tricked us into presenting a well-managed performance under the guise that this is worship. We no longer gather as at a family reunion about the table. We come as the spectators of a drama and if it is not well staged we will attend another theater. And we'll take the price of admission with us. There is where the rub comes in!

Most of us are condemned always to be hearers, not doers, in the assembly. We are ever learning and never coming to the use of our knowledge. We are the taught ones, the interminably taught ones whose ears must enlarge while our brains wither and our tongues paralyze from disuse, for it is by teaching that one really grows in all of his mental faculties.

Plato said, "To teach is the way for a man to learn most and best."

Clement of Alexandria said, "In teaching the instructor often learns more than his pupils."

Aristotle, in his Metaphysics, wrote, "The one exclusive sign that a man is thoroughly cognizant of anything, is that he is able to teach it."

And the blind Homer, who may have been contemporary with Elijah, wrote thus:

Through mutual intercourse and mutual aid,

Great deeds are done and great decisions made;

The wise new wisdom on the wise bestow,

While the lone thinker's thoughts come slight and slow.

In 1663, Dr. Robert Anderson of London said in his book Reason and Judgment, "I learn much from my master, more from my equals, and most of all from my disciples.”

If every congregation regularly placed on its public speaking program, every qualified man, or every man who could become qualified, the Cause would soon have a multitude of capable defenders in every business and profession. There is little incentive to qualify if you know you’ll never to be called upon to use your ability. And the congregation suffers from a lack of fresh and original approach which it could experience. It is useless to pretend that we are interested in restoration of primitive Christianity unless we include a realistic return to the priesthood of all believers and the ministry of all of the saints.

Dr. Robert Young was an eminent scholar who gave us a great Analytical Concordance, as well as a new translation of the entire Bible, along with numerous other works in Biblical and Oriental Literature. In his comment on 1 Corinthians 14:26, he wrote:

From this and other passages it is clear that the upbuilding of the church was not confined, then, as now, to one, or at the most two, of the congregation; but was the privilege of all the members, and though such a practice is liable to abuse (James 3:1), it is possible that its entire disuse has led to still greater evils obvious to all—

Lapsing Into Latin

Mission Messenger (March 1967)

[Abstract]

We were exposed to Latin in High School but apparently it did not “take.” It was almost as difficult as English and our deficiency in the linguistic field must be apparent to all. Once in a while, though, we come across a foreign phrase which strikes our fancy because of its appropriateness to our situation. One such is the legal term “Res ipsa loquitur,” which means “the thing speaks for itself.”

Our philosophy of fellowship as practiced in the past is in this category. Obviously the purpose of any philosophy of unity is to produce unity and that which results only in division should be carefully scrutinized. We are among the most divided of the religious movements in America, and what is worse, while the rest of them are thinking in terms of uniting, many of our brethren are preparing for further fragmentation.

We are exactly where our thinking has brought us and our condition emphasizes the need for a change in our thinking. What basic error has affected our reasoning? Actually there are several but we will mention only one.

We have been betrayed into adopting the fallacy that purity of doctrine can only be secured by separation from brethren. As a result, every time someone differs with us we are obligated by our warped conviction to divide the body and create two new factions.

Each time we do this each faction assumes that it has the truth and is the defender of righteousness. The truth is that their very division is proof that they have denied the scriptural injunction to guard the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. Not one time are God's children told to form sects because of their differences. Every time division among Christians is mentioned it is condemned in the severest of terms.

In spite of this we are as divided as if it were God's will and he had repeatedly commanded it as the one means of fulfilling the divine purpose on earth.

Satan has not only divided us and sinfully splintered us, but he has also twisted our thinking and wrested our reasoning until we wilfully perpetuate our parties under the guise of fidelity to Christ Jesus. Our brethren have been betrayed into the silly and insane notion that if they even call upon a visiting brother to voice a prayer to God they thereby sanction and condone all of his interpretative peculiarities and religious idiosyncracies. They do not realize their inconsistencies for not one of their own party upon whom they call for prayer agrees with them fully unless he is ignorant of exactly the same things as themselves.

Our brethren who pose as theological experts and authorized exponents of God's will ought to be ashamed to live and afraid to die when they contemplate the mixed-up mess created by their mental meanderings. Our divisions are a stench in the nostrils of heaven. It is time we did something besides repeating little slogans with a partisan purpose and a sectarian slant. Anyone can see what the will to divide has done to us and how it has slashed us into ribbons. Res ipsa loquitur!

The Realm of Truth

[Abstract]

The word “fellowship” is a rendering of koinonia, the sharing of a common life. Fellowship in Christ is the sharing of the life of the Holy Spirit. It originates with the Spirit by whom we are all immersed into one body, it is sustained by the Spirit of whom all imbibe or freely partake. All who are in Christ are in the fellowship and whatever things were required to bring them into Christ constitute the only conditions essential to entrance into fellowship.

Fellowship is not endorsement or Jesus could not be in the fellowship with any of us. It is not perfect conformity or none of us could be in the fellowship with Jesus. Fellowship is not harmony. It is not the fruit of harmony. Instead harmony is one of the goals of fellowship. We are not in the fellowship because we are in harmony but we strive to come into harmony because we are in the fellowship.

Every sincere immersed believer in Christ is in the fellowship in spite of the degree of his ignorance or mistaken views. To disregard or not recognize him as a brother in the Lord reveals our own blindness rather than his alienation. Even though he may be involved in a sectarian establishment he is God’s child, my brother beloved, and in the fellowship.

I have thousands of brethren who know nothing about the restoration movement or its historicity. Some of them hide behind strange walls with diverse names. But they are my brothers and I love them, not with that detached love which some affect for the world but with the warmth of family affection which extends unstinted hospitality.

Fellowship in Christ is not conditioned upon a certain understanding or a correct position relative to societies, instrumental music, the millennium, the support of orphan homes, cups, classes or colleges. No opinion related to any of these must ever be allowed to sever our relationship. To allow our relationship in Christ to be affected by such matters is to demonstrate that a view or opinion about one or more of them is valued more highly than the blood of Jesus which makes us one. Our hope of heaven is not contingent upon our freedom from error but upon our attitude toward it.

I am not a living member of a fragmented body. I am a part of the one body and through its head I am joined to every saved person on the earth. The only way I can disown any of my brethren is to sever myself from Jesus. It is more difficult to work with some than with others, because of their attitude. Divergent opinions act as barriers, but love can conquer where argument fails. If the prime purpose of debate is to restore unity I will just start with unity and discuss our problems as a brother and not as an enemy.

Nothing that anyone can ever do short of forsaking my Lord will cause me to leave him. We are caught up together in God's mercy and all of us are monuments, not to our brilliance or spiritual attainment, but to His boundless grace. We must receive one another as He receives us all.

“My children, love must not be a matter of words or talk; it must be genuine and show itself in action. This is how we may know that we belong to the realm of truth” (1 John 3:18, 19). The realm of truth— that is the domain to which I seek to belong, and the way to do so is made plain.

Moral Agency

Mission Messenger (April 1967)

We are treated frequently in the writings of our brethren to the affirmation that man is “a free moral agent.” We regard the term “free” as both redundant and unnecessary. A moral agent must be free and one who is not free is not a moral agent. He is subject to the will of another by compulsion and for that reason may become a victim of whim or caprice over which he has no control.

As a moral agent man is granted the right to choose for such a right is inherent in moral agency. But choice is not an end in itself. It is the means to an end. One cannot just make his choice the right to choose, and stop there. He must exercise this right and this demands the utilization of the power of discrimination which weighs alternatives and guides to decisions. Such decisions must be governed by an ultimate, if they are to become a guideline for life. That which is transitory, conditional or circumstantial, can hardly form a satisfactory goal in life for the goal will be constantly shifting.

God can reveal the ultimate for the proper philosophy of life, but he cannot impel one to adopt it. This is not because He lacks the power to do it, but because true good must be measured by a criterion or principle, and God, who is ultimate good, cannot act in contravention of the principle of all goodness. It is for this reason that “it is impossible for God to lie.”

To act in such a manner as to deprive man from exercise of his will would not be good, and in reality would reduce him to becoming less than man. Accordingly, the proper motivations for a right choice are provided, and the results of either choice predicted, and upon this disclosure man acts voluntarily. Thus his manhood is protected and preserved.

All law, so far as man is concerned, is summed up in love. The apostle writes, “He who loves his neighbor has satisfied every claim of the law” (Romans 13:8), and again, “the whole law is summed up in love” (verse 10). Such love as is here contemplated is not an emotion, but an act of will. It lifts man’s will to the highest possible plane and approximates the divine in the human, since God is love.

The ultimate is love directed toward two objects— God and man. On love expressed for these two hang all the law and the prophets. Whatever moral and ethical values are contained in legal codes or prophetic disclosures are suspended from, and dependent for their reality and validity upon love for God and man. These are over all and superior to all.

The word “love” as used here means benevolence. It is the faculty of benevolence to seek always the highest good of the beloved object. Obviously one’s love for God cannot operate to supply anything that He needs or requires. As the ultimate Good He lacks no goodness which we can bestow. The love for God, therefore, must provide that which ultimate Good deserves by its own nature, not that which it needs or requires. And this is expressed in glory, praise or adoration. Man reaches the highest relationship to moral law when he reverences God.

This does not imply that we must always be specifically thinking of God as the object of our love. To love God with all of the heart, soul, mind, and strength does not require that we never concentrate our mind or energies upon any other subject. God must be the supreme preference of our hearts so that all life is enveloped in God, and whatever we do will spontaneously and naturally be done to His glory without having to pause in the activity to focus the mind's eye on the object. Indeed, when one must stop a project of scientific research or scholastic instruction in order to make certain in his own mind that he is glorifying God, he may be moved by doubt or fear, and demonstrate the imperfection of his love. "There is no room for fear in love; perfect love banishes fear" (1 John 4:18).

There must be a central point of power for the moral system as there is a heart for the physical structure. Since the right of choice makes man a moral agent, the heart of the moral system must be the mind's supreme preference. Just as the heart charges the source of life to every member of the body without specific thought or concentration on the fact, so the entire moral being is diffused with life by the supreme choice or preference of the heart. God is served and glorified in every pursuit of life when the person is surrendered wholly to Him. We do not need to stop at the close of every action and credit it to Him, for all we have and are belongs to Him, and everything we do is directed to His glory and praise!

The Tether

Mission Messenger (April 1967)

[Abstract]

The little village where I was born was surrounded by land which was called “free range.” This meant that you could turn your cows out of the lot and they could eat where they wished. You fenced your garden or yard if you wanted to guard against a stray cow looking in your window. Now we fence cattle in, then we fenced them out.

As a barefoot boy, my task was to search for our cow and those of the neighbors, and drive them home for milking in the evening. Occasionally there would be a cow which, like some humans, had a tendency to stray too far. Such a cow was said to have “wandering fever” when she went “over the hill.”

A very effective method of restraint was practiced in such cases. It was called “staking out.” We had an iron bar which was driven into the ground and a rope fastened about the cow’s neck was also looped around the stake and tied. The amount of territory which such an animal could cover was regulated by the length of the tether. The area where it might be done was determined by where the stake was driven. Life and activity revolved around the stake as a center.

This is a very homely example of what happens to one who allows himself to be “staked out” by the party spirit. Whatever one makes a test of fellowship becomes the center of his life and thought. The rope of the party about his neck will allow him to crop the truth only so far. The cry of the factional system has been the same in all ages, "Conform or be crucified!"

But a great revolution is taking place in "The Church of Christ." For the first time in a century the winds of change are sweeping across and affecting every faction, even the most reactionary. This has never occurred before since we adopted the fallacy of seeking to unite the world to Christ by practicing division among ourselves. It is evident in the letters which cross our desk. It is manifest in the long distance calls from preachers who want to know if there is a congregation known to us which would allow them to be free men in Christ. It is seen in bulletins and papers edited by young brethren in every faction, noble young men who are sick of the hypocrisy involved in a disguised sectarianism.

One of these days a great transformation will come. Brethren will start pulling up their stakes and will begin to move closer to our blessed Lord as the only real center valid for a worthwhile plea to a sinful world. All of us who love Him and one another will be tethered to the stake which God drove down into the earth at Golgotha. The only rope about our necks will be the invisible cord of love. It is amazing how elastic that cord will be in a widening brotherhood. It will be astonishing how firmly that stake will hold us to a common center and restrain us from going too far.

In the meantime we should begin an apostolate of prayer for those are even now tugging and straining at the party ropes, who are weary of the treadmill and sick of the circle. Pray for those who have scaled divisive walls and from their tops have glimpsed the verdant fields of fellowship beyond, but who are still restrained even as they long for freedom. But freedom will come to the people of God, for the Spirit of God is mightily at work in our age!

Beware of Gribbles

Mission Messenger (April 1967)

It is very unlikely that the restoration movement, of which most of our readers are heirs, will ever sustain great loss through a direct frontal assault of those three philosophic rebels — atheism, skepticism, and agnosticism— although they may capture an occasional straggler who is lagging behind in the march and throwing rocks at his brethren.

Our greatest danger, as I see it, comes from what I call “spiritual gribbles.” Real gribbles are little marine crustaceans who are first cousins to the wood louse. The gribble has no shell and is only about a half inch long, but a family of gribbles can do untold damage. These insignificant creatures bore into and gnaw away at piers and other underwater wooden installations until the whole structure is undermined and weakened and eventually falls.

I always think of gribbles when I read some of the papers published by brethren who “major in minors.” There is no question in my mind that the Father wanted a family more than anything else, for only a family can make the term “father” relevant. He was willing to sacrifice the best that heaven had in order to make that family possible. Jesus shed his blood to make us blood-brothers!

The Father loves all of His children in spite of their foibles and weaknesses. He created only one body so it must be big enough to include intellectuals and uninformed, strong and weak, wise and unwise. God's children would have come from both sides of the tracks, except for the fact that Jesus removed the tracks. There is no "other side" in Christ.

Many brethren have not caught the spirit of the Spirit! They bore away on such matters as fermented wine in the Lord's Supper, the method of breaking the bread, the nature of the second coming, the teaching of the Bible in classes, and a score of other controversial matters, and build parties and sects around their views and concepts. It is not the holding of opinions on these things, nor even the expressing of them which does despite to the body, but the crystallization of factions around the pro and con of them, which weakens the structure.

The restoration ideal has not been successfully attacked by its enemies. It has only been made to appear ridiculous by its friends. That a movement begun as "a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects" should fragment over the question of teaching the Bible in classes is just as absurd as it looks to a cynical world. The same thing holds true for the millennium or instrumental music.

The depth of love a man has for God may be measured by the nature of the thing which he allows to separate him from his brothers. If a man thinks more of his views on instrumental music (either for or against) than he does the blood shed on the cross, which makes us one, he will divide the brethren and relegate the cross to a secondary place. From that day forward the test will no longer be what one thinks of Christ, or whose Son he may be. The burning question will be where he stands on the music issue. Heaven and earth will be summoned to await with bated breath the expression of his views on this universe-shaking question. But if the cross is the supreme thing in life its arms will be allowed to reach out and embrace those whose views are utterly divergent on many things!

The tragedy of our present predicament is that in the midst of an age when throbbing drums betoken the rise of new nations of primitive peoples in the parliaments of the world, when millions are threatened by the torture of starvation in India, when the great questions of the population explosion and of birth control rock the congresses of the earth, when Communism stalks the free world like a hungry wolf-pack, our brethren are debating whether it is a sin against God to sit down and eat together in the meetinghouse. The gribbles are gnawing away at our piers in a day when we need all of the strength we can muster in a united front against evil!

Facing Death

Mission Messenger (April 1967)

“It is appointed unto man once to die.” This appointment has been made for us by God and we must keep it. There is no evading it. One outstanding feature of the Way is that it teaches us how to die by showing us how to live. The apostle Paul wrote from his Roman prison, “I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ; which is far better” (Philippians 1:23).

One time we were driving in the mountains and came to the mouth of a narrow gorge. We enquired of the operator of a filling-station about the road. He replied, “You can get through without too much difficulty, but you can’t come back if you change your mind. There’s no place to turn around.” In our own section of Missouri there is an area covered by huge red granite boulders. It is called “Elephant Rocks” because it looks like a herd of large pachyderms on the hillside. Some of the rocks lie so close together it is hard to work your way between them. One narrow defile is even called “Fat Man’s Misery.”

The word for “strait” is senechomai. It is the very word for such a narrow passage between rocks as we have described. Paul was walking a narrow trail between two conflicting desires and he knew that he was not coming back. One cannot reverse time. The fountain of youth exists only in the imagination.

But it is the word for “depart” which gives me a genuine inner uplift of the spirit. It is analuo, and it was used in three different senses by the Greeks.

(1) It was employed for the act of loosing the moorings of a ship in preparation for sailing. As a lad Paul had probably played around the docks at Tarsus and watched the ships put out to sea. He knew that the cable which warped the ship into the wharf had to be untied and cast off before the ship was free. To him death was not the end of the voyage, but the beginning. Death was loosing the ropes.

(2) The word was applied to taking down a tent in a military campaign. William Barclay translates the passage: “I am caught between two desires for I have my desire to strike camp and be with Christ.” Charles Kingsley Williams renders it, “My desire is to fold my tent and be with Christ.” Soldiers take down their tents when the horrors of battle are over and they can return home. It is not true that Christians leave home when they die— they go home!

(3) Last of all the Greeks used analuo to describe the loosing of the yoke or saddle girths to remove the burden from the back of a pack animal. This is what death does for us at twilight. The loads of life are lifted and the burdens taken down so that the spirit is set free. We can readily see why Paul, writing from prison with such a philosophy, would want to depart.

The Nature of Reform

Mission Messenger (April 1967)

Volume 29

A good brother in Tennessee who has risen above the sectarian attitude which once held him in its frightful grip, writes as follows:

It is evident that your thinking and that of Brother Leroy Garrett has affected the orthodox Church of Christ far more than the leaders will admit. I must confess that I am amazed, for in spite of your constant optimism I did not think it could happen. There is a growing difference in emphasis which betokens the coming of even greater changes when it seeps into consciousness on the congregational level. What bothers me is why prominent leaders do not acknowledge your contribution to the ferment of thought, allow you to speak at Abilene Christian College lectureship, and recommend MISSION MESSENGER to at least the thinking members of the congregation, who are in inward revolt against their stereotypes.

As brilliant as the writer is, he forgets two things— the history and the nature of reforms. A knowledge of the first would serve to remind him that it is far too early for an existing structure to acknowledge indebtedness to its voices crying in the wilderness. Brother Garrett and myself are both yet alive, and one must be dead at least a hundred years before the brethren start gathering up the stones which their grandfathers flung to create a monument from them. To be a real hero in the religious world one must start as a heretic in his own generation.

This bothers me none at all. I am sold out to Christ. I intend to serve Him the best I can regardless of consequences. I do not seek a following and I have renounced all factionalism. It would be ridiculous for one who deplors all schism to create a division by banding together a group of personal admirers. The cause is the thing! We are expendable. Let the good work go on and let the glory go to God. If we go to our graves “unwept, unhonored and unsung,” what difference does that make? The reward is on the other side of the tomb.

Human nature and the factional spirit being what they are, it makes a great deal of difference who says a thing. A courageous brother addressing a preacher’s luncheon not long ago, said: “If either Batsell Barrett Baxter or J. D. Thomas was saying what Carl Ketcherside is saying about fellowship he would be hailed as a second Alexander Campbell.” In the same state, so it was reported to me, a college president replied to a question about my writings, “Carl is right, and one of these days we will all have to admit it, but we’ll have to wait until some of our own men begin to say it.” There are two things which hinder my political progress. I grew up in the wrong party and I absolutely refuse to join another. So much for what history reveals about reformation!

The nature of reform indicates that it will come. As our brother points out, it is already on its way. But it will come gradually and almost imperceptibly. There will be no headlines in Gospel Advocate or Firm Foundation. There will be no testimonial dinners in Dallas or Fort Worth. The antagonistic bitterness will fade from the pulpit. There will be fewer talks on why we do not use instrumental music and more on why we should learn the meaning of grace. Debates between brethren will gradually disappear and be replaced by meaningful dialogue.

College lectureships will slowly become relevant to the twentieth century. Elders will refuse to have a preacher whose own inner lack of security drives him to lash out at everyone else. Everyone will deny they are changing but all will be doing so, just the same. The time is not far distant when brethren of good character will be recognized and called upon to participate in meetings regardless of personal opinion about divisive things.

Great things are happening now! In numerous places brethren who use instrumental music and those who do not are arranging seminars, workshops and other activities together. College-career groups are cutting across all of our artificial lines. Missionaries in some places are holding joint conferences with reference to their problems. As Jesus becomes more important to us, so do our brothers, while things lose significance unless they lead to Him.

Let's not get perturbed about recognition for a couple of earthen vessels. It is still true that neither he that planteth nor he that watereth is anything. It is God that giveth the increase. If any man glory, let him glory in the Lord!

It is very important, I think, that none of us be tempted to take any credit for what is obviously happening in the removal of walls and barriers among all of our brethren. It is simply another of those periods which can be called a "fulness of the times," and the Spirit of God is using some very humble instruments to effect God's purpose. If we were to hold our peace "the stones would cry out," for in such times the will of God must take on new meaning for all!

Out of This World

Mission Messenger (May 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

In each generation the saints on earth are faced with new challenges. The human mind is not static. The discoveries of the past are used as foundations for additional research in the present. The only certain thing about our world is change. The called out ones are never of the world, but they are to be always in the world, yet the world in which they are is a different one than that in which any of their fathers have been.

For this reason each generation must work out its own technique for effective encounter with “its world.” Methods of the past which have proven effective may be retained, but even these must be adapted to current situations or no real communication will be achieved. There are always two dangers. One is that we shall bind our arms by the approaches which worked in yesterday’s world; the other is that we may saddle our children with those which seemed effectual in our own world.

Man likes to categorize his successive eras of growth for historical purposes. He thus speaks of The Stone Age, The Bronze Age, The Machine Age, The Space Age, and so on. We suspect these arbitrary distinctions are not always too valid, as no one can tell where one age starts and another ends. It is a wee bit ridiculous to talk about “the Middle Ages” when you do not know how much time we have left. What seems like “the middle” to one generation may appear to be away off on one side to another.

Every age is resistant to change because of the innate desire for security. Thus, the alterations that are made often come by revolution rather than by more peaceful evolution. So we talk about the scientific revolution, or the industrial revolution, exactly as we speak of the American Revolution, or the French Revolution. Revolution sometimes means rather violent attack upon the existing order, and this calls forth frantic attempts to defend and protect the status quo.

Because of its nature, the community of the ransomed ones is frequently involved in a struggle with the forces of change since it is the temporal representative of The Changeless One. Unfortunately, it does not always carefully distinguish between change that is neutral and natural (and therefore helpful), as opposed to that which is harmful and destructive. Upon such occasions it tends toward blind reaction rather than to effective action. A good example is in the encounter with the scientific revolution, in which religious champions were sometimes betrayed into assuming positions which have since proven embarrassing.

Today we have an intellectual revolution created by a breakthrough in numerous areas of research, coupled with a bringing into focus of all the discoveries of the past. The world in which our generation is cast is one of brilliance in many aspects of life. It seems to challenge the conventions and standards upon which we have always relied. It is especially antagonistic toward the structures of society. In every domain of existence including the governmental, economic, domestic and religious, "The Establishment" is under bombardment.

The reaction of the community of believers has frequently been to surrender the contested area and to retire within its own defences. A good example is the field of higher education. Since this is the real battleground for the mind of modern man, and the one where “the enemy” has chosen to marshal his forces, let us consider the strategy which has been adopted by followers of the Christ.

The first thing noticeable is that they have often withdrawn from encounter with the world and have constructed little artificial worlds of their own. They have erected barricades around these, and within their own fortresses they bombard their own forces with propaganda as to the tactical weakness of the foe. They spend their time talking to each other, and their money and energy in making their walls thicker and more secure.

Within these protected compounds they sometimes build their own educational establishments, but these are frequently primarily devoted to indoctrination, and since their products are not intended to enter into direct meaningful combat with the real enemy, a great deal of the training is devoted to the advanced methods of disarming other companies stationed in other barracks.

To justify such restricted action the position has been adopted that in any encounter of truth with error, the former must always suffer humiliating defeat, and the real purpose of the believers is to protect and save the truth. To enforce this view, any invasion of the field of higher education is discouraged, and those who ignore the warning are brought under suspicion and harassment. Sometimes the atmosphere is rendered intolerable.

Most of the current strategy of the community is calculated to thwart any serious attempt to go into all of the world. It operates to keep its adherents from making any such thrust. Fighting must be done from entrenched positions. Often a piece of ground is bought and a pillbox constructed before a single soldier is planted in the area. There is no provision for commandoes who fight behind the lines and must sometimes do so alone.

Many times we confuse going into all the world with going to a lot of points on the globe. There is a great difference between scattering our forces geographically and penetrating the world. It is even possible to go somewhere else on earth to keep from having to go into the world. The African jungle may be an easier place to work than the asphalt jungle in the inner city.

We may well be mistaken, but it is our personal conviction that the world will continue its intellectual drive, rather than lessening it. The more enlightened nations will continue the upward educational spiral and the lesser enlightened ones will be drawn into it inevitably. The community of saints must recapture this territory from which it has retreated, or be overcome by attrition. God has not promised to keep enough people ignorant so we can survive!

Soon there will be no other world than the intellectual world. If we go into the world at all it will have to be this one. We venture, with some degree of reluctance, to suggest to our readers and their friends, certain proposals which we believe to be valid. We will not be perturbed if you do not concur with us. We will love you just as much as if you did.

1. We must lose our anti-intellectual bias. The community of saints has been betrayed into the position that revealed truth will be washed down the drain when it seeks to penetrate the advanced scholastic realm. It cannot be denied that a species of intellectual snobbery has often been demonstrated by some whose faith in Christ has been shaken by the assault made upon it, and this has frightened the saints. But we can never eliminate the human factor, and we must remember that a man is what he wills to be. He makes a deliberate choice.

It is rather incongruous to argue that ignorance better qualifies one to choose or that we should set academic limitations in order to hold the saints firm in their commitment to Christ. This would be equivalent to arguing that the way to keep people faithful is to keep them ignorant!

The fact is that we owe a great deal to scholarly men among us whose research in linguistics (to mention but one field) has made the word of God more meaningful to us. We should never place a premium upon ignorance nor a checkrein upon advancing knowledge. To exhibit a fear of intellectual advancement does not prove the strength of our faith, but demonstrates the weakness of our trust in it.

2. We must conquer our awe of degrees and revere all men for their work of faith and labor of love. The fact that one is qualified to speak with some measure of certainty in one discipline does not mean that he is an expert in all. Thus we should not deprecate formal education upon the one hand, nor make a golden calf out of it upon the other. One may be a trained psychiatrist and not qualify as a Biblical exegete. A very humble saint who has devoted his life to a study of the revelation of God may speak with much greater clarity about the word of God than one who has specialized only in human motivations and behaviorism.

The ideal in the community of believers is attained when all, including both skilled and unskilled, are given an opportunity to contribute what they have to offer for the good of all. The man who is more familiar with the text of the Book may be better adapted to the conduct of home Bible studies, while wholly inadequate to deal with neurotic and psychotic conditions. The body of Christ is sufficiently great to make use of the talents of all its members, and can only function to its highest peak of efficiency when it does so.

3. It is our contention that the forces of righteousness must reverse their strategy and recapture the field of higher education for the Christian dynamic. Jesus is directing a war of conquest. The kingdom of this world must become the kingdom of our Lord. He must rule until His enemies become His footstool.

But conquest is achieved by taking the initiative and waging aggressive warfare. A war cannot be won by holding the fort, or while in retreat. It cannot be won from an entrenched position. Too often we have been shelling enemy fortifications which have been abandoned for half a century. Those whom we honor as heroes are frequently men who parade their prowess only in front of their own troops and have never had a real confrontation with the foe.

What we call “fighting for Christ” is all too often shadow-boxing for the entertainment of the home forces. Many a valiant “soldier” has earned his reputation without ever getting outside of the barracks, or out of sight of company headquarters. Our weapon of conquest is a sword. It requires close in-fighting and face-to-face encounter. We have mistaken fencing with one another for fighting the foe, and while we have gained some release from boredom we have made no appreciable dent in enemy strongholds.

It is our intention, God willing, to make some practicable suggestions in coming issues of the paper for the development of an effective strategy for our day. But while we await the coming of those suggestions we would not wish to leave the impression that nothing is being done. The fact is that a great many disciples are aroused to the need of real encounter. They are personally witnessing to their faith on campuses, in conventions of scholarly men, and elsewhere. They testify boldly of the living Lord and of the abiding presence of His Spirit.

A couple of years ago it was my privilege to share the speaking honors at a banquet with a notable scientist who had given up his position in nuclear research to proclaim the Good News of Jesus. He is still in demand as a speaker at scientific gatherings all over the world. As we talked about our witness to our contemporaries, he told of an address which he had delivered the previous week in Paris. Before reading his paper, he informed the erudite company that he wanted to pay honor to One who had done more than any person on earth to make possible his being there. Taking his New Testament from his pocket he then read to them about the grace of God and the hope of eternal life.

In my travels I have met others like this brother in the Lord who are members of “the fellowship of the unashamed.” I glory in the Lord for the courage He has given them, but sometimes one may be unashamed and still ineffective. We shall hope, by God’s grace, to help all who read our humble effort, to develop those attitudes and approaches which will enable us to present a more timely and cogent witness in our generation, which calls itself “the beat generation.” We shall hope to help those who are not a people to become the people of God, and to help those who have not found mercy to obtain it.

The Meaning of Grace

Mission Messenger (May 1967)

Volume 29

In Romans 11:6, the apostle Paul is speaking about a remnant of Israel who are “according to the election of grace.” He says, “And if by grace, then is it no more of works: otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then it is no more of grace: otherwise work is no more work.”

J. B. Phillips puts this rather complex statement in simple fashion, thus, “And if it is a matter of the grace of God, it cannot be a question of their actions especially deserving God’s favour, for that would make grace meaningless.”

It seems to me that many among us have done just that—made grace meaningless! Perhaps this is done most frequently by legalism. John writes, “For the law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ” (John 1:17). Grace is undeserved kindness, truth is reality. The law which was given by Moses is placed in contrast with that kindness and reality which came by Christ. Nothing in scripture is clearer than the fact that “we are not under law, but under grace” (Romans 6:15).

The position of many would best be expressed by a statement, “For the law was given by Moses, and another one was given by Jesus Christ.” They believe that Jesus nailed one law to the cross and handed another one down. Indeed it is not uncommon to hear brethren argue that the principal function of grace was to deliver us another law. They cannot distinguish between a written code and life in Christ Jesus. That life stems from the principle of the indwelling Spirit. We are plainly told, “For the new spiritual principle of life in Christ Jesus lifts me out of the old vicious circle of sin and death” (Romans 8:2). That vicious circle is where law finds one. It is also where it leaves him! No law can give life!

If grace is not to be meaningless, how can we make it meaningful? There is but one answer to this, and that is to restore to it the meaning attached to it by the Spirit. We say “by the Spirit” for the simple reason that the Spirit adopted the Greek word charis and gave it a new and glorious significance.

Originally it referred to that property in a thing which caused those who viewed or experienced it to rejoice in it, or to be happy with it. By a natural evolution, characteristic of the Greeks, it eventually was used to describe that which gave them the greatest pleasure or satisfaction.

Since the Greek mind was stimulated by the arts, and rejoiced in grace and beauty above all else, charis was used to designate these things.

The next step was the application of the word, not to a state or quality of a thing, but to its bestowal upon or manifestation to others, for their blessing or benefit. It was here the Spirit found it and appropriated it, elevating it from earth to heaven, and using it to describe God’s giving of Himself in Christ.

Generations before Jesus was born, Aristotle had prepared the Greek mind for this tremendous content of charis, by defining it as a beneficence, a gift freely bestowed with no expectation of response, and with no other motive whatsoever than the love and generosity of the giver.

There are no conditions attached to grace itself. It is a gift! It is not an award for goodness nor a reward for performance. Being a gift, all that one must do is to reach out and take it, but the reaching is not a condition attached to the grace. It is simply a means of appropriating it by the individual. It is grace whether you accept it or not. Your refusal does not alter grace, although its acceptance will certainly alter you!

We make grace meaningless by first cheapening it, and then supplanting it. It is easier to do this than to accept it, for the acceptance of it requires utter negation of self. Pride keeps us from welcoming crucifixion. But grace is not a book, a message, a proclamation, a law, or a code of morals. Grace is God coming in Christ with truth, so that we can receive of His fulness and grace for grace (John 1:16).

Certainly the grace that brings salvation teaches us to deny ungodliness and worldly lust, but grace is the teacher, not the act of teaching, and not the thing taught. If we make our heart a home for the teacher, the instruction will come from within, not from without. Then we may say, “But by the grace of God I am what I am, and his grace which was bestowed upon me was not in vain” (1 Cor. 15:10).

The Fulness of Godhood

Mission Messenger (May 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

The word “Godhead” occurs only twice in the King James Version. The first time is in Romans 1:20, where the apostle is showing that no sensible person can plead lack of proof of the existence of God as the ground of atheism. “For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse.”

The second is in Colossians 2:9, where it is affirmed of Christ, “For in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily.”

I am indebted to Richard Chenevix Trench, and his “Synonyms of the New Testament,” for first calling to my attention that these are from two different terms. Since then I have pursued the matter more deeply upon my own and have found confirmatory evidence elsewhere.

In the passage in Romans the subject is what one may learn about God from observation. The visible things in creation enable us to clearly see certain “invisible things” related to the creator. Obviously “the things that are made” are a result, and bespeak a cause preceding the result, and one adequate to produce it. By application of logical processes we can deduce certain traits or characteristics as belonging to the creator.

The apostle defines these traits as “eternal power and Godhead.” It is his contention that the natural realm furnishes to the mental faculties a sufficient amount of foundational material to allow us to reach the conclusion that the Prime Cause of creation possessed power, and that this power was eternal, that is, uncreated and personal (as we believe all power to be in its ultimate). This leads one step further and brings us to the point of admission that the source of eternal, or uncreated power, is divine. He uses the word “Godhead” to express that divinity. The Greek term here is theiotes.

Now there is a great deal of difference in knowing about the traits and attributes of God, as expressed through creative energy, and knowing God personally. One may see a beautiful building and from it learn a great deal about the skill and ability of the architect, and never know him as an individual at all. God not only wanted to make a world which would demonstrate that He was possessed of divine power, but He also wanted to create a family which would reveal Him as a Father. A universe could demonstrate that He was God, but only personal love could exhibit Him as a Father.

To fulfill His purpose it was necessary that He manifest himself as a person. This He did in His Son. The Word was made flesh. We beheld His glory. That glory was the glory of the only begotten Son of God. “God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself.” The Eternal Word became embodied. The fulness of Godhead dwelt in him bodily, that is, in a body.

The word for Godhead here is theotes. It is probably best translated “deity.” My regular readers know that I have long contended for the word “Godhood” as opposed to “Godhead.” The last does not mean much to most of us, but just as “priesthood” involves all that is related to the priestly domain, so Godhood implies all that is embraced in Deity. Only in Christ can we know God personally. The very next verse after the one which asserts that the “fulness of Godhood” dwelt in him, says,

“And ye are complete in him, which is the head of all principality and power” (Colossians 2:10).

For the benefit of modern theologians, Romans 1:20 exhibits the transcendence of God, while Colossians 2:9 exhibits His immanence. The God whom I revere is not limited by the terms which men invent to describe Him. I find no need to debate whether He is transcendent or immanent, because to me there is One God, not only transcendent and immanent, but vastly more than either of these, or both of them taken together. My God is not an either/or proposition. Nature may argue eloquently for a divine creator and does so, but the Son of God was Deity incarnate! I need not fully explain Him to know that I am His, and He is mine!

The Power of Christ

Mission Messenger (May 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

For reasons which we will not take time here to mention we have long held the opinion that the epistle called “Hebrews” was addressed to Palestinian Jews. It was written while the temple was still standing and its daily ritual still prevailed. Those to whom it was addressed had accepted Jesus as the Messiah, but were in danger of defecting again to Judaism, thus denying the validity of the cross, and the efficacy of the blood shed by the Son of God.

One can imagine the lure of the pageantry and pomp of the temple service to those who had grown up in orthodox Judaism. The simplicity which characterized the Way, without buildings, a priestly caste, or sacerdotal trappings, must have made it appear drab to many. Little groups meeting in private homes must often have noted those missing from their number, only to learn that they had returned to the temple and its daily sacrifices upon the altar.

In order to counter this falling away the author wrote this treatise to show that in Christ we have something far superior to that which the Mosaic economy could offer. The keyword is “better” and it occurs thirteen times. Each chapter seems to prove that ours is a better arrangement. (1) Christ is better than angels. (2) The message of Christ is better than the one spoken by angels. (3) Christ is better than Moses. (4) Christ is better than Joshua. (5) Christ has a better priesthood. (6) We have a better hope. (7) Christ is better than Levi. (8) We have a better covenant. (9) We have a better service. (10) We have a better sacrifice. (11) We have a better faith. (12) We have a better kingdom. (13) We have a better altar.

Jesus is the center and circumference of the Hebrew letter. Nothing had any authority which did not stem from Him; nothing had any validity which did not lead to Him. He was truly “the end of the law for righteousness to everyone who believes.” He is revealed as the creator of the worlds (1:2); the captain of our salvation (2:10); the Apostle and High Priest of our profession (3:1); our forerunner (6:20); the minister of the true tabernacle which the Lord pitched (8:2); the mediator of the new covenant (9:15; 12:24); and the author and finisher of our faith (12:2).

It seems apparent from this that God’s remedy against defection is to instil a proper understanding of our relationship to Jesus Christ our Lord. Every aspect of life must be adjusted in the framework of this relationship. Jesus is not the head of some department of life, or of some segment of daily existence. He is not the supervisor of the bureau of religion, but the Lord of the whole life. One is as much within His care and concern when sitting in a mathematics class, or when listening to the radio with his family, as when sitting in a pew of a “religious edifice.” Life in Christ is not regulated by the clock or calendar. It is not turned on and off like a faucet.

To be in Christ is to be plugged in to the very source of power, to be attached to the divine dynamo, or the generator of grace. There are seven things affirmed about the status of Jesus which indicate the nature of His power. These are concentrated in two verses— Hebrews 1:2, 3. Jesus is the heir of all things (universal power); the maker of the worlds (creative power); the brightness of God’s glory (majestic power); the express image of God’s person (divine power); the upholder of all things (sustaining power); the purger of our sins (saving power); and he is seated at God's right hand (ruling power).

Here is the power to perform all that life demands of one. It is available unto us in the Savior. There is the power to properly handle whatever state comes to us, whether poverty or affluence; power to face pain and suffering, or the lack of them, which may be even harder; and the power to face either the cross or the tomb. How can anyone defect or desert who is conscious of what is ours in Christ?

Simple Solutions

Mission Messenger (May 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

Recently I have been paying some attention to that aspect of the party spirit which manifests itself in the glib answer to every human situation, regardless of how deep are its involvements and how intertwined are its roots. I think that the factional attitude always exhibits a spirit of dogmatism coupled with a feeling of infallibility, and this creates and perpetuates tensions. The opinions of the leaders in one generation become precedents for succeeding generations, and these harden into traditions which are actually equated with the will of God.

Much of this stems from insecurity in the hearts of those who regard their relationship with God as purely a matter of correct interpretation of legalistic statutes, rather than a personal one. This is more of a lawyer-client relationship than a father-son association. The salvation of those within it depends upon their being “right” on every issue, regardless of its degree of importance. It is unthinkable that one could be wrong about anything for that would make him “a brother in error,” a term used only as a description of those outside the party pale. No one in any of the parties is in error. All of them have the truth, and all of them disagree as to what it is!

Accordingly, each party looks to its controlling voices to hand down the official ruling and this becomes the blanket interpretation covering every situation in a general category.

There are no extenuating circumstances or mitigating conditions, so there is no room for mercy or compassion.

We constantly receive letters from brethren who oppose instrumental music, asking how they should regard “members of the Christian Church” in their communities. We get just as many letters from those in Independent Christian Churches enquiring how they should treat members of the “Disciples of Christ” party.

Such questions reveal a lot more about the questioners than about those of whom they ask. One wonders about the type of reasoning which concludes that someone in Missouri can prescribe a course of universal treatment to be applied to all within a certain religious coalition, thousands of whom he will never meet on earth. But the sectarian mentality must “pigeon-hole” everyone for its own security. And each box must be neatly labeled, with a list of instructions on how to treat the pigeons, tacked on the door.

Such a procedure avoids the responsibility of enlightened human contact and exchange. It enables one to evade weighing individual factors and evaluating causative conditions. It is simple, easy and quick. It is too simple to be Christ-like and just simple enough to be Pharisaical. We are the righteous. We are the children of Abraham and were never in bondage to any man. All of the others are publicans and sinners. But Jesus went to the others. He felt at home among those who knew they were sinners.

God never lumps people off. He never herds them into a corral to brand them. God regards no one as a Methodist, or a Baptist, or a Presbyterian— or a Christian Churcher, or a Church of Christ. These are labels men have invented. God deals with each person in the world as an individual. He takes him where He finds him, each one in his own uniqueness, and each must stand or fall on his own responsibility. Thus, there are no easy answers, no blanket decrees, no simple solutions. Not everything is a very black black, or a very white white. There are some gray areas, and some of these alter in hue from day to day as you weigh additional facts which are revealed.

I once knew all of the answers. Every problem of life was simple. Nothing was too complex for me to handle. All one had to do was to apply the scripture. The Bible did not need to be interpreted, all it needed was to be obeyed. Those who did not agree with us were either ignorant or dishonest, and it did not bother me that there were so many of them. Those who loved truth were always in a minority. This kind of a spirit has fragmented the restoration movement into two dozen sects. The preachers in each one have a sermon outline on “The way that is right and cannot be wrong.” All of them think that all of the others are wrong and cannot be right.

Now I realize that security does not lie in having all of the right answers but in being in the right person. There are some fairly ignorant folk in Him, and some fairly bright ones who are not in Him. We need to be grateful that we will not be judged by others, nor by our degree of intellectual attainment. It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God, but it is almost as frightful to fall into the hands of a lot of living brethren.

Instead of drawing up a formula to fit every situation, or drafting decrees to cover every exigency, we will be better off if we relax in His arms and do unto others as we would have them do unto us. None of our parties have an infallible interpretation. All of us have much to learn. During the process it will not harm us to occasionally be forced to say, “I do not know.”

The only brethren I have are “brothers in error.” There aren’t any other kind! And because we are all in the same boat, there isn’t much use of painting signs for each little craft. I’ve quit looking at the boat and I intend to keep my eye on the Captain, who is the author and finisher of my faith!

To the extent that we exalt any man as a leader of a party, to that extent we disregard Jesus as the head of the body and the Lord of the whole church, and thus oppose the divine purpose.

The Spiritual Principle

Mission Messenger (May 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

The community of saints is a divine organism. It originated in the mind of God and is the result of divine purpose. Yet it is composed of human beings who are joined to one another only because they are joined to Jesus. The center of attraction is not within themselves at all. It does not lie within human nature.

Every institution among men must be built upon a principle, and that principle must be so related that the institution grows out of it, and gives expression to it. If the institution survives it must exist to maintain its foundational principle even while it is sustained by it. And the nature of the institution will be determined by the nature of the principle to which it traces its inception.

Political institutions, whether democratic, republican, monarchial, socialistic, or otherwise, must be built upon political principles. Economic institutions must be built upon economic principles. Moral institutions must be built upon moral principles. Spiritual institutions must be built upon spiritual principles. These principles nourish the institutions, even as the institutions which hope to survive must cherish the principles which called them into existence.

The community of believers is not built upon a political philosophy, or upon a socio-economic theory, but upon a historic fact, attested to by credible witnesses. That fact is simply that God has manifested Himself to the rational beings whose chief purpose in existence is to glorify Him. To enable the achievement of this purpose divine disclosure was essential and it was afforded in three aspects— creation, incarnation and revelation.

In creation we are exposed to the power of God; in incarnation to the person of God; in revelation to the purpose of God. In these are found all of the elements required to make life in the flesh span meaningful, and to enable us to derive the blessings attendant upon the real divine-human encounter.

In creation every element essential to our relationship to life on the earth is provided.

In incarnation every element essential to our relationship to God is provided. “He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father.”

In revelation every element essential to our relationship to Christ is provided. “If ye continue in my words, then are ye my disciples indeed” (John 8:31).

God has spoken! The flock of God is composed of those who have seen His works, and heard His words, and have responded unto them by complete surrender to the Call. Christ broke through the flesh curtain to be with them, some day they will break through it to be with Him. In the meantime they are (sustained by the Word, even as they seek to share it with others in love.

To relinquish the principle of revelation is to renounce our purpose for continuation upon the earth, and our hope of glorification in the life beyond.

The Mission of Wholeness

Mission Messenger (June 1967)

[Abstract]

Perhaps our brethren who have grown up in the restoration movement have had a mistaken view of mission which has operated to keep them from effective encounter with the world. In an attempt to avoid being of the world, they have sometimes actually not been in it. On at least two occasions in the past, colonies of the disciples have withdrawn to remote mountain areas to live a sort of communal life in simplicity, free from contact with worldly enticements. Both of these projects failed because of a gentle revolution of their children, or grandchildren, who deserted the colonies to return to society.

In the twentieth century the attempt to preserve a monastic type of existence has relied upon the more subtle restraints and pressures of factional loyalty. This has been rather successful in the past. In some communities there have been as many as ten different kinds of “Churches of Christ.” The members of one group have no acquaintance with those of any other. There is no sense of family relationship across the lines. Each one regards all of the others as either “sectarian” or “extremist.” A sectarian is one who endorses what the group opposes; an extremist is one who opposes what the group endorses.

Group activities are attended only by those affiliated with congregations allied with the sponsoring faction. For example, a song rally will bring together only “the loyal brethren,” a term used to describe those, in each instance, who adhere to the partisan tests of fellowship. If there are ten divergent groups in a city there will be ten different kinds of “loyal brethren,” none of whom will have anything to do with any of the others. The young people of one segment are discouraged from dating those in another. When love triumphs over party pressures and two young people from different factions marry, one or both (depending upon where they attend) will be given up as “lost to the cause.”

In this kind of rigid sectarian framework, it is obvious that there will be no cultivation of acquaintanceship outside the “Church of Christ,” for there is no recognition of fellowship even within its own parties. It has completely abandoned its original historic purpose as “a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects.” There are now no Christians in the sects. There are only sectarians in the sects, and “brothers in error” in the other parties. The Christians are those who agree with us, for we have no error and our interpretations are infallible. It does not bother us that there are two dozens of our factions which are infallible and also inveterately different from each other.

Within our monastery walls we are insulated from the world— even the religious world, the theological world. We mill about talking to one another. We listen only to “faithful brethren.” We bask in the assurance that we belong to God and in the greater feeling of security that He belongs to us. We have captured God and have Him in a box. The world in which God moves is not the one He created, but the one which we have made. He dare not go outside of our structures, because this would cause us to lose faith in Him. We have fenced God in with the barbed wire of our own interpretations and we know exactly how He must work in any age to be consistent— that is, with our theological concepts.

There is only one thing that presents a problem. God has a way of breaking through barriers and breaking down walls. He even broke through the flesh barrier in the incarnation, and battered down the fearsome racial wall between Jew and Greek. He does this when a “fulness of the times” arrives. There are a great many factors which contribute to the filling until a fulness is achieved. There are a lot of indications that “the Church of Christ” and the rest of the religious world, may be approaching such an era.

No simple explanation can be offered as to why we are going to be forced out of our shells and driven into the world where we ought to have been all of the time. God calls in multitudinous ways, and when He calls us out and we will not go, He sometimes pushes us out. He can even use evils to accomplish His purpose. War is an evil (although not necessarily a sin), but it has gathered young men from factional nests and flung them out into the world where their very homesickness for the manifested Christ has driven them into contact with those of other parties. Often they have discovered a depth of spiritual devotion which they never experienced in those with whom they have always associated. The term “loyal” takes on new meaning when one becomes aware that “the disloyal” are much closer to the cross than he has been. With such an awareness he can never again be satisfied with the old provincial alignments.

The major reason why we are bursting our factional bonds is because the factions are in a wholly different world than the one in which they were spawned. The members are breathing a different atmosphere. Our pressurized cabins are collapsing. The fresh winds are creeping through the crevices and seeping through the cracks. Our young people are becoming educated. They are being trained to think and to question. They are doing both, and the result is revolution, in the best sense of that term. The partisan answers no longer fit the pertinent questions. As always, the defenders of the status quo resent the questions. The partisan spirit thrives best when all of the dissenters swallow and none of them speak. The “faithful” should always gulp, but they should never gasp or gag!

But it will do us good for the future if we listen to the voices of some who are being designated “the new breed” of saints, and learn what things in our unwritten creeds and unwholesome attitudes they can no longer condone. We have been with some of them on university campuses, in fraternity “bull sessions,” and in dialogues of depth. We cannot speak for them. No single person can do that. We can suggest a few things which we have learned and we do so with some reluctance, for we have no particular urge to join the critics.

1. There is a revolt against the tendency to make God a kind of partisan ruler who is always on “our side” in every theological engagement. This is, in essence, a reversion to the age of tribal deities, and makes God too small. When we whittle God down to our sectarian size we end up actually worshipping ourselves. The voice of the party becomes the voice of God. There is ever a tendency to think of God as a “Church of Christ God,” a “Christian Church God,” or a “Baptist Church God.” In such thinking God is made to like what we like, and also to hate those whom we hate. To “worship God” is to perform, our distinctive ritual and to search His revelation to find confirmation for it.

2. There is an uneasiness over the tendency to compartmentalize men and to fragment personality. Worship is reserved for certain times and performed in certain places and structures. Salvation pertains only to a part of man rather than to the whole being. It consists primarily of keeping men out of hell rather than keeping hell out of men. And many who are thoroughly convinced that they will escape hell because they meet behind the right signboard on Sunday morning, have hearts that are filled with unloveliness and animosity. Attendance at the ritual hour coupled with financial gifts are the “animal sacrifices” (surrendered by the “animal man”) to atone for guilt while leaving the heart unpurged. It is impossible for men and money to take away sins!

The perceptive saints believe that every thought, intent, and act of the man in Christ, rendered in reverence for this divine-human relationship is worship. They know that the expression “the worship” is not found in the sacred scriptures. They are recapturing the meaning of salvation which is to make whole, and they know that it relates to the unshattered personality, and has to do with the physical, mental, moral and spiritual aspects of human nature. A group which regularly gathers to employ mass psychology in only one of these aspects, and which equates divine election with remaining in good graces with the group, can never truly represent the Christ to modern man. Jesus was worshipping as surely when He ate with publicans and sinners, relieved the embarrassment of a host by supplying wine, and fed a bedraggled mob, as when he read from Isaiah in the local synagogue. Jesus did not turn “worship” on and off like a faucet.

3. There is a growing resentment over the tendency to reduce men, who are made in the image of God, to partisan statistics, whose value to “The Establishment” lies principally in the “nose count” for the attendance figure in the weekly bulletin. In such situations men become pawns for clerical power plays and are digits in the climb to the “successful ministry.” The important thing is not that men count, but that they be counted. The growth of the “kingdom of heaven” is determined by the number of persons inside of religious structures at a specific hour on a given day, so that it is not so much a matter of what is within us, but of what we are within. Under these circumstances the kingdom does come with observation!

At the risk of being misunderstood, we must point out that there is a seething revolt against what is often referred to as “phony charity.” This is the kind of calculating concern which weighs human need and distress against partisan gain. The real consideration is not the desperate plight of the individual, but whether, if we help him materially, in his dark hour, we can motivate him to become a member of the clan. The philosophy is that we can only go “all out” for a family if there is a real chance of getting them “all in.” Real compassion, which always relieves need for mercy’s sake, and never counts either the cost or gain, is dubbed “the social gospel” and dismissed as an invention of Satan operating through “liberals.”

Not too long ago we attended a great lectureship on the campus of a Christian college. A panel session on the theme, “Modern Day Liberalism,” drew a capacity crowd to a spacious auditorium. One of the speakers was assigned the theme, “The Social Gospel.” It was evident from the outset that he had no conception of it within the scope of current theology. He began by defining what it is not, and pointed out that it was not installing a kitchen in the basement, or putting a drinking fountain in the foyer, of the congregational meetinghouse. After this profound observation he proceeded to tell of what the social gospel consisted, and left the astute listener convinced that Jesus practiced what the speaker deplored.

In the question period he was asked about the infiltration of the inner city ghetto to clothe the naked, feed the starving, furnish medicine for the sick, and minister to the depressed. His answer demonstrated that the church could engage in such a work only as a direct means of lining the unfortunate up with “the Lord’s church.” Thus, feeding the hungry must not really be an act of impartial compassion, but a conversion gimmick, and the distribution of clothing must be what is often referred to by our cynical critics as “sucker bait.” The news media must be informed of our program and proper credit must be given. The pay-off must be the goal of what is paid out! The trumpet must be blown to signal the gift. The left hand must be clued in on what the right hand doeth. Charity becomes a part of the publicity or propaganda budget.

Such a crass approach to human demoralization and disintegration under the guise of “giving the church the glory” is creating a reaction in the minds of many against the institutional church, which always covertly asks, “What do we get out of it?” The subtle art of talking out of both sides of the mouth about such questions as racial integration, birth control, and other problems (or, of not talking at all), tends to drive away the sensitive thinkers who conclude that once again the publicans and sinners may go into the real kingdom ahead of the scribes and Pharisees, who are “rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing.”

Our brethren, I think, conclude that when they oppose the “social gospel,” the world will automatically conclude that they have the gospel of Christ in its purity. Unfortunately, however, the world does not make this semantic switch or deduction. With them the alternative to the social gospel is an “anti-social gospel.” But the gospel of our blessed Lord is not anti-social. The Great Physician is no less a healer, a psychologist, and a moral counsellor, than a spiritual rescuer. When He ransomed man He delivered the whole man.

As His body upon earth, we must be concerned with every aspect of life. Certainly Jesus was concerned with those who hunger and thirst after righteousness, but He was also concerned about those with empty bellies and flagging energies who would “faint by the way.” We find ourselves always embroiled in the argument about “priority ratings.” “But which is more important,” we ask, “the body or the spirit?” We always assume there can be no dispute.

Jesus had a way of avoiding traps set by lawyers. When confronted with the alternative of keeping the sabbath inviolate (spiritual), or of healing an unfortunate cripple (physical). He did not say that either the spiritual or physical had the preferred rating, but man did! And whatever the man needed most at the time was what should be supplied.

A man who has been stabbed with a switchblade knife, and who lies bleeding on the street, does not need to be handed a tract on “Why I Left the Nazarene Church.” He needs to be rushed to a hospital. And if you go on passing out tracts, while a “lowly Nazarene” picks him up and takes him to the hospital, disregarding the gore that stains the upholstery of his new Ford, you might have been better off if you hadn’t left!

The point of all that we’re saying is simply that man cannot be drawn and quartered by those who are in the Way. A “social gospel” which deals only with environmental factors and ignores the fact that man is a sinner in need of amazing grace, is as inadequate as a gospel which seeks to relieve man’s total need by getting him into a religious meetinghouse three times per week. We are being challenged in our day to realize that laws and forms and structures, are secondary in importance to man. Man was not made for these, but vice versa. God still wants mercy and not sacrifice. Sacrifice in its totality can never become mercy, but mercy can give validity to sacrifice. Giving one’s body to be burned, when love is not involved, is merely adding fuel to the fire.

We can continue to close our ears to the voices of revolution and sit out the whirlwind in our ecclesiastical storm-cellars, but when we do emerge we may find a world so strange that we dare not go into it and cannot fulfill our mission. Or, we can with a courage born of faith in Him, penetrate our world now and seek assurance of His presence and promise, “Lo, I am with you always.” For me there is no real alternative to the latter!

Our Real Estate

Mission Messenger (June 1967)

[Abstract]

The changing world will demand a changing approach if we are to make any impact upon it with the Christian witness. And we do not like to change our tactics! We would prefer to continue with “business as usual” and pad our reports to make it appear that we are gaining. We have been betrayed into a “tried and true” philosophy which has convinced us that anything we have tried is true, and anything we have not tried cannot be. But time is running out on us while the world is outrunning us!

It is difficult for us to contemplate taking the world for Christ without becoming involved with building programs, structures and edifices. Accordingly, because of this emphasis, our concern is often not to find where stark need exists, but where we can find a building site with space for a parking lot. We may deliberately move the leaven out of an area of real mission into one of unconcern, but which is compatible with our “image.”

But our transformation from a rural to an urban society, and the corresponding ascendancy of backward nations with their increasing population figures, may force us to completely re-think our strategy. We may find that some things which we regarded as essential are only incidental to the work of the Master in our generation.

We cannot always retreat from reality in spite of our success in doing so thus far. The myth that we can flee to affluent suburbia and maintain the kingdom of heaven as a commonwealth of white middle-class Americans will fade away under the cold blue light of fact. We must go back into the world which we left for it is a part of the “all the world” into which we have been sent. And it doesn’t make any difference how sticky, or dirty, or smelly it may be. We were not told to go into the clean, sanitary part of the world, but into all of it, and some of it is pretty messy, and often bloody!

Suppose we resolve to leave our air-conditioned salt shakers and penetrate the strange world at our urban doorsteps, to lose our lives in order to find them! No one can ever really influence those who are forced by a hundred factors, known and unknown, to dwell in the inner city ghetto, unless he moves into the area, and identifies with them as Jesus did with us. Gospel meetings and crusades will not reach them. Those who conduct such spectacles really hope they will not be packed with the unkempt and unwashed, the pimps and prostitutes, the addicts and alcoholics. Nothing would create more consternation than for a great multitude of these to “come early and get a good seat.” The people who “amount to something” would soon absent themselves from the place and regard the effort as a flop!

You can’t really do much good by bringing a little “Jesus talk” and dumping it in the inner city each evening, and then racing your car from the area as soon as the “ordeal” is over. You have to drop behind the lines as a volunteer commando for Christ, and learn to go native, and to live off the area. You have to get accustomed to flies and cockroaches in the bedroom, and to rats and mice in the kitchen. You may have to ride elevators to vertical high-rise slums, which stink from urine and fecal matter. And you may also have to endure with compassion the language of those who accost you while drunk on cheap whiskey or canned heat, or who are half-stupefied from “pot” or “grass.”

Our problem is that we must learn to love mankind and not just a certain kind of man. We must become human sculptors in the school of Christ, and envision the image of God, scarred and broken, underneath the hard exterior. We must learn how to bring it to the surface with the tools of love and faith. And this requires more than mere casual association. Often we are held back from the “inner city” because we have no church buildings, and yet these could prove a hindrance.

When a few people are led to Christ in a high-rise apartment building, let them meet in one of the apartments. Let those in other buildings do the same. Each place may arrange its time of meeting on Lord’s Day to suit the schedule of the attendants. A little “church in the house” whose adherents must work all day as chauffeurs, or maids, or cooks, might meet early in the morning, or late in the evening. The coffee table in the living-room, or the breakfast table in the kitchen, could become the Lord’s table. There might be as many communities of the saints as there are great buildings in a housing project! Jesus can be a good many places at the same time!

Such meetings could be more “sharing experiences” than anything else. Stately ritual, robes, choirs, and all of the other paraphernalia of the modern institutional church would seem out of place in a little apartment. There would be little need for someone to bring in a pulpit stand and deliver a formal address. But it would be relatively easy to capture the family feeling which provides warmth and understanding. And it is the sense of “belonging” which the Way must restore in our day of the lonely crowd. The larger the congregation the harder it becomes to implement the command to “bear one another’s burdens,” but a house church in the teeming inner city can develop a real sense of compassion for all.

It is not really a valid argument that we must own an elaborate meetinghouse in which to proclaim Jesus to the lost. Christianity had its greatest growth during the almost three hundred years when it owned no buildings. A study of the book of Acts will reveal that the Good News was heralded forth in the Jewish temple, in synagogues, in a vehicle on the main highway, in private homes, on a river bank, in prison, in the inner city marketplace, in a Greek lecture-hall, in a Roman court, etc. The only place where the preaching was not done was the one place where most of it is done in our day—a house constructed by the saints for the purpose!

We do not argue that it is wrong for the saints to own communal real estate, or that it is wrong to speak in ecclesiastical edifices, or that we should disband suburban or rural communities of believers. Not at all! We simply say that when we use the lack of church-owned real estate as an excuse for not penetrating any area we are badly at fault in our reasoning. The church is people! And people who are saved can fulfill their mission only when they confront people who are lost with the claims of the risen Lord.

In the Bible we do not read of a Christian moving a sinner from where he was to go hear someone tell him what to do to be saved. Our task is to get men and women into Christ, not into buildings. It may yet be proven that we made a mistake in providing American funds for mission compounds and structures in foreign lands. We might have helped more by taking a knowledge of Christ and allowing the natives to erect their own meetingplaces or to gather where they would and could, even under the shade of trees. Often we have constructed a command headquarters before we had a soldier in the field. A changing world may force us in some places to abandon our comfortable barracks and go back to the foxholes and trenches on the edge of “No Man’s Land.” It would not always be a tragedy if we were forced to flee to Christ instead of to the suburbs! Our real estate in Him does not depend upon real estate.

The Restoration Principle

Volume 29

[Abstract]

A little child was playing with a fragile china doll. Suddenly the toy fell to the concrete floor and shattered into a hundred pieces. Its owner was convulsed with grief. The mother, seeking for some means of consoling the child, placed her arms around the shaking little shoulders and said, "There, there, don't cry. We'll put the pieces back together again and it will be just like it was before." But the child cried out, "No, no, it will never be like it was before."

"Everything has changed!" These were the words of Albert Einstein upon hearing of the first atomic test. They were prophetic. The age of nuclear fission and fusion is also one of indecision and confusion. Men who live under the threat of the mushroom cloud are a different breed than their predecessors. This is as true in the field of religion as in any other area of existence.

Ours is an era when the values of the past are downgraded, discounted and discarded. God is declared to be dead by decree and that which belongs to the faith of the past is obsolete, outworn and passe. In such a time one who pleads for recapture of a previous position or for an ancient order of things is regarded with an amused smile of forced tolerance such as is generally adopted for the hopelessly senile.

I happen to be an heir of a restoration movement, an attempt to progress in the Christian walk by returning to the beginning. It was not the only such movement. There have been many of them and all of them admittedly came to the same inglorious end, bogged down in a welter of division, their later adherents fighting each other with no common foe to cause them to rally together around the same standard. Because of this unexceptional experience, many of philosophic bent have opposed the restoration principle as being inherently divisive and invariably destructive of every semblance of unity.

It is with full recognition of this that I offer this apology for that principle. I propose to define and outline it, to analyze and describe it, and to tell why I believe it is a valid approach leading to a solution of the very schism it has been alleged to help promote.

MEANING OF RESTORATION

Jesus restored Lazarus to life. One who had expired was thus able to resume existence. But when I talk about restoration as applied to the church I do not refer to the bringing back of something which had ceased to be. The church is the body of Christ and from the day that God breathed into it and invested it with the Holy Spirit it has never ceased to throb and pulsate with spiritual vitality.

Jesus has never been a head without a body, a king without a subject, a shepherd without a sheep, a vine without a branch, or a captain without a soldier, since his coronation and ascension. Restoration does not mean raising the dead.

Restoration does not mean the reproduction in our day of any congregation alluded to or addressed in the new covenant scriptures. It does not mean the revival of the Jerusalem congregation with its legalism and race prejudice; or the Corinthian church with its division and carnality, or the Ephesian church with its first love abandoned.

Indeed there may never have been a model congregation at all save as it existed in the ideal of God.

Nor does restoration mean the renewal and duplication in our day of the customs and conventions, the fashions and vogues of a long-departed generation. It is not the re-establishment of the mores and cultures of another part of the world in an ancient day. It is not the reaching forth from a theological sepulcher of a skeletal hand with vise-like fingers in which to hold men in a stereotyped establishment. Then what is restoration in the sense in which we use it?

A short time ago the curator of a large museum of art decided to restore a work of one of the old masters. The painting was turned over to specialists who carefully and methodically removed the accretions and grime of generations until the picture appeared once more in its pristine and undimmed beauty. The message of heaven has become obscured by an accumulation of philosophic opinion, metaphysical speculation and theological interpretation. These are confusing, distorting and blurring. We propose to strip them away and let the simple communication of God speak to us “without benefit (or distraction) of clergy.”

In Saint Louis the drinking water is taken from the Mississippi River. At its inception this stream is clear and cool. Its waters are pure and invigorating. But on its rolling advance through the states it picks up filth and sediment until by the time it reaches our city it is a chocolate-colored body laden with foreign matter. Huge pumps take the water from the channel and direct it into filtration plants. Here it is restored to its original purity. Thus it is with the water of life as I conceive of restoration.

RESTORATION AND RENEWAL

Renewal is not necessarily the goal of restoration, but a consequence of it. When one removes the barnacles from a ship the purpose is to enable it to deliver its cargo without obstruction but renewed speed is a result. It is possible that an automobile radiator can become so clogged with insects as to render the cooling system ineffective, and a removal of them restores proper functioning and renews engine power and efficiency.

We are wholly sympathetic to “the call for renewal” as voiced by our religious neighbors in ecumenical circles. We congratulate and commend them for their recognition that our present state is abnormal and for their concern which prompts them to want to do something tangible to remedy it. What they have said and written has affected a great many of us who would not like to credit them for an impact upon our thinking, but they have dragged and pulled some of us into the twentieth century quite against our wills.

However, we would speak one word of caution. The very word “renew” implies a backward look, a peering into the past to see what the thing was like when it was new. Unless one knows what a thing was like originally he can never know whether he has renewed it or not. He might create something new, but this is not renewal at all. Renewal requires a return to a previous state but this is the very thing many who call for renewal condemn us for wanting to do.

It is our conviction that renewal can only come by recapture of that which gave existence to the structure originally. We like the word “recovery” and in the case of the church renewal comes through recovery of the apostolic proclamation, purpose and power. The first gives decision, the second direction and the third dynamic. Without the first there would be no start, without the second there would be no objective, without the last there would be no power to carry through to the goal. Confidence, continuation and consummation— these are the three elements of any successful movement.

If we believe this is a “post-Christian era” we will be little concerned with renewal for we will not consider that there is anything vital which needs to be renewed or recaptured. But if we believe that Jesus is now seated at the right hand of God and will continue to sit there until the last enemy is destroyed, we will recognize that the Christian economy must exist throughout the Christocracy, that is, until he turns the kingdom back to the Father. I believe this.

I also believe that before Jesus retired to the position he now occupies he called, qualified and commissioned certain men to act as his ambassadors. This leads me to the following elemental statements.

- 1. The apostles occupy a unique place in the program of Christ as ambassadors.
- 2. The apostolic message occupies a unique place as the message of the ambassadors to the citizens of the kingdom.
- 3. That message relayed to the one body from the head must be accepted as authoritative by that same body so long as it exists as that body.

THE AMBASSADORS

The will of God foreordained that Jesus should operate through chosen envoys in the conversion and justification of the world. These were “chosen by God as witnesses” (Acts 10:41). They belonged to God and were given to Christ and were made recipients of the glory which Christ also received (John 17:6, 22). Accordingly Jesus said, “You did not choose me, but I chose you and appointed you” (John 15:16).

The apostles were not ordinary ministers, but ministers plenipotentiary, empowered fully to dictate the terms of the King and enforce them as necessary. Since they were representatives of a supernatural regime their credentials were of a supernatural nature. These are called the signs, or marks, of apostleship. “The signs of a true apostle were performed among you in all patience, with signs and wonders and mighty works” (2 Corinthians 12:12).

The very ministry of reconciliation for an alien world was entrusted to them. God made his appeal through them. They spoke in behalf of Christ, or in his stead. “All this is from God, who through Christ reconciled us to himself and gave us the ministry of reconciliation . . . and entrusting to us the message of reconciliation. So we are ambassadors for Christ, God making his appeal through us. We beseech you on behalf of Christ, be reconciled to God” (2 Cor. 5:19, 20).

Although popular sermonizers apply this to every Christian we deny that the word implies it. The context carefully weighed demonstrates our contention that we are not ambassadors. We are not empowered by the Sovereign to dictate terms of a treaty with aliens nor to establish a constitution for the citizenry. We are not proclaimers, but re-proclaimers. In the very nature of the divine arrangement we are made to be dependent upon apostolic testimony. If we must revert to that testimony for knowledge of the source of life why should we balk at accepting it as the sustenance of that life?

THE MESSAGE

The mystery of the ages was revealed to apostles and prophets (Ephesians 3:3-5). They constitute the very foundation of the household of God, the holy temple (Ephesians 2:19, 20). The gospel which they proclaimed was addressed to every person who was lost; the doctrine which they propounded was addressed to every person who was saved. The first was to produce faith in Jesus, the second to reproduce in the believer the life of Jesus.

The message was authoritative. It was commissioned upon all authority being granted to Jesus (Matthew 28:18). It was proclaimed with authority. "He who receives anyone whom I send receives me; and he who receives me receives him that sent me" (John 13:20). The apostles acted under direct authority from the Lord. "I write this while away from you in order that when I come I may not have to be severe in my use of the authority which the Lord has given me for building up and not for tearing down" (2 Cor. 13:10). Can any person doubt that the apostolic writing was intended to serve as authoritative instruction and discipline during the personal absence of the envoys? Will it not apply now under the same conditions?

We are asked why, if apostles are so necessary, we do not have them today? We reply that we do have them. We have the same apostles and prophets that the church has always had. The church still has the same foundation exactly as it still has the same cornerstone. The apostles did not abdicate their office. They had no successors for the simple reason that they needed none. They fulfilled their function. It was their role to receive and give to the church and the world the divine revelation intended for each. It is the revelation, not the men, that is important.

They gave the gospel, the good news, to the world, and it requires no addition to save any man in the twentieth century. It is God's dynamic to save all who believe it.

They gave the apostles' doctrine to believers, and those who continue steadfastly in it will grow in grace and knowledge of the truth.

That the apostolic authority was not to cease with the death of the men is proven by the following considerations.

1. Jesus promised them, “I am with you always, to the close of the age” (Matthew 28:20). The age was the gospel dispensation which they were to inaugurate by their proclamation.

2. Jesus said to them, “Truly, I say unto you, in the new world, when the Son of man shall sit on his glorious throne, you who have followed me will also sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel” (Matthew 19:28).

3. When Babylon the great was pronounced fallen, the apostles and prophets, as distinct from other saints, were given judgment or vindication against the city (Revelation 18:20).

4. The identity of the apostles will be maintained until the coming down out of heaven from God of the holy city Jerusalem, and their names will be inscribed in the twelve foundations.

THE IMPLICATIONS

The life of the apostles was transitory as is all human existence; the life of their message was permanent as becomes that which is divine. Apostolicity is the foundation of the system of justification bestowed by grace and based upon faith in Jesus of Nazareth, the Son of God. Thus there can be no catholicity in Christianity without apostolicity, and there can be no effective sense of apostolicity without regard for the authority of the apostles. Since unity must always be founded upon catholicity of faith, it is useless to talk of securing it while ignoring its very foundation.

It is impossible to achieve renewal in the Christian frame of reference without recourse to the power and content of the gospel message. All spiritual energy must be sparked by plugging into the word which is God’s dynamo to save. There never was a reformation of any consequence started on any other basis, nor will there ever be.

Renewal does not mean the restoration of any congregation of bygone days, not even the first one at Jerusalem. It means the recapture of the importance and relevance of the message from heaven and a seeking to know its meaning. There is every evidence that the community of saints at Jerusalem was produced by whom they knew, rather than by what, or how much, they knew. We are in the same position since we also are caught up in the human predicament.

Our hope of heaven is not at all dependent upon being free of error, but upon having a correct attitude toward truth. It is not contingent upon knowing truth perfectly, but rather upon knowing Him who is perfect Truth. We will not reach heaven, because of a way of life but because we have the life of the Way. Our task, then, is not to restore dead congregations to life, but to be restored to the Living Word so that we may have life. The congregations had their day and departed. The Word of God endureth forever. It outlasts heaven and earth. It also outlasts the congregations upon the earth.

SOME OBJECTIONS

In spite of our insistence that there has never been an effective renewal or reformation except upon the basis of restoration of apostolicity and scripture, we recognize that there is strong dissent to this in our day. One eminent scholar puts it this way:

Our concept of our mission, our plea as a people, is such that many will cry, 'If restoration goes, must not everything go?' . . . Yet I am convinced that the principle is no longer tenable in any meaningful form to those who take seriously the findings of modern biblical and theological scholarship; I believe the principle to be not only untenable but pernicious, a stumblingblock to sincere Disciples on the pathway to the renewal of the church and the recovery of its unity in Christ.

What are the objections to renewal through recovery of the apostolicity set forth, as we believe, in the new covenant scriptures? It is argued first that this is going backward contrary to all laws of growth in any organism. This would come with greater force if those who offered it acted with some consistency. Some, for instance, in the field of polity, are preparing to adopt the episcopate, or diocesan bishopric, in order to secure union. They are willing to go back to where the church departed but not willing to go back to where it started. With them, the sin is not in going back. Rather it is in going back to the ambassadors of Christ.

What is wrong in going back to the source of power? If a line is short-circuited you cannot just go on from there and ignore it. You must retrace your steps until you locate the impediment between your present position and the dynamo. And when you find the stumblingblock you should not adopt it as the normal condition but act to remove it.

Again it is argued that the restoration approach quenches the Spirit in our day and keeps Him from being on-going in revelation. A brother has written:

We would want to point out that the church is more than 'passing on historical revelation'; indeed, it is that plus the continued revelation of God in the midst of our own time. For, we cannot but believe that the Holy Spirit is still working and that this is the manifestation of God in our modern times.

We also believe that the Holy Spirit is still working and active but we do not believe that he is revealing the will of God as he did to and through the apostles and prophets. Our brethren overlook the fact that the admonition to not quench the Spirit was given to those to whom the revelation was addressed and not to those to whom it was directly given.

The Spirit produces unity which we must maintain, but those who profess to be recipients of modern revelations, have so many different and varied views that they add to the confusion rather than to the peace of the one body. Since God is not the author of confusion, we must conclude that these diverse views and ideas are not the fruit of the Spirit. It is easy for one to convince himself that what he desires is what the Spirit wants him to have, and he may confuse the spirit of his will for the will of the Spirit.

The apostolic message provides a consistent, uniform and regulated approach to the problem of unity, and we must never forget that he who prayed that we might be one was talking only of those “who believe in me through their (the apostles’) word.” We should at least allow him to define and describe those whose unity he desires.

THE PRINCIPLE AND UNITY

We contend that true unity is that of the Spirit. It is this unity which must be maintained in the bond of peace. It is expressed in the revelation given by the Spirit. Our task is not to discover a way to achieve unity but to recover and receive the unity which God bestows. To do this we must vault over all of the forms, structures and divergent theological interpretations, and recover the simple proclamation, the kerygma, the Good News, as the basis of our oneness.

Every person who responds in God’s own way to God’s own gospel is made a member of the one body, and is thus united to all others on earth who make the response. These will be varied in degree of knowledge, temperament, disposition, social status and race. Still they will be one— not in these things but in Christ.

That which is not a condition of unity at its creation can never be made a condition of unity in its continuation. This means simply that as there was diversity in arrival at unity there must always be unity in diversity. But that diversity must not be in relation to the person or identity of Jesus for it is in this fact that our unity becomes reality.

Then what is to be the relationship and responsibility of those in Christ toward the apostolic doctrine or teaching as revealed in the epistolary writings? Every person who submits his will wholly unto Christ thereby submits himself wholly to the will of Christ. This involves three things: an attitude of respect for the apostolic word; an intention to ascertain the meaning and implication of that word for one's own life, and the implementation of that word in one's own life and conduct.

All of this must be done in perfect liberty without any compulsion except that created by the lordship of Jesus. This liberty must be the prerogative of all of the saints which means that error must be allowed to remain self-correcting under the three rules of involvement. The members may share their divergent views of doctrine but may not sever themselves from one another over them, for this would violate the will of Christ as regards schisms and schismatics, or factionalists. They may correct but cannot coerce; they may discuss but not disrupt the relationships. Differences must always be grounds for discussion but never for division.

Brotherhood must be maintained in love. This is the prime consideration of the restoration principle, for if all else is restored and we lack this, we are still nothing. Regardless of what gifts we may hope to recover this remains the more excellent way. It follows then that we should concentrate our immediate effort upon the recapture of the spirit of mutual love which transcends honest differences in understanding. This tends to place all else in proper perspective. It is in this spirit I offer the following.

THE APOSTOLIC DOCTRINE

We believe that the following items are valid for recovery of the design of God for the community of believers in our day.

1. Each congregation is free under God to order its own affairs and conduct under the lordship of Jesus, and is not amenable to the direction or discipline of any other community, or combination or coalition of communities.

2. The offices of the community are functions and not honorary or titular positions. They simply fill needs growing out of the nature of the community, and those ordained for them are selected by the community in which they serve. This provides a bulwark against a developing ecclesiasticism, a constant threat!

3. The greatest function is to be one of several bishops in a local community and it is a flagrant corruption of this function to create one bishop over several communities.

4. The Lord's Supper is the public exhibition of fellowship in the one body and the table should be set for every baptized believer whose moral conduct does not render him unworthy of Christian association, in spite of divergencies of opinion or degrees of knowledge.

5. The several communities may refer to themselves by any term of designation used in the sacred scriptures, but may not bind this term upon any other congregation, nor exalt it to the position of a sectarian title.

6. Congregations of saints may cooperate together in such projects as they mutually agree upon, but may not require or demand that other congregations enter into such cooperative endeavors, and should not create such structures as will inhibit or destroy their own autonomy. Communities of saints which combine their resources to carry on a certain work cannot censure such communities as choose to abstain, nor can these latter censure those who enter. Each congregation, as each member, must stand or fall to its own master.

7. Love, as the crown of all virtues, must govern in all areas of spiritual life, and love for the brotherhood must include every brother on earth. Love for those who constitute a party or sect, with discrimination shown against the great body of other believers, is a burlesque upon the Way, and constitutes hypocrisy and Pharisaism of the most damnable kind. It is specifically said of those who show partiality among those brethren who enter the assembly of saints that they “are inconsistent and judge by false standards” (James 2:4). “But if you show snobbery, you are committing a sin and stand convicted by that law (the sovereign law of love) as transgressors” (James 2:9).

In closing we simply say that we believe that renewal can only come through recovery of the apostolic proclamation, purpose and power. We are committed to laboring for renewal on that basis, and to this end we humbly beg an interest in your prayers.

Two Unity Movements

Mission Messenger (July 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

THE ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT

The term “ecumenical movement” is about as common in current religious magazines as dandelions on the front lawn. In some circles it is about as welcome. What does “ecumenical” mean? It is from oikoumene, the inhabited world, which is from the root word oikos, house, dwelling, or habitation. “Ecumenical” simply means world-wide in extent or influence.

Its meaning as now used is closely akin to “catholic,” which is from katholikos, universal, and which refers to that which is universal or general, affecting mankind as a whole. However, when “The Great Schism” occurred in Christendom many centuries ago, the Eastern wing of the cleavage adopted “Orthodox” as a title and the Western wing fastened upon the term “Catholic.” It was to avoid confusion in the popular mind that “ecumenical” was chosen instead of “catholic.”

Yet, this usage of the word “ecumenical” is not new. The first person to so employ it was Count Nicolaus Ludwig von Zinzendorf, who was born about 1700. Karl Barth refers to him as “the first genuine ecumenicist.” The historian Heinz Renkewitz says he was the first person to use the word oikoumene to carry the meaning “the world-wide Christian church.” Zinzendorf was identified with the “Unity of the Brethren” which is better known as the Moravian Church. In our times the term “ecumenical movement” is used to designate a general attempt to unite all sects and denominations by discovery of the least common denominator as a basis for confession. Some have suggested for such a basis the Lord’s Prayer, others the Lord’s Supper, and still others “The Apostles’ Creed.” At the present time it appears that a profession of the Lordship of Jesus in the simple statement, “Jesus is Lord,” is gaining prominence. It is believed from 1 Corinthians 12:3 that this was the test of the indwelling Spirit. “And no one can say, ‘Jesus is Lord,’ except under the influence of the Holy Spirit.”

Within the Roman Catholic fellowship John XXIII gave the first real impetus to the movement. His successor, Paul VI, is proceeding in the footsteps of his predecessor, but with some apparent reluctance. However, the “ecumenical movement” was sparked by Protestants with Nathan Soderblom, Archbishop of Uppsala (Sweden) in the forefront. This 1930 winner of the Nobel Prize for World Peace, has been aptly called “the father of the ecumenical program.” He was encouraged by Bishop Charles Henry Brent, Episcopalian; Dr. T. C. Chao, Dean of the School of Religion, Yenching University, Peking; Dr. Henry P. Van Dusen, President-emeritus of Union Theological Seminary, and many others. The movement has attracted many other eminent theologians at home and abroad.

THE RESTORATION MOVEMENT

The movement of which the writer has the honor of being a rather unworthy heir, was launched in the early part of the nineteenth century by men who came principally from a Presbyterian background. If we accept 1910 as the beginning of the modern ecumenical movement, as is commonly done, the restoration movement preceded it almost exactly one hundred years. It was in the autumn of 1809 that Thomas Campbell read his “Declaration and Address” in Washington, Pennsylvania, and years later his son acknowledged this as the beginning of “a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects.”

Even a casual investigation of the ecumenical movement and the restoration movement will show a great divergency in approach to the grave problem of disunity. The ecumenical movement seeks to unite the sects on the basis of the least common denominator. The restoration movement seeks to unite the Christians in the sects upon the basis of a return to the ideal of God as announced by the apostles of Jesus Christ. One is upon the basis of an irreducible minimum wrung from the revelation of God; the other on the highest possible plane, the authority of Jesus Christ as expressed in the whole of the new covenant scriptures.

This last is not Bibliolatry. It is not legalistic “patternism.” It does not make a savior of the Book. It recognizes that our hope of salvation lies in a personal relationship of the heart, and not in an intellectual attainment of the mind. It can best be summed up in two very simple propositions.

1. Only the Way of the Living Word can be absolute and authoritative for the life of the new humanity which He has created.

2. There is absolutely no way of determining that authority except through the written word which he has provided.

I propose herewith an investigation of the ecumenical movement and the restoration movement, to determine what they hold in common, as well as some areas of difference. I hope to be as objective as possible for one who is directly involved. Certainly, I shall not impugn the motives of the brilliant men who are in the ecumenical movement. I deplore such terms as “ecumaniacs” as being both uncharitable and un-Christian. Frequently they are the resort of the ignorant and uninformed.

The restoration movement has had its share of “characters” also.

I am not concerned with being on the extreme left. Neither am I concerned with being on the extreme right. I am opposed to extremists even in the “middle of the road.” But I am concerned with being right, and I want to be as “extremely right” as possible. It is not always possible for me. I am quite human and quite limited.

THINGS HELD IN COMMON

1. A conviction that schisms among Christians constitute a scandal to the church.

This has not always been a generally accepted view. When the pioneers of the restoration movement first set forth this principle, they were rather violently opposed. Many argued that the will of God could best be implemented through a variety of sects. Partisan debates were the order of the day. I feel that it is a refreshing change to find Catholics and Protestants alike deploring division and seeking for a way to overcome it. What has produced this altered climate?

The answer is found in a new awareness of the teaching of the new covenant scriptures. A renewed interest in Bible study, encouraged by research and modern translations has made us all realize that our divisions are symptoms of immaturity and carnality (1 Corinthians 3:1-4), and that they are works of the flesh (Galatians 5:20). We realize that “those who behave in such ways will never inherit the kingdom of God.” Regardless of our understanding of the kingdom of God, as to nature, extent, time or location, we know that schismatics cannot participate in it. Of course, we would never have known this without the written word, but it is enough that we have arrived at a mutual consensus drawn from this common source. Without the corrective word we could as easily have concluded that our fragmentary state with its rival factions was ordained of God.

2. A belief that the prayer of Jesus for unity can be understood and answered, and must be.

The words recorded in John 17:20, 21 are repeated fervently by those in both movements, and this is good. To say that they can be understood is not to say that any of us fully understand the depths of their implications as yet. For instance, I find myself wholly out of tune with those who quote them as justification for dialogue with those of non-Christian religions. I am not at all opposed to such dialogue, but it has nothing to do with Christian unity when pursued with a view of finding common ground. Jesus limited his prayer for oneness to all who believed on him through the apostolic testimony. Christian unity involves only these.

Our unity is in Christ. “You are all one person in Christ Jesus” (Gal. 3:28). This unity is individual and personal, not organizational and structural. The prayer was “that all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in Thee.” Proponents of legalistic creedal bases of unity mistake the whole tenor of this statement. They reason that since the Father and Son understand everything alike, in order for us to be one we too must all arrive at the same understanding of every matter at the same time. This is as silly as it is impracticable and impossible.

It is true that God and Christ have no differences of opinion and no misunderstandings, because they are infallible. But God does not demand of fallible men what it requires infallibility to achieve. Jesus did not pray for an impossibility. He did not say, “that they may all be one by understanding everything alike, as thou, Father, understand all that I say, and as I understand perfectly all that Thou sayest.”

He said, “as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee.” He went on to explain that “they also may be one in us.” This is not unity of intellectual insights, analytical attainments, or interpretative infallibility. It is a blending and merging of the personalities of those invested with the divine nature. It is the unity which results from the loss of selfhood in others.

This prayer shows that unity can never be an end in itself. It is the means to an end. The purpose of our unity is that the world may believe that God sent His Son. Unity which does not stem from Christ and lead to Christ is useless. There is no point in uniting everyone if, in the process, we separate them all from God. The world will only be won to believe in Christ, when those in the world who believe in Christ are one.

3. An acceptance of the proposition that Jesus is Lord.

The advocates of the ecumenical movement are correct in their insistence that this is basic. But it is not a proposition stated orally, or subscribed to in writing, which transforms. It is the truth of that proposition enshrined in the heart, and embodied in life and action which makes the difference. On this very subject, Jesus said, "Not everyone who calls me 'Lord, Lord,' will enter the kingdom of heaven, but only those who do the will of my heavenly Father" (Matthew 7:21). The acceptance of the proposition, "Jesus is Lord," is essential, but it must not become a mere unitive declaration. It must be a principle of life, the whole life, in every phase and facet.

4. The goal of one church on earth.

In reality there is only one church now. There has never been but one. The church is a creation of God, not a concoction of man. It is a divine organism, not a human organization. The church consists of the called-out ones. All of these are in it. Not one is outside of it. We have been betrayed into calling sects "churches." But no sect is the church, and the church is no sect!

What we seek to do is not to create a church that is one, but to find a way of demonstrating or manifesting that the church which God created is one. The ecumenical movement postulates that this can be achieved by merging the sects through a spirit of compromise. I believe that it can only be realized by uniting of individuals to a common Lord through the Spirit of promise.

The body of Christ is not composed of sects and no coalition of sects can ever constitute it. The body is composed of individuals joined to Jesus, as a common head, by the indwelling Spirit. "Now you are the body of Christ, and individually members of it" (1 Cor. 12:27). Since there is no bond between Christ and any sect as an organization, sects are doomed to become sterile and die. They cannot be renewed by putting them together in a new structure. Throwing a corpse into a new casket beside another dead body will not resurrect either.

Before there can be a resurrection the spirit has to infuse the body. Renewal can only come as we are invested by the Spirit and sustain a vital relationship to Jesus. "You are on the spiritual level, if only God's Spirit dwells within you; and if a man does not possess the Spirit of Christ, he is no Christian" (Romans 8:9). Those who are on this level will manifest their oneness regardless of sectarian barriers and walls, for the Spirit which tugs at our spirit, also draws us to everyone else who has that one Spirit.

5. A relevance to our age, and its culture and society.

The Way represents God's approach to man in a historical moment. It came to man as he was and loved him as it found him. God staged the first great "love-in" demonstration on earth. And God did not love man because He changed him, but man changed because God loved him. The Way has not changed. It still comes to man as he is and loves him as it finds him.

The Way never washes, bathes and cleanses man so it can love him. If it finds him in a homosexual pad, or in a house of prostitution, or in a room with heroin addicts, it doesn't get him out in order to love him, but it loves him, in order to get him out. For the Way knows that whether a man sleeps off a drunk in a flophouse or in a penthouse, he does so because he has lost his way. And one who is lost will remain lost until he has found the Way.

Some of my good friends in the ecumenical movement (and how I do thank God that there are many of them who are my close friends) argue with me that men are merely creatures of environment, and that our problem is not to reach men one by one, but to go at it on a wholesale basis by changing the physical conditions of habitat. I want to see men lifted out of intolerable conditions. I want to see their little children reared in an area way from filth and garbage and rats. But I know men who dwell in mansions whose hearts are like pigsties, and I know others who live in dirty tenements who are pure in heart and will see God.

Surely we must have a relevant approach and the Way must be presented in the language men can grasp, for "if I do not know the meaning of the sound the speaker makes, his words will be gibberish to me, and mine to him" (1 Cor. 14:11). We dare not seek relevance by conforming the word of God to men, but by transforming men through the word of God. The word of God must be translated into the words of men, in order that men be translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son.

In summarization of this section and in spite of variant approach, let it be said that the ecumenical movement and the restoration movement hold these things in common: A conviction that schisms among Christians constitute a scandal to the church; a belief that the prayer of Jesus for unity can be understood and answered; an acceptance of the proposition that Jesus is Lord; a goal of one church, as the body of Christ, on earth; and a relevance to our age, its culture and society.

AREAS OF DIFFERENCE

We must not forget that those within the framework of the ecumenical movement, like those in the restoration movement, do not all share the same ideas in every particular. What we have to say about divergencies between the movements must be in the realm of rather broad generalization, and no specific should be charged against any individual who personally disavows it. Here are some of the things where we find ourselves at odds with many who espouse the cause of ecumenicity in our day.

1. The revelation of God is incomplete and open-ended.

By “revelation” we mean the uncovering by God of what man could not discover for himself. We believe that when God created the universe as we now have it that he rested or ceased from his labors. We believe that when God finished his revelation with regard to the new creation, as contained in the sacred scriptures, that he rested, or ceased from his labors. As shown in our preceding article in this issue, catholicity must be based upon apostolicity. To argue, as many do, that the Holy Spirit reveals the will of God by modern consensus is to argue that the will of the mass mind is the will of God and to determine the divine purpose for our age we should not study the Bible but take a poll of the theologians.

That the indwelling Spirit serves to illuminate the mind of a committed saint, we do not doubt, but this is achieved by use of the torch which God has placed in our hands. It is not by a force outside of the Word but by deeper insight into it that this is accomplished.

2. The apostles simply recorded the struggle of a primitive people to discover truth.

It is true that God never reveals to man what man can discover for himself. But there are things which man is powerless to discover through use of his natural faculties. “Things beyond our seeing, things beyond our hearing, things beyond our imagining, all prepared by God for those who love him, these it is that God has revealed for us through the Spirit” (1 Cor. 2:9, 10). Revelation is the means by which God uncovers for man what man cannot discover for himself.

The Bible is not the result of man’s groping through space to find God, but it is the revelation of God who reached down to grasp man. That simple, unlearned and ignorant fishermen, contrary to all of their own prejudicial culture, could have produced the dynamic of the Good News would require more faith to believe than that God spoke through them.

Those who regard the Bible as the product of man’s own search for the meaning of life generally contend that all truth is relative and there is no absolute criteria for measuring it. To this we take exception. The Greeks regarded truth as reality; the Latins as verity. propositional truth is the agreement or conformity of that which is affirmed with that of which it is affirmed. If all truth is relative there is no reality, but if this be true there can be no assertion of unreality, for one cannot know unreality unless there is a reality by which to judge it.

To affirm that all truth is relative is either to state a truth or an untruth. If it is an untruth, then all truth is not relative. If it is a truth, then the statement itself is relative, and this leaves the possibility that some truth may not be relative. But to grant that some truth may not be relative is to cast doubt on the affirmation that all truth is relative. The man who begins with the assumption that all truth is relative can never make a really definitive statement about the relativity of truth.

Our own view is that there is ultimate truth, and that it is not propositional but personal. It is not the truth about someone or something. It is Someone who is the truth. It is the person of this Someone who is the treasure-house of reality which gives validity and meaning to the universe, and who is the criterion of all goodness. “There is none good but one,” that is, in the absolute. “I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life.” These are not three different things. They are one person. The Way, the Truth, and the Life are one— one personality. By Him, then, all personality must be judged!

3. Man is free under God to experiment with religious structure upon the basis of present utility.

In our age of pragmatism we are betrayed into asking, “Will it work?” without questioning “Is it right?” But there are a great many things which work all right, that are not all right when they work. A burglar may perfect a “jimmy” which will open any window and may be the perfect tool for his profession, but his use of it may land him in prison.

If God has revealed His will as to congregational order our task is to implement it and not to tamper with it. In the early centuries of the ekklesia of God, the schisms and heresies seemed to call for a strong and authoritative voice to define the faith, so the office of diocesan bishop was created as separate from the local presbytery. It worked, but it worked itself into the papacy, a system from which the whole world has suffered. The question should not be “What do you think will work?” but “How can we best work what God has said?”

4. There is no definitive response to the Good News universally binding upon or demanded of mankind, but each man may surrender to God upon his own terms.

Man, who is made captive to Christ, cannot dictate the terms of his surrender. The necessary response to the Good News has been stipulated by the same authority which announced the News. So long as the Message is valid the response must also be. Matthew, who was present at the mountain in Galilee, where Jesus made a special appointment to appear to the disciples, records how He came up and spoke to them and informed them, “Full authority in heaven and on earth has been committed unto me.” He then commissioned them, “In view of this, go forth and enroll disciples from all nations, by immersing them into the name of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit.”

Mark, who probably received his information from Peter, who was also at the Galilean mount, in a disputed passage, records the words thus, “Go forth to every part of the world and proclaim the Good News to the whole creation. Those who believe the Message and are immersed will obtain salvation, those who do not believe it will receive condemnation.” It is our very sincere conviction that one only enters the fellowship of the saved ones by belief of the Good News and immersion in water to implement that faith.

The apostle seems to be very positive about the matter. “All of you are sons of God through your faith in Christ Jesus, for all who have been immersed into Christ, have put him on like a garment” (Gal. 3:26, 27). This appears to be both inclusive and exclusive.

5. The essential thing being to hold up the light, the instrument for doing so is purely incidental and expendable.

On this premise it is contended that the church is a dispensable item. We are treated to such statements as “post-Christian age,” and “churchless Christianity.” It is obvious that if God made no provision for a specific medium or means to hold up the truth, we may be free to discard the instruments we have used. But if the church is a divine creation and exists by divine authority, only that authority can discontinue it.

The community of the redeemed is the church of God, and it is referred to as “God’s household, that is, the church of the living God, the pillar and the ground of the truth” (1 Timothy

2:15). In the first chapter of Revelation, the communities of believers in Asia Minor were represented by golden lampstands, with Jesus standing in their midst. Gold was a symbol of preciousness or value, and we conclude that God regards the church as indispensable. It is “the church of the Lord, which he won for himself by his own blood” (Acts 20:28). “Christ also loved the church and gave himself up for it, to consecrate it, cleansing it by water and word, so that he might present the church to himself all glorious, with no stain or wrinkle or anything of the sort, but holy and without blemish” (Ephesians 5:26, 27).

CONCLUSION

It is rather obvious from the foregoing that I find some of the views expressed by the promoters of the ecumenical movement incompatible with my own ideas. I am wholly committed to seek for renewal, but I am convinced that it must begin with a renewed interest in searching the sacred scriptures. To abandon the Word of God in order to be guided by flashes of inner light, would be like a mariner tossing his compass overboard to steer by the streaks of lightning cleaving the sky.

We must either receive the word of the Lord, or reject the Lord of the Word. We must either recognize that this is the age of the Spirit, or repose in the spirit of this age. We must either settle for a human fad, or struggle for an honest faith.

I shall continue to contend for a recapture of the spirit and power of the original proclaimers of the Good News. When I prepare to cross over the Jordan of death, I would like to be able to say, “The word I spoke, the gospel I proclaimed did not sway you with subtle arguments; it carried conviction by spiritual power, so that your faith might be built not upon human wisdom but upon the power of God” (1 Corinthians 2:4, 5).

The Bible and Reformation

Mission Messenger (July 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

One of my favorite Biblical characters is Josiah. Perhaps this is true because he triumphed over so many improbabilities. Let me mention just one to get us started. When Jereboam captured ten tribes from Solomon's son, during a revolt over high taxes, he immediately introduced calf-worship at Dan and Bethel. A prophet from Judah was sent to denounce the false ritual at the latter place. In doing so, he predicted that some day a reformer would arise by the name of Josiah, and he would break down the altar which Jereboam had erected and would burn the bones of the idolatrous priests upon it.

It was 326 years later that Josiah was born. His father and grandfather were worse idolaters than Jeroboam. Moreover, Josiah was a king in Judah, and Bethel was in another kingdom, Israel. Yet as a mere boy the king developed such a hatred of idolatry that he not only swept every vestige of it from his own land but was driven by his intense zeal to cross the line of the neighboring monarchy, where he broke down the altar at Bethel and actually crushed the stones of it into dust. He even invaded Samaria, the capital of Israel, and cleaned it out.

The grandfather of Josiah was Manasseh, whose name became proverbial for wickedness. He was a worshiper of the planets, and placed altars dedicated to all "the host of heaven" in the sacred precincts of God's temple. Finally he stooped to human sacrifice and burned his own son as an offering. In his superstitious blindness he “practiced soothsaying and augury, and dealt with mediums, and with wizards.” Jewish tradition credits him with murdering the prophet Isaiah by sawing him asunder.

Manasseh was succeeded by his son Amon who carried on all of the vile practices of his father, but was assassinated at the end of two years by his palace guards. The coup was ineffective because the people of the land killed the conspirators and installed Josiah as king. When Josiah was coronated he was eight years old, the same age at which I accepted the awesome responsibilities of the second grade in school.

At the age of sixteen “while he was yet a boy, he began to seek the God of David his father,” and when he reached his twentieth birthday, he started a purge such as the land had never seen before. This was hazardous because it cut across the social, economic and political structures, all of which were geared to idolatry. Foreign trade and commerce were enhanced by recognition of other gods, and the import and export bureaus thrived because of the shrines which other nationals could visit in Jerusalem. Idolatry was favored by many men of rank and influence in the court and kingdom.

The young ruler soon learned that he could not entrust the work to members of his cabinet, some of whom would simply place the images in places of concealment until the furor died down. He resolved to personally supervise the work of the wrecking crews, and traveled from one place to another to see that the job was thoroughly done. I always marvel at the revelation of how corrupt Jerusalem had become, by reading what Josiah abolished.

He instructed the priests of the second order and the doorkeepers of the temple to bring out every vessel that had ever been used in reverence for Baal or any planet, and these he burned in the fields of Kidron. He fired every priest who had ever burned incense to Baal, or to the sun, moon, or any constellation. He smashed the houses and stalls of the cult prostitutes who solicited in the temple precincts. He tore down the high places in every city, village and hamlet, and forbade their priests to ever set foot in the temple at Jerusalem. He ran all of the motley horde of fortune-tellers, witches, soothsayers, wizards and necromancers, out of town.

He defiled Topheth, the grisly location of human sacrifice, in the valley of the sons of Hinnom, so no one could burn his son or his daughter as an offering to Molech. He removed the sacred horses that had been dedicated to the sun, and burned the chariots of the sun with fire. He pulled down the altars on the palace roof, broke them to pieces, ground the pieces into dust, and threw the dust into a nearby creek. Before he had finished, he completely eradicated the high places which Solomon had created to placate the foreign princesses whom he had married. This was no small undertaking because Solomon went on a marrying spree and ended up with a thousand women in his harem.

I suspect that I am a sufficient iconoclast at heart, that I get “a bang” out of this young king running around in overalls, swinging an axe or a sledge-hammer, and not being too careful what or who he hit. And I can imagine the dispossessed priests, prostitutes, witches and members of the teamster’s union who drove the chariots of the sun, whispering to one another, “That crazy young fool will ruin this place if someone doesn’t stop him!” And yet I confess, with some reluctance I admit, that all of this is not what actually endears Josiah to my heart.

DISCOVERY OF THE BOOK

When he was twenty-six years old Josiah devoted himself to the repair of the holy temple. He sent Shaphan, the royal secretary, to Hilkiah the high priest, instructing the latter to count the money which had accumulated from gifts of the worshipers, and to convey it to carpenters, builders and masons, to use in restoring the temple and its precincts. In the prosecution of the task the high priest found the book of the law of the Lord which had been written by Moses. He turned it over to the secretary who took it with him when he made his progress report to the king, and read from it in the hearing of Josiah.

When the king heard the words of the law he rent his clothes and instructed his advisers to go immediately and enquire of the Lord about the words of the book. He said, "Great is the wrath of the Lord that is poured out upon us because our fathers have not kept the word of the Lord, to do according to all that is written in this book."

The counsellors went to Huldah the prophetess who informed them that God had indeed decreed the destruction of Jerusalem and all of its inhabitants because of idolatry, but the penitent attitude of Josiah had averted the calamity during his lifetime. The king then summoned all of the people both great and small to meet him at the temple where he read in their hearing all the words of the book of the covenant. "And the king stood in his place and made a covenant before the Lord, to walk after the Lord and to keep his commandments and his testimonies and his statutes, with all his heart and with all his soul, to perform the words of the covenant that were written in this book" (2 Chronicles 34:31).

I do not think there has ever been a religious reformation worth mentioning that did not result from rediscovery of the Word of God and its importance to life. John Wycliffe has been called "The Morning Star of the Reformation." He translated the Word into English and this sparked a great revival of interest which eventually led to many of the freedoms which we now enjoy. The historian, J. J. Blunt, describes what transpired as follows:

An eager appetite for scriptural knowledge was excited among the people, which they would make any sacrifice and risk any danger to gratify. Entire copies of the Bible, when they could only be multiplied by means of amanuenses, were too costly to be within reach of very many readers; but those who could not procure ‘the volume of the book’ would give a load of hay for a few favorite chapters, and many such scraps were consumed upon the persons of the martyrs at the stake. They would hide the forbidden treasure under the floors of their houses, and put their lives in peril rather than forego the book they desired; they would sit up at night, sometimes all night long, their doors being shut for fear of surprise, reading or hearing others read the word of God; they would bury themselves in the woods, and there converse with it in solitude; they would tend their herds in the fields, and still steal an hour for drinking in the tidings of great joy.

When Martin Luther stood before the German emperor and the Imperial Diet at Worms, on April 17, 18, 1521, his final words to the assemblage were these:

Unless I am refuted and convinced by proofs from the Holy Scriptures, or by plain, lucid, and evident argument, I yield my faith neither to the pope nor to the councils alone, for it is clear as the day that they have frequently erred and contradicted each other. Until so convinced, I can and will retract nothing, for it is neither safe nor expedient to act against conscience. Here I stand, I can do nothing else; God help me! Amen.

The restoration movement of which I am fortunate enough to be an heir, although an unworthy one, began with the reading of “The Declaration and Address” by Thomas Campbell. Mr. Campbell said:

We have no nostrum, no peculiar discovery of our own, to propose to fellow-Christians, for the fancied importance of which they should become followers of us.

We propose to patronize nothing but the inculcation of the express Word of God, either as to matter of faith or practice; but every one that has a Bible, and can read it, can read this for himself. Therefore we have nothing new.

Whether concerned with the reformatory attempts of previous generations, or caught up in the ecumenical fervor of our own complex age, our appeal must be to the Bible as the word of God. I unhesitatingly take my stand with “the fellowship of the unashamed,” the great company of believers which numbered among its ranks those martyrs who perished at the stake rather than recant their faith in the testimony of the sacred scriptures. If this means ridicule in an age of enlightenment I shall be content that “The reproaches of them which reproached thee have fallen upon me.” The disciple is not above his master; the servant is not greater than his lord.

Renewal will only come through recovery of the dynamic of God. This will be my constant watchword, whether I speak in halls of learning or in homes of the humble. With faith that is childlike, but with the resolution of manhood, I commit my course to the revelation of God. It will be my inspiration in life, my invigoration in approaching age, and my illumination on the journey through the valley of shadows!

I have trimmed my sails to catch the winds of the Spirit, and if these will not drive my frail bark safely into the harbor of eternal rest and peace, I have nothing else upon which I can rely to bring me at last to that blest anchorage. He has spoken! My eyes have looked upon His words, and my heart throbs in exultation that He cares for me. The words of Israel’s bard express my feelings:

I shall keep thy law continually, for ever and ever, and I shall walk at liberty, for I have sought thy precepts. I will also speak of thy testimonies before kings, and shall not be put to shame, for I find my delight in thy commandments which I love (Psalm 119:44-47).

The Reconciling Community

Mission Messenger (August 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

In our generation, so filled with complexities, the commission of our Lord might best be translated, “Go into all of the worlds.” We are surrounded by many worlds which need to be penetrated with the message. There is the world of science, of art, and of higher education; the world of affluent suburbia and of the poverty stricken ghetto. There is also the world of religion, for here too the Call has not always come through, and the milling flocks have never heard the voice of the Shepherd. There have been other voices, many of them, and the welter of discordant sounds has confused the sheep and stifled the voice of the One who could lead them out.

Our approach has always been meager and nebulous because we have proposed to fulfill a mission without realizing who we are, and, what is even worse, without knowing what we are! In this dilemma, we tend to add to the confusion rather than to give direction. And while our present task in this article lies along a different route than the establishment of our own identity, we must point out, in passing, that we are a community of the reconciled, and a reconciling community. That expresses both who we are and what we are. We move into the world as Christ moved into the world (for we are the body of Christ), saying, “Be ye reconciled to God.”

If this seems an over-simplification, it must be remembered that it strikes at the very heart of the whole inflamed and festering human conflict, both within and without. Because the finite was meant to vibrate in harmony with the infinite, until proper adjustment has been made and we are again attuned, only discord can result. Sin has short-circuited our lives, and we see the effect in the three areas of personal and inter-personal relationships— with God, others, and self. Our own inner serenity, as well as our peaceful existence with our fellows, is dependent upon a restoration of peace with God. This can be achieved only in and through Jesus Christ.

Ours is a ministry of healing through reconciliation. We move into our contemporary worlds to share what we have received, or to allow Him to share through us what only He can bestow. The problems of our troubled society can never be settled except as they melt under the influence of His reconciling grace. They may be curbed by law and restrained by threat of punishment, but laws are external and can never change hearts. The purpose in this little article is to discuss with you some of the adjustments and changes which we must make if we are to speak meaningfully to the intellectual world in which our lot has been cast.

1. We must cease to identify with, or allow ourselves to be regarded as representative of any sect, splinter or fragment, in a divided Christendom. The body of Christ must never be presented as schizophrenic. In our present state of things we will probably be forced to work within the confines of a party, which will provide for us a base of operation, but we must always “discern the Body,” and our confrontation must be to lead men to Christ, and never to build up a sect. One can be in a party without being partisan; he can be in a sect without being sectarian. It is enough that we be a part of the company of the unashamed, unhesitatingly affirming our confidence in the Good News of Jesus Christ, as God’s dynamic to restore and recover all who believe it, regardless of nationality. The sectarian seeks to make men over in his image. He is concerned with conformity to the party pattern and projection. The members of the fellowship of the unashamed are content to allow men to “be transformed into his likeness, from splendor to splendor; such is the influence of the Lord who is Spirit” (2 Cor. 3:18).

The sectarian spirit has little appeal for modern man. He is tired of useless fighting over dogma, imposed by authoritarian methods, whether proceeding from the pope or local elders. The hoary weight of traditional interpretations and metaphysical speculation will be discounted and discarded at once by a world in revolt against this very thing. Only the claim of a personal Jesus who is both the power of God and the wisdom of God, can appeal to those who are caught up in the power struggle and the scholastic relationship founded upon faith. It leads one to a person rather than to a position.

2. The community of the saints must be projected as large enough and flexible enough to embrace all who have been received by Christ, Just as the world of creation must find a place for all humanity to dwell without need of conflict, so the sphere of the new creation must find a place for every individual in the new humanity. The right to dwell in the United States is not conditioned upon one’s political opinion but upon citizenship, and one’s right to the blessings of the kingdom of heaven must not be made contingent upon a theological opinion, but upon adoption as a son of God.

To devise humanly-conceived structural rigidity based upon the acceptance of some philosophy or exclusive doctrinal emphasis is to attempt to confine grace, and results in the mistaken notion that the community is the dispenser of grace rather than the recipient of it. The community results from grace freely bestowed, and not the reverse. Thus, the umbrella of fellowship must be of sufficient spread to cover all who by grace are saved through faith.

Practical commonsense dictates that men will have temperamental, scholastic, sociological, and other preferences as to where (and even how) they express their praise to God within the framework of revelation, but we must never confuse the intimate group association which results from such preference with fellowship in the Lord Jesus Christ. To do so is to become victims of religious snobbery and sectarian pride. There is only one body and it must be majestic enough to include all of God's children, whether of liberal or conservative tendency, for these are terms of human definition, and not conditions of divine acceptance. All who are caught up by grace are caught up together when they properly respond to its demands upon them.

No theory or view about the nature of Deity, the work of the Holy Spirit, the second coming of Christ, or the manner of the resurrection to come (to cite only a few examples), can ever be made a test of union or communion among those who have set to their seal that God is true, and have committed themselves to an unreserved trust in Jesus as the author and finisher of their faith. To exalt such things to tests of loyalty is to become guilty of sectarianism in its narrowest (and, therefore, its worst) form. In the sight of God there is no premillennial body, and no amillennial body. There is one body, although there are members of it whose finite minds searching for an understanding of the infinite disclosure, have allied themselves with one interpretative approach or another.

The partisan approach with its arbitrary and artificial criteria of loyalty is wholly outmoded in an ecumenical climate and will have absolutely no impact upon it. In the modern revolt against fragmentation those who indulge the luxury of separation and segregation will be left to talk to themselves, a symptom of senility caused by hardening of the spiritual arteries. The world is not concerned with what we think about this or that question of theological speculation, but it must be made once again to face up to the question, "What think ye of Christ? whose son is he?"

The message of reconciliation which has been committed to us, and must be transmitted to men by the reconciling community is that “for our sake he made him to be sin who knew no sin, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God.” Those who are in him are the righteousness of God regardless of their divergent views about such things as the millennium, because these things are not determinant factors in our relationship. To divide men into antagonistic parties over such matters is to walk after the flesh, and to do despite unto the Spirit. It is also to remove ourselves from effective impact upon those who need to be drawn unto Christ.

3. We must make it clear that the ordinances of God are not partisan administrations. The blessings of God are designed to be enjoyed in conjunction with these ordinances. It is not necessary that we know why this is so; it is enough that we recognize the principle as established by revelation, and to realize that the ordinances are not interchangeable. One cannot be substituted for the other.

Baptism is not a factional or sectarian rite when a penitent believer submits to it. Even though the administrator may be quite sectarian, and may regard baptism as introducing the believer into his exclusive party, the Holy Spirit defeats such bigotry, and initiates the obedient believer into the one body which encompasses every saved person in the universe. “For by one Spirit we were all baptized into one body— Jews or Greeks, slaves or free— and all were made to drink of one Spirit.” A sectarian is powerless to baptize a genuine believer in the Lord Jesus Christ into anything except the one body.

When a man hears the Good News of the death of Jesus for our sins, of his burial and his resurrection the third day according to the scriptures, and believes this message with all of his heart, reforms his life in accordance with it, and is baptized upon the basis of that faith, regardless of his ignorance about other things, or the ignorance and mistaken views of the one who does the baptizing, that man is inducted into the family of God. Once this is realized, many brilliant men who have refused to be baptized will cease their opposition. Their rejection of it has not been a predilection against the divine ordinance but against the implication that it was a door into a specific and narrow sect. Baptism into a state of glorious liberty as the sons of God has a wide appeal, but thinking men rebel against entering a door to the narrow confines of a dogmatic faction. It is one thing to surrender to Jesus and be set free, a wholly different thing to be captured by a religious clique or clan.

We have a real appeal to the thoughtful men of our generation if we uphold the Way as a personal relationship with the Divine Absolute when we “have come to the fulness of life in him, who is the head of all rule and authority.” Then the Good News becomes the divine dynamic to all who believe, regardless of racial origin; and baptism is the response to His claim of lordship over our individual lives, “in which you are also raised with him through faith in the working of God, who raised him from the dead,” However, when baptism is presented as an exclusive and copyrighted ritual to introduce one only into a historical religious party of separatist tendencies, it tends to repel those who are mature reasoners, while attracting only those who seek inner security through dogmatism and thought-control.

Baptism is an ordinance which introduces one into the fellowship of all of the saints of all ages, and like birth, it is not repetitive. Birth never produces life. One is not born in order to have life, but because he already has it. Birth is a change of state, and introduces one into a realm where he can enjoy all of the blessings accruing from life and fulfill all of the responsibilities attendant upon it. Regardless of the expanding benefits derived from the family relationship, one has to be born only once to share in them.

But the demonstration of the family relationship is a constant and regular thing, and the ordinance by which it is proclaimed is of such a nature as to demand repetition. The Lord's Supper is a proclamation of the Lord's death, until He comes, as the basis of oneness in Him. The cup is the fellowship, or communion, of the blood of Christ. The bread is the fellowship, or communion, of the body of Christ. We are one body, and one bread, because we are all partakers of that one bread.

In spite of unfortunate schisms which have occurred, and lines of separation which have been drawn, at the table ordained by Christ, we may manifest the real unity which is a creation of the Spirit. If we seek to make the Lord's Supper a mere demonstration of factional alliance, we turn the table into a snare and stumblingblock for ourselves, for we eat and drink judgment upon ourselves, by not discerning the body—the whole Body! We believe that men can see the beauty of an ordinance designed to express openly the majestic fellowship of the whole body of saints on earth, but that many will refuse their alliance to what they consider an egotistic party, which equates itself with the universal body, and arrogates to itself those ordinances which are bestowed upon the whole.

4. We must communicate to the world of our day the Message in a manner that is understandable and relevant. We must be certain that the Message is God's, for there is no power to heal or make whole, in any other. But we must also be sure that the Way is made clear by placing it in the vernacular of those whom we would reach. If the Word of God was intended for all nations, languages and tongues, we should translate it into all languages, and we should not ourselves become fixated to language forms in our own tongue which have become obsolete and are no longer employed for daily communication.

Again, we face the task of rescuing the Way from the specialized theological jargon which has been developed and adopted by the institutional church, and which reduces it simply to a modern mystery cult, as seen by the average person. Of course we must ever retain the sense of dignity and appropriateness which befits a sacred declaration but we must never thrust back into the clouds that which was sent down to earth. In our own land we should not be badgered into denying the validity of translations into modern English simply because they do not sustain some of our traditional verbiage. Indeed, we should look askance at any doctrinal deduction which is solely dependent upon one version for its strength and defence.

The world is still open for a non-sectarian plea, but it is not receptive to such a plea made by sectarians. It is wary of any party which talks of non-denominational Christianity with its own denominational bias or slant. A party or movement which equates itself with the one body and projects the idea that to be in Christ Jesus, one must unquestioningly support the party program and organizations, has nothing to offer the thinking men in an ecumenical world.

This does not mean that such a party may not grow numerically and financially. The population explosion will take care of the first and the inflationary economy of the second, but it will grow at the expense of the truly thoughtful and perceptive minds which can never be content with the head-shrinking process which must always and inevitably be practiced by every religious party and exclusivistic sect. Men will no longer bow before infallible interpreters such as the pope, nor kneel to the infallible interpretations of a party! We must either lead men to Christ or leave them in despair.

A Non-Partisan Faith

Mission Messenger (August 1967)

[Abstract]

All of you have seen the wall motto with the question, “What on earth are you doing for heaven’s sake?” That pretty well sums up a lot of letters we receive. A sister in the east, whom I greatly appreciate, writes an epistle that is so typical I cannot refrain from sharing a bit of it with you.

“Just what are you trying to do, and how do you hope to accomplish it? I think I know, but I’d like to be able to explain it to others. One man here says you do not think baptism is necessary. Another says that you are preaching for the Christian Church. Are you trying to get the Church of Christ and Christian Church together? I do not see how you will ever be able to do it.”

I regret that I have become a controversial figure, but I do not see how it can be avoided in a world of partisan alignments, if I remain true to my conscience. And although I have answered the above questions many times, I know that I will have to repeat the answers many times more, because my position is so different. I do not become impatient with my brothers and sisters for questioning me.

A part of the problem lies in the fact that I once was a champion of a very narrow party in the restoration movement. When the grace of God opened my eyes to the true scope of fellowship and brotherhood which heaven revealed to earth, I did not leave the brethren with whom I had always labored and align myself with another faction. I simply renounced all factionalism as a work of the flesh and a symptom of immaturity and carnality.

I learned that no faction among us constituted the one body in its majestic fulness, and that all of them together did not exhaust the possibilities of the community of saved ones. The kingdom of heaven is not confined to the restoration movement. God's family may include many who never heard of Alexander Campbell. The flock of God is still a scattered flock!

MY MISSION AND MESSAGE

I am deeply concerned with the welfare of all who call upon Christ out of pure hearts, but we must begin where we are in any approach to unity. For this reason I have exerted most of my efforts with those who are a part of the splintered restoration movement. There are more than two dozen parties among us, although we began as "a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects."

My thesis is that brotherhood stems from fatherhood, and fellowship is the result of sonship. Our relationship in Christ, created by his precious blood, is more important than any of the things over which we have fractured into our little sects. For that reason we must restore a real vital sense of brotherhood and unity before we can even discuss our differences as members of a family instead of as adherents of warring tribes or clashing clans.

We made a tragic error when we allowed Satan to manipulate us into a position where we divided over our variant views about instrumental music. Our philosophy, developed in facing that issue has been applied to every subsequent problem and has left a train of schisms with their attendant sorrows and shame.

Regardless of the right or wrong of using instrumental music, the whole subject is not as important as the cross of Christ. The fact that Jesus died “that he might reconcile us both to God in one body by the cross, thereby bringing the hostility to an end” is transcendently more significant than anything which has become a source of debate among us. Jesus was not raised from the dead to become the head of “an instrumental party” or of an “anti-instrumental party” but of the one body which includes every saved person on the face of this whole wide earth.

It would be pleasant if we could simply blot out all of our troubles and go back to 1825 and start over, but we cannot do that. We have to face up to the fact that all of us, without exception, are in a faction, or fraction, of the restoration movement. It will not do to call out all those who are opposed to the factional spirit and band them together. That would only add another sect. An anti-party party is as sinful as any other.

I have recommended that all of us stay where we are and share the truths we learn with those whom we know the best. It is ridiculous, when you learn a truth, to abandon those who do not have it, in order to join those who do. This would remove the leaven from the mass in order to associate it with other leaven. But there is nothing more useless than a pile of yeast-cakes.

One need not be factional merely because he is in a faction any more than he must be a Communist because he is in Russia. We need to stay where we are and start loving all of our brethren where they are. We need to pray for all of them eagerly and earnestly. When we do this we will realize that our artificial barriers are not walls of stone but of ice, and they will melt away under the warm rays of brotherly affection. These walls are not opaque to one who loves. They become transparent and he can see through them and recognize brethren on the other side.

But we must not hide behind our walls and peer through the cracks. We must come out from behind them and associate with our brethren. We must come to know them. We must listen to them regardless of their attitude toward us. We must attend their meetings even though fear and narrowness keeps them from reciprocating. And we must never quit loving them even though they manifest unlovely attitudes and treat us with coldness and reserve. “Love knows no limit to its endurance . . . it can outlast anything.” I base my hope for the unity of God’s people wholly and unreservedly upon love. There is no other power by which God’s purpose can be achieved. There is no other potential for answering the prayer of Christ. It is love or nothing!

MY VIEW OF BAPTISM

All over this country I run into the accusation that I do not believe baptism is essential to fellowship. Of course, that is exactly opposite to my position, as I have clearly stated many times. I think that we must be practical enough to recognize that many of our brethren are not noted for a high degree of scrupulosity or integrity when reporting the views of one with whom they differ. This is especially true if they would like to destroy him. But no one has ever quoted a single statement from me in which I disavowed the essentiality of baptism. They have relied upon rumor and hearsay.

The fact is that what I have written about fellowship has affected the thinking of some in every segment and sect among us. Some of the party leaders are growing desperate. If they can discredit me and distort what I say the membership will be more easily kept under their partisan yoke. This is the crux of the matter.

I believe that faith in the great proposition that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and immersion in water upon the basis of that faith, are essential to unity with Christ. I recognize no unbaptized person as in the fellowship of the body. The problem arises, I think, from the fact that I do not feel called upon to usurp the prerogatives of God, and decide the eternal destiny of all, who for one reason or another, are not baptized.

I am under the authority of a King. His authority is absolute. As his willing slave I have no right, desire or inclination to offer salvation upon any other basis than his promise. But if his grace prompts him to go beyond his promise, I will not rebel but rejoice that others were allowed to share in the amazing grace which saved a wretch like me. I shall not bind God with the laws which he gave to bind me!

MY PREACHING

I am not “preaching for the Christian Church.” Neither am I “preaching for the Church of Christ.” I am not preaching for any of the two dozen kinds of “Churches of Christ.” I now belong to the blessed Lord who ransomed and redeemed me. I have “decided to know nothing among you except Jesus Christ and him crucified.” Wherever the Spirit opens up a door to witness of my faith, I go. I do not clear my appointments with any hierarchy. I do not seek permission from those “who appear to be somewhat” in any party or sect. I take very seriously the words of the apostle, “You were bought with a price; do not become slaves of men.”

I study the word as diligently as I can with my limited resources, in the hope that I may be able to edify the brethren. My watchword is, “Christ in you, the hope of glory. Him we proclaim, warning every man and teaching every man in all wisdom, that we may present every man mature in Christ. For this I toil, striving with all the energy which he mightily inspires within me.” I go wherever brethren invite me and whenever I can help his cause. I never ask them how they conduct their public devotions. I make no demand that they alter them because of my presence!

Nothing disturbs our brethren more than to be confronted with one who is free in Christ and really means to be a Christian only. They frantically try to categorize him and put him in the proper pigeon-hole. The sectarian mentality must sectarianize every one it knows and everything it touches. Not long ago in Dallas, at a conclave of Independent Christian Church brethren, a good brother who could not even remember my name, solemnly declared that I had “gone with the Disciples of Christ.” After I held a series of meeting at Gallatin, Tennessee, last year, a preacher in Kentucky openly announced that I had “gone with the pre-millennialists.” A brother who edits a widely read journal in Texas, announced to a congregation in New Mexico that I had “gone liberal.” The very same week another brother who writes for his paper, told an audience in Oklahoma that “Brother Ketcherside is really an ultraconservative and has the liberals fooled.”

The fact is, of course, that I am simply heeding the admonition of Paul to “Plant your feet firmly therefore within the freedom that Christ has won for us, and do not let yourselves be caught again in the shackles of slavery.” I am simply trying to preach Christ and preach for Christ! The approval of the sect means nothing to me. Neither does their disapproval. I do not intend to be caught again!

On this basis I could speak at the World Convention of Churches of Christ in Puerto Rico, and affirm my conviction in the Bible as God’s revelation. On the same basis I spoke twice at the North American Christian Convention in Long Beach and Saint Louis. But I have also attended the Abilene Christian College Lectureship the last two years. I have twice spoken at Bethany College as well as at Emmanuel School of Religion, Milligan College and numerous Bible Colleges. In addition, I have shared my thinking with a number of Christian witness groups in state universities, but I have also met with many groups of hippies and beatniks and affirmed my belief in the Christian dynamic, and allowed them to question me by the hour!

I have held public dialogue sessions with the president and cantor of an Orthodox Jewish synagogue, and three times testified to my faith in Jesus at the sabbath services of a large Reformed Synagogue. I was the only non-Jew present at a five day seminar on Judaism and shared with two rabbis in daily dialogue sessions on the relationship of the law to grace.

I am even now a member of a dialogue group in which there are more than thirty Roman Catholic priests and doctors of philosophy, and as many Anglican canons and rectors. I am the only member from the restoration movement background and my task is to present the restoration ideal and allow it to be explored. Each session that I attend I find myself more convinced that we have something rare and wonderful to offer in this age of ecumenical thought. Each time I strive to present it a little more clearly and definitively. It is not easy to do that!

I love all of God's children. They are all my brothers and sisters. I also love all who are seeking to know Him. I shall never again be the front-man for any party or segment. I will not allow myself to be maneuvered into a place where I must hate some of my brothers to be loved by others. They may attack one another, debate with one another, and refuse to associate with one another, but I will still go among them all for good, and not for evil. I will join no party! I am His!

MY PRESENT AIM

I'm not really trying to get the "Christian Church" and "Church of Christ" together. Uniting two parties or sects will not make the one body. I will not fight the big ecumenical movement and start a little one. The body of my Lord is bigger than either the “Christian Church” or “Church of Christ,” and it is bigger than both of them put together. His body is made up of parts, not of parties, and every precious individual upon this earth who is joined to Jesus is one of those parts. What I am trying to do is to get those in all our factions to recognize that all of us are brethren. We are children in the same family. We should start treating each other as brethren where we are. We do not all need to meet under the same roof to be one in Christ; we only need to be partakers of the same grace! Oneness in Christ Jesus is a creation of the Holy Spirit. It is not a relationship to music, cups, classes, colleges, or the millennium, but to our Lord Jesus Christ. Congregations of my brethren will have to decide whether they will use instrumental music or not; whether they will support Herald of Truth or not. But whatever they decide about any or all of these they do not decide themselves out of the family. They are still my brothers, and I’ll still love them— all of them. They can answer to God for their decision and not to me. I’m not trying to get groups together for that would do no real good, if their hearts were not changed. I’m simply trying to get all of us to share in the glorious togetherness into which Christ Jesus has called us by the gospel.

In closing, let me say that I regard the grace in which He allowed me to share as such a thrilling experience that I refuse to allow myself to be shut off from other “grace-sharers.” I will not rob myself of the kindling flame of association with any of the saints lest my own gift flicker and be extinguished by the snuffer of schism.

The attitude of others toward me is between themselves and God. They may live without me, but I cannot live without them for my soul is bound up in the bundle of life with all who have the Son. Just as “the life is more than food, and the body more than clothing” (Matthew 6:25), so to me the mutual life in Him is more than a means or a method, and the one body is more than a schism or system. Let men argue and debate about the transitory things which cleave them asunder. To me these are like the grass of the field which today is, and tomorrow is cast into the oven. The things about which we strive today will have their little place in the sun and fade away, but His love abides forever. There are eternal values which demand my heart and soul. Brotherhood in Christ is one of them!

God and Surveyor 3

Apparently there are a lot of people who think God is in difficulty during the Space Age. They regard him as a benevolent father who allowed his boys to go to college, only to find that they not only did not need him any longer but he couldn't even talk to them. Just about every time a scientific gadget makes a breakthrough, the question is bandied about, "What does this do to the concept of God?"

The latest is Surveyor 3. This complicated piece of equipment, obeying commands from the Jet Propulsion Laboratory at Pasadena, squatted down gently on the surface of the moon and went to work like a beaver behind on his chewing. It took hundreds of pictures, checked the temperature, extended an aluminum arm and dug trenches, and picked up soil and dumped it down on its flat footpads so the scientists could take a good look at it in closeup pictures. Ronald Scott, the engineer in charge said, "The operation was accurate to within half an inch, working at a range of a quarter of a million miles."

All of this is pretty impressive, of course, but it doesn't affect my thinking about God one bit. I'm accustomed to the belief that creative intelligence can produce a machine which can function on a distant planet. After all, man is a complex machine which makes Surveyor 3 look like a little fire engine in the toy department. I'll not begin to worry until Surveyor 3 makes a man of the dust of the moon and breathes into his nostrils the breath of spheres.

I don't hold with a lot of good religious folk that God does not want us to explore space, or that he will slap us down as if we were "off limits." I think we will plop a man down on the moon, but we will still be a long way from the stars. It will be like a man who decides to walk from New York to San Francisco, and stops in Philadelphia to congratulate himself on his progress. It just could be that he would decide to stay in Philadelphia.

I'm not so sure that God approves of the means by which we are trying to go to the moon, and I'm almost certain he will not like what we do to it after we arrive. The space race is a little silly when you stop to think about it, and those of us who are caught up in it, taxwise and otherwise are liable to be deadly serious about something which could have some humorous aspects if we were watching it all at once. I've fallen to wondering if God might think of the earth as a small merry-go-round swarming with a whole bunch of kids, and a couple of them who are richer than the others, throwing an occasional expensive balloon into the wild blue yonder, while the rest of them can't even afford a balloon. I don't think he approves of it when we get out of hand and start blustering around and playing with giant fire-crackers which could blow the whole shebang to "kingdom come."

I'd hate to see the moon covered with beer cans, whiskey bottles and used car lots. We've pretty well made a garbage dump out of one planet and we've gotten ourselves into a mess. A few years ago everyone was in a dither about whether a man could breathe the atmosphere on another planet and survive. The big question now is whether he can breathe the air on this one and live. We may see the day when people will line up to go to the moon like they do now at the Eagle Stamp counter. You always have to crowd up now in order to get away from the

Of course God is interested in the Russians too. They may be godless but God is not Russianless. The fact that they are trying so hard to make themselves believe that he doesn't exist, does not alter the fact that he does. Denying a fact does not destroy the fact. It is altogether possible, though, that we get angry with the Russians for different reasons than God does. For instance, we charge that they have defamed God by turning their cathedrals into museums. We've done the same thing but we still pretend to "worship" in them. I'm not so sure God was in a lot of the cathedrals to start with. He might have been out in the stable, and it wouldn't have been the first time.

This brings me to the place where I can mention the cosmonaut who came back and reported that he had not seen God up there. This struck the funnybone of a lot of Russians and they repeated it with glee. It did not shake me. The God whom I love is not going to be confined to some point in space. The atheistic Communist had apparently fallen into the same trap as a lot of Christians who think that God dwells at a certain dedicated street address, and when you get there you can smoke in the dining-hall, but "no smoking in the sanctuary." So it didn't worry me that a Russian didn't run into God a few miles up. It would have worried me if he had. It would have worried me more if God had sent back word that he hadn't seen the cosmonaut up there!

I'm a one-hundred-percent, dyed-in-the-wool believer "in him who gives life to the dead, and calls into existence the things that do not exist." He will be when the moon and stars no longer are. I do not say he will be here, for by that time here may be there. I only say that he lives, and I'm willing to risk my life on it. In fact, I am doing so!

The Devil and Factions

Mission Messenger (August 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

I guess I'm a little old-fashioned for the modern theological world. You see, I still believe there is a personal devil, a real, genuine, dishonest-to-God devil. I do not hold with the little kid in Sunday school, whose teacher asked, "Children, is there really a devil?" "No," he answered, "it's like Santa Claus, it's your dad!"

I do not hold with some of the Anglican clerics in England either. They proposed to get rid of Satan by knocking the "d" out of devil, and accrediting everything bad to our own inner tendency toward evil. I have some acquaintance with both England and the Bible, and I suspect that it would be easier for them to get the devil out of the Bible than it would to get him out of England.

There are some pretty brilliant folks I know who have marked the devil off of their list. He has some of them thinking that he never was here in the first place, and others that he retired when they got too sophisticated for him to handle. Actually, I think that with these the real problem is not how they regard Satan, but how they look at Jesus. They admire Jesus but they are not disciples of his. One can admire a schoolteacher from across the street without enrolling in her class.

I've enrolled under Jesus, and I'm majoring in life. It happens that Jesus knew the devil personally and they had some head-on encounters. It is unthinkable for me to claim to be a disciple and deny what my master teaches. So long as I am in school I'll take my instruction from the Teacher and not from the drop-outs who hang around on the corner to make fun of those who are still learning.

Did you ever try to put yourself in the devil's hooves, and attempt to work out the strategy you'd employ to accomplish his purpose? Suppose you had the forces of Light all ripped to shreds, clawing and fighting one another, while you sat on the porch, picking your teeth and watching them. Then about 1809 years after He had invaded your territory in the Great Breakthrough, a little group of the dispossessed inaugurate "a project to unite the Christians (that dirty word!) in all of your sects." What would you do to that movement?

You'll agree, I think, that you'd abort the purpose of the project by fragmenting its adherents into warring factions and deluding them into augmenting the very condition they proposed to alleviate. So far, so bad, for that's exactly what Satan has done to our "noble experiment." He pulled the wool over our eyes and hoodwinked us into thinking that the way to be faithful to the Leader was to slash his body to ribbons.

He took about fifty years to decoy our fathers into looking away from the stauros which was their only hope, and to beguile them into debating and berating one another over the proper way to show homage unto Him whom they all professed to love with the same intensity with which they began to despise one another.

When the original ruse had succeeded, the time was ripe to make the family feast, which was eaten in His memory as a public proclamation of unity, the source of bitter strife and wrangling. Taking advantage of that curious temperament which blends unquenchable zeal with incessant nit-picking,

Satan planted the thought that the important thing was not eating and drinking together “until He comes,” but rather how long the fruit of the vine has been kept on hand, how it was passed to the children of God, and how the bread was broken. There was thus precipitated a series of violent quarrels which filled the hearts of the communicants with such a spirit of rivalry and hatred as to make their participation a farce and mockery. “Their table was made a snare, and a trap, and a stumblingblock, and a recompense unto them.” Now, at long last, after almost a century of civil war, a generation has arisen which is beginning to question the validity of the assumptions and inferences upon which the party spirit has fed. The sun is once more starting to peek from behind the dark clouds of sectarian animosity.

It is true that the partisan leaders are working overtime to plaster the chinks in their crumbling walls. Soldiers of the old guard are being frantically called up to man the bastions. But the party cries sound hollow and empty in an age of increasing knowledge and concern. And the clever ruses and feints of yesterday no longer appeal to the thoughtful.

Recently, in a journal whose editor mistakenly equates advancing the factional plea for advocating “the old paths,” there appeared a statement which shows that the sectarian attitude still lives. After quoting at length from another brother whose article showed a strange inconsistency on what could be “tolerated and fellowshiped,” the editor in question declared that what had been said about some other things “can just as aptly and logically and scripturally be said against individual communion cups on the Lord’s table, fermented wine in the cup, more than one loaf on the table at one time, unscriptural ways of breaking the bread, the assembly divided into classes to edify the church, and women teachers.”

A great many brethren confuse seeking for old paths and searching out the old ruts. And this causes a lot of folk to want to rend their garments, throw up their hands in despair and shake the dust of their feet off against the restoration movement. I'm not inclined that way at all because I'm sure that wherever you go Satan will be there injecting the party spirit by exalting the trivial. I freely admit that our brethren have probably shown a greater inclination than most other folk to piddle around with the paltry, and fiddle-faddle with the frivolous, but they are victims of a philosophy which they inherited. But Church of Christism, like other isms, will have its day. Some fine morning our brethren will be able to distinguish between the coat handed down by their fathers and the robe of righteousness handed over by the Son. And they'll shed the first and don the second.

I plan to stay and fight the devil on the territory that I know best. I feel a great deal better about my chances since I've learned that I don't have to outsmart him by myself. My strategy consists of staying close to the One whom Satan couldn't even keep down after he had killed Him, and loving all of my brethren from that vantage point. A long time ago, one who had actually associated with Him during the period of the Supreme Sharing put it this way, "His orders are that we should put our trust in the name of his Son, Jesus Christ, and love one another— as we used to hear him say in person."

A Letter from Texas

Mission Messenger (September 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

Our readers have had to be very patient with me. I am engaged in a direct frontal assault on our factional attitudes, and this requires a good deal of repetition. Many of the brethren find it very difficult indeed to acknowledge that fellowship in the Lord Jesus Christ is not contingent upon being right about such matters as cups, classes, colleges, the millennium, or instrumental music. I'd like to get on with the exploration of truly major issues confronting us in the modern theological complex, but we will gain little by running off from those whom we love. You cannot lead others when you're out of sight.

I regularly receive letters from those who simply cannot see how we can all be one until every person on earth reaches absolute agreement (with them) on "the issues" as they refer to the motley horde of ideas over which we have been splintered into hostile parties. The futility of such an approach as they recommend is apparent when we realize that if we suddenly reached a state of concord on every troublesome issue today, we would divide over other issues tomorrow. The current issues are not all the same as those over which our fathers split asunder. New conflicts over interpretation arise in every generation. They are spawned by our philosophy.

I have steeled myself never to become discouraged or to be impatient with brethren who are "slow of heart to learn."

Regardless of how often I am asked the same questions I want to be kind and considerate in my reply. I endured a great deal of mental agony and engaged in prolonged soul-searching before I was able to throw off the factional yoke and reach the position I now hold. I want to be as forbearing with others as God has been gracious unto me. For that reason I am never upset by such communications as the following which was signed by two brethren in Texas.

We are of the opinion that you'll only create more division because you insist on lumping together such things as individual cups and Bible classes with instrumental music. The first two are merely matters of opinion, while the last is in the realm of faith. How can you fellowship the Christian Church in its error? Why don't you face up to things as they are and answer these questions in your paper?

Does not the Bible teach that instrumental music is a sin? "Whatsoever is not of faith is sin." Is not the big difference between us and the Christian Church their lack of respect for the authority of Christ? Will God ever accept the worship of those who claim to be sincere but do not follow the pattern He has laid down? If not, how can you accept it?

You talk about loving everyone, but what about those who reject the word of God and insist upon having their own way? Has God ever tolerated such people while they persisted in keeping that which was a sign of their rebellion? These are things we want you to meet squarely, and until you do, we'll conclude that your teaching on fellowship will not stand up when tested by the Bible.

I have never met the brethren who wrote this letter, but I have corresponded with them individually. They are good men. They want to obey the Lord. I have no problem in projecting myself to the place where I can walk in their shoes for I once wrote to others just such letters as they have written unto me. I can have sympathy for them because I know exactly the process which brought them to their present state. But my compassion does not blind me to the fact that their interpretations and attitudes are destructive of the unity for which my Lord prayed, and will continue to divide the saints as long as they hold them.

Our readers who have matured in their thinking to the place where they no longer confuse community with conformity must bear with me in this issue while I again deal with a matter that has become an emotional fixation because of its involvement in debates and arguments of the past. The two brethren who have been kind enough to write have expressed the sentiments of a good many thousands who are caught up in the throes of the factional spirit without even realizing it. I simply will not desert them without seeking to aid them to attain to a clearer knowledge of the will of my Father for His whole family, as I understand that will. I do not say this boastfully, for none of us have anything of which to boast.

1. INCONSISTENCIES

The restoration movement has divided into more than two dozen factions. This statement embarrasses some of our fellow-editors who try to deny it. They affirm that not every difference is a division, which is true. None of our differences ought to be allowed to divide us but we now have as many as twenty-five distinct parties which make a test of fellowship out of their peculiarities. We are divided over everything from how to pass the Lord's Supper to the saints to how to take the gospel to the lost. Our own condition gives the lie to every radio appeal for unity upon the basis we propose. That very proposal has been the ground of our own sad and shameful division.

All of our factions, without exception, find it easy to be charitable toward those who oppose what they have. And all of them refuse to recognize those who have what they oppose.

Brethren who use individual cups can be very gracious and condescending toward those who insist upon one container. They readily agree to accept them as brethren if they will not be contentious and make a test of fellowship out of their views. But those who contend for one container cannot be of this mind toward the others because, as they view it, they have added something “to the pattern.”

Those who have classes are very amiable toward those who do not have and steadfastly insist they will not make a test of fellowship out of the matter, but the reverse is not generally the case. Those who use instrumental music do not proscribe those who do not, but the latter excommunicate them.

In every case those who oppose what we have are “antis” and those who have what we oppose are “liberals.” With one exception every party in the restoration movement is regarded as “anti” by others; and with a single exception every party is regarded as “liberal” by others.

Let me illustrate. Suppose you list in order every faction among us starting with the most ecumenical “Disciples of Christ” at the top, and placing the most reactionary “Church of Christ” on the bottom. The one on the bottom would regard no one else as an “anti” but all as “liberals;” the one on the top would regard no one else as a “liberal” for all would be “antis.” All of us are both “antis” and “liberals” to some others, unless we are the tip of the beak on one end or the last tail feather on the other. I use this metaphor because our mixed-up mess is “for the birds.”

Our good Texas brethren think I will create more division by “lumping together such things as individual cups and Bible classes with instrumental music.” They propose to unite us by sorting out our bones of contention into two piles, one labeled “Opinion” and the other “Faith.” Just how naive can we become? Do they not realize that no two factions would have the same “bones” in their piles? That’s our real problem!

Note carefully that these brethren label as in the area of “opinion” those things which they employ, and in the area of “faith” those things which they oppose. So does every other faction! What is one man’s opinion is another man’s faith. The brethren who have instrumental music class it with opinion. They do not say every one has to use it, they only affirm their right to do so. They do not bind it upon others. Those who contend for one cup make multiple cups a matter of faith and deny that anyone has the right to use multiple containers. They seek to bind their usage upon all.

If you would list a hundred things which have troubled us through the years, and submit these to a hundred preachers, with the request that they catalog them under three headings—Matters of Faith, Matters of Opinion, Matters of Indifference—no two papers would be alike. It is downright silly for thinking men to perpetuate the farcical myth that we can unite the believers on any such a basis. Our practice of it has made us the most tragically divided religious movement on the contemporary American scene.

On what grounds do my Texas brethren assert the prerogative of defining for any other person or party what must be regarded as a matter of faith and a basis of separation from other saints, and what may be regarded as a matter of opinion and a basis of tolerance. Since they propose to speak where the Bible speaks, what scriptural authority can they cite which will appoint them as lords over my conscience? Is not my faith personal? Are not my opinions, by their very nature, personal? Shall I not stand or fall to my own Master?

Our brethren in the non-instrument “Churches of Christ” would salute me as a hero if I came up with a formula for ironing out all of the divisions in the non-instrument ranks. But they want to stop there! All of us in the family of God are opposed to division, but we are not opposed to all division in the family of God. We want everyone to become one only up to our party!

The non-instrument brethren would like to freeze the status of the kingdom of heaven at the 1906 level. But unless we go back to our first fracture and heal it, we will always be divided, regardless of how much patchwork we do on the feathers of our separate wings. We developed a false philosophy under the tension of our original cleavage and it has continued to split and sunder us. It will plague us until we divest ourselves of it and cast it “to the moles and the bats.”

I plead guilty to the charge of the Texas brethren of placing all of our family squabbles, from first to last, in the same category. With me they are neither matters of faith or matters of opinion. They are simply questions for discussion in the spirit of love and continuing brotherhood. We ought not to have separated over any of them. I’m sorry they had to arise and I’m grieved at the trouble they have caused, but I shall not sever myself from a single one of my brethren over any of them. We are saved by faith, and only that which pertains to our salvation is related to “the faith once delivered.” These things are no part of the faith.

The faith which I am to have to myself— my personal conviction— as to the propriety of this thing or that, is a wholly different matter. A man can be judged on the basis of his acceptance or rejection of the faith, but I dare not judge a brother on his acceptance or rejection of that faith which I am told to have to myself. God does not make one’s attitude toward the use of instrumental music, or cups, or classes, or the millennium, a condition of acceptance with Him, so I shall not make them a test of fellowship with me. It is just that simple!

When my Texas brethren encounter those who oppose their classes and cups they decide that these are in the realm of opinion; when they confront those who have instrumental music they decide it is in the realm of faith. Has God endowed them with infallibility? The problem is that other brethren think they also have a right to decide what is a matter of faith or opinion to themselves, and so our childish fighting continues from generation to generation while the world around us is going to hell.

All of this points up the undeniable fact that no man is a “liberal” or an “anti” because of where he stands, but because of where we stand as we look at him. The most extreme “anti” to one is the most flagrant “liberal” to another!

2. THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH

I am asked, “How can you fellowship the Christian Church in its error?”

My answer will not please my questioners. I do not believe there is any such thing as “the Christian Church.” Neither do I believe there is any such thing as “the Church of Christ.” These organizations are not churches at all. They are parties or factions which grew out of the tensions of a nineteenth century movement which was “a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects.”

There is only one church. There never was but one. There never will be but one. The church is not a human organization but a divine organism. It is a divine creation and God only created one church. Man can no more create another church than he can create another God.

The church includes every saved person on the face of this earth. All of these are Christians but they are not all in “the Christian Church.” All of them are in the one body but they are not all in “the Church of Christ.” The church of our Lord existed before our restoration movement. It is still greater than that movement or any other movement. The Texas brethren confuse the body of Christ with the “Church of Christ” which advertises its meeting-places in the Saturday edition of the Fort Worth newspaper, or in the yellow pages of the telephone directory. I’m just not that sectarian. My hope is not in a signboard but in a Savior!

Wherever my father has a child I have a brother. God only has one family and all of his children are in it. I am in it with them. Some of them are still in spiritual diapers, and some are trying to wear clothes too large for them. A lot of them are running around in “intellectual rompers” who ought to start acting their age. God even has some retarded children, but they are a part of the family and we have to bestow more time and abundant honor upon them. So long as they are His and I am His we’re in this thing together.

I can no more “fellowship the Christian Church in its error,” than I could fellowship the Church of Christ in its error. I am in the fellowship with every child of God on this earth, and I have found that I’ve got a lot more brothers than I once thought I had. Fellowship is not something you extend but something you experience. It is not seeing everything alike, but sharing in a common life, the life of the Holy Spirit. Fellowship is a state into which we are called and not a grace which we dispense (1 Corinthians 1:9). Certainly I am in the fellowship with “brothers in error.” There just aren’t any other kind of brothers, not even in Texas.

3. NOT OF FAITH

“Does not the Bible teach that instrumental music in worship is a sin? ‘Whatsoever is not of faith is sin.’”

Of course the Bible does not teach that instrumental music is a sin. If it did there would be no controversy over the matter among honest and humble slaves of Christ. Few of us indeed deliberately trample underfoot the plain teaching of our dear Lord. Although I know thousands of brethren who attend where instrumental music is employed in conjunction with the public expression of praise, I cannot at this time think of a one of them who would insist upon it if the Bible taught that it was a sin.

The truth of it is that, instead of the new covenant scriptures teaching that it is a sin, they say nothing about it. Those brethren who oppose it do so upon the basis of their deduction. From scriptures in various settings and places they formulate a basis of interpretation and using this as a working postulate they conclude that the introduction or injection of instrumental music would violate the intent of God. Since they believe that their postulate is valid and their logical construction derived therefrom is correct they cannot condone the use of the instrument. I share their view and, therefore, it would be a sin for me to introduce instrumental music into the praise service of the saints in violation of my conscience.

However, other brethren read the same scriptures and draw from them a divergent conclusion. They are as honest and sincere as I am. They love Jesus as much as I do. How shall I act toward them? I cannot demand that they violate their conscience and confess something to be a sin when they do not believe that it is. But brotherhood and fellowship are not conditioned upon their seeing it like I do. We were not begotten by “my postulate” but by “our Father.” I am not told that I must love instrumental music, but I am obligated to love my brethren— all of them— and this I do. Now if I think more of my reasoning and deduction than I do of my brethren, I’ll sacrifice brotherhood to my deduction. The reverse is not true. Through brotherly love I can retain both my brethren and my personal conviction. This I am resolved to do. It is merely a matter of priorities.

Of course, it isn’t always easy to take “the high road” because there are some pretty sectarian brethren who use instrumental music and they want to measure your love for them by your attitude toward that with which they play. It is a case of “Love me, love my dog!” All of us have pets and none of us can understand why others don’t fondle them like we do. I’ve a suspicion that heaven will be like some motels— no pets allowed! After the first heartbreak we’ll all be happy!

While I do not commend the employment of instrumental music as a corporate expression of praise, I do deplore some of the hackneyed and shopworn arguments which twist the scriptures to oppose it. Our Texas brethren have fallen prey to a traditional approach which is an unjustifiable debaters’ quibble. All of us have cut our theological eyeteeth on that running sequence which goes like this:

Faith comes by hearing the word of God (Romans 10:17). The word of God is silent on the subject of instrumental music, therefore, instrumental music is not of faith. But, whatsoever is not of faith is sin (Romans 14:23), therefore, instrumental music is sin.

It is by such mental meandering and circumlocution that it is said, “the Bible teaches that instrumental music is a sin.” The Holy Spirit does not generally encircle “Robin Hood’s barn” a couple of times, or “beat the devil about the bush,” as does this argument, in order to reveal that a thing is sin. The worst feature about it is that it demonstrates a palpable ignorance of Paul’s use of “faith.”

In Romans 10, the context plainly shows that the apostle is contrasting justification by faith with attempted justification by law (verses 5, 6). The faith is that which accrues from the proclamation of the glad tidings about Jesus. It results in confessing with the lips that Jesus is Lord and believing in the heart that God has raised him from the dead (verse 9). It is, in short, the faith that saves (verses 10, 13). It is the faith which results from believing the gospel and has not one thing to do with understanding the fine points of apostolic doctrine. “But they have not all heeded the gospel; for Isaiah says, ‘Lord, who has believed what he has heard from us?’ So faith comes from what is heard, and what is heard comes by the preaching of Christ” (verses 16, 17).

In Romans 14, the subject is altogether different. Here the apostle is advocating tolerance of brethren in Christ who differ in opinions. “As for the man who is weak in faith, welcome him, but not for disputes over opinions” (verse 1). The faith under consideration is not belief in Christ, but the personal conviction reached about the propriety of things by one who is in Christ. “One believes he may eat anything, while the weak man eats only vegetables” (verse 2). Such belief neither saves or damns because the kingdom of heaven is not contingent upon it (verse 17).

Since this is personal faith it cannot be imposed upon others but must be private, known but to self and God. “The faith that you have, keep between yourself and God” (verse 22). The Authentic Version reads: “As to the conviction you hold, hold it privately in the sight of God.” J. B. Phillips: “Your personal convictions are a matter of faith between yourself and God.” The New English Version: “If you have a clear conviction, apply it to yourself in the sight of God.”

The faith which saves (Romans 10) must be proclaimed to all; the faith which prompts one to partake or to abstain from certain things must be privately cherished. The first is produced by hearing the word of God; the second by listening to the voice of conscience.

One must never act contrary to his conscience. To do so is a sin. If one doubts that a thing is right he must not act until he is convinced. “But he who doubts is condemned, if he eats, because he does not act from faith; for whatsoever does not proceed from faith is sin.” The Authentic Version: “But he who does discriminate stands condemned if he should eat, because it is not from conviction. For whatsoever is not done from conviction is sin.” The New English Version: “But a man who has doubts is guilty if he eats, because his action does not arise from his conviction, and anything which does not arise from conviction is sin.” J. B. Phillips: “Yet if a man eats meat with an uneasy conscience about it, you may be sure he is wrong to do so. For his action does not spring from his faith, and when we act apart from our faith we sin.”

Brethren who confuse the faith of Romans 10 with the personal scruples of Romans 14 ought never to accuse those who use instrumental music of “wresting the scriptures.” It would seem that the time is at hand for a lot of men to grow up and rise above the party spirit which has prompted both sides in the past to dream up fantastic and frivolous arguments which serve only to confound the unlearned and crystallize bitterness.

4. RESPECT FOR AUTHORITY

“Is not the big difference between us and the Christian Church their lack of respect for the authority of Christ?”

Of course not! Such generalizations are silly, selfish and without warrant. There are thousands in both the Christian Church and the Churches of Christ who have a deep respect for the lordship of Jesus. There are many outside of both of these parties who also do. It is not a question of respect for authority but of understanding. That is why we have so many different kinds of “Churches of Christ.” Too many of us equate God’s revelation with our interpretation, and conclude that because one is infallible, the other must also be infallible. This does not follow!

The cleavage over instrumental music does not result from lack of respect for the authority of Jesus by either segment. It stems from a difference in the philosophy of approach to authority. Each side begins with a pre-supposition, and what the scriptures say is judged in the light of this pre-supposition. Our brothers who use instrumental music do not love Jesus any less than I do, but they do not love our philosophy of approach to authority as much as I do. But one does not reject the revelation of God because he cannot concur with my explanation of it.

There is no need for me to labor this point any further. It is fully covered in pages 113-124 of my book Deep Roots. In the chapter titled “Approach to Authority” I have dealt with the problem as directly related to instrumental music. A great many on both sides of the fence have been kind enough to say it is the most outstanding treatise on the theme they have ever read, but they probably have not read many others. We do hope you will read and study it carefully, for it could settle many of our difficulties at once.

5. ACCEPTANCE OF WORSHIP

“Will God ever accept the worship of those who are sincere but do not follow the pattern as it is laid down? If not, how can you accept it?”

I do not accept worship since it is not addressed to me, but I do try to answer the questions of brethren which are addressed to me. It appears that our Texas brethren entertain the opinion that God has never at any time accepted the worship of those who did not conform exactly to what was written, but they have overlooked one example. When God ordained the passover He was quite specific about the requirements, but the prayer of a righteous man once prevailed over the specifications.

“For a multitude of the people . . . had not cleansed themselves, yet did they eat the passover otherwise than it was written. But Hezekiah prayed for them, saying, The good Lord pardon every one that prepareth his heart to seek God, the Lord God of his fathers, though he be not cleansed according to the purification of the sanctuary. And the Lord hearkened to Hezekiah, and healed the people” (2 Chronicles 38:18-20). The Revised Standard Version says, “They ate the passover otherwise than as prescribed.”

If our brethren in Texas think that our brothers in the Christian Church are worshiping “otherwise than it was written” they ought to be imitating Hezekiah and praying to the good Lord to pardon every one that prepares his heart to seek God, in spite of his dereliction. How long has it been since any of the non-instrument preachers in Texas have publicly prayed for the Lord to pardon those who have prepared their heart to seek God even while doing “otherwise than as prescribed”? I imagine that they would withdraw from Hezekiah if he did it!

But it is because of the mercy shown by God, even under a legalistic arrangement, that I rejoice that the final judgment will be held in heaven rather than in Texas. I think I’d prefer to risk my chances in glory than in Austin!

6. TOLERANCE OF GOD

Yes, He has! Israel came to Samuel and demanded, “Give us a king to govern us.” When Samuel prayed to the Lord, the Lord said to him, “Hearken to the voice of the people in all that they say to you; for they have not rejected you, but they have rejected me from being king over them.” God pointed out that this was only one more in a long line of departures since He had delivered them from bondage.

Samuel plainly labeled it a sin! “You shall know and see that your wickedness is great, which you have done in the sight of the Lord, in asking for yourselves a king.” When an unseasonal phenomenon occurred the frightened people said to Samuel, “Pray for your servants to the Lord your God, that we may not die; for we have added to all our sins this evil to ask for ourselves a king.” But God tolerated them and allowed them to keep their king. The reason is given. “For the Lord will not cast away his people, for his great name’s sake, because it has pleased the Lord to make you a people for himself” (1 Samuel 12:22).

It is for this reason I shall not cast away His people, nor separate myself from them because of the troublesome things which are espoused and adopted by those who are in Him. I simply refuse to recognize the walls and barriers which men have erected to partition off God’s children into factional compartments.

7. A CHALLENGE

Now that I have squarely met and answered the questions of our good brethren from Texas, I want to issue a challenge to them and to all of my brethren in the non-instrument segment of the restoration movement all over the earth. I do this in all humility and sincerity.

1. I challenge them to remove all of our controversial issues (instrumental music, institutionalism, cups, classes, colleges, the millennium, etc.) from the sphere of tests of union or communion among the children of God, and return them to their only proper province, that of grounds for continuing discussion among brethren in the bonds of sacred fellowship.

This will require no change of congregational procedure, and no adoption by any person of anything contrary to conscience. It will mean no endorsement of what anyone else practices, but will simply leave every saint to stand or fall to his own Master.

2. I challenge them to genuinely practice what they have always professed and to make congregational autonomy an active principle instead of a political pawn. This means that every congregation of saints on earth will be free under the Lordship of Jesus to study the revelation of heaven for themselves without fear of attack or reprisal from any other, regardless of divergent views.

3. I challenge them to renounce public partisan debate with factional gladiators as a means of trying to achieve oneness and to substitute meaningful dialogue in an atmosphere of courtesy and humility as equals in their need of the grace of God.

4. I challenge them to inaugurate a sharing program with all men of good will in all of our parties, inviting such brethren to address them, and receiving the benefit of insights above and beyond the factional level.

5. I challenge them to cross over partisan barriers in combining as children of God to effect greater impact upon the grave problems of their several communities. Let brethren from all branches of our restoration heritage meet in mutual respect for one another to discuss how best to grapple with the forces of decay which threaten us all. Hunger, famine, nakedness, dope addiction, alcoholism, prostitution— these are not related to divergent views on instrumental music or the millennium. Things which threaten us all can better be fought together.

6. I challenge the brethren to really “let brotherly love continue,” and to “love the brotherhood” as God sees it, and not as we have viewed it through the jaundiced eyes of partisan prejudice. We can be one in Christ and no one give up any truth he has ever held. Regardless of what it costs us to have the unity of the Spirit the cost of not having it is much greater. Let us resolve in this generation to recapture the vitality, the validity, and the unity of the restoration ideal.

We do not reject Jesus when we renounce the wars and feuds which our fathers kindled; we do not deny the Spirit when we denounce the factions and parties which we have inherited. If peace must come, let it come through our efforts. Let it begin now!

“Let us then pursue what makes for peace and for mutual upbuilding” (Romans 14:19).

Liberty and Expediency

Mission Messenger (September 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

“All things are lawful unto me, but all things are not expedient: all things are lawful for me, but I will not be brought under the power of any” (1 Cor. 6:12).

This controversial passage does not imply that one is free to do anything he wishes, regardless of its nature. The context shows that the “all things” relate to those things which God has made. The point is that God did nothing useless. There is a lawful purpose for all that he created.

The next verse illustrates the point. “Meats for the belly, and the belly for meats: but God shall destroy both it and them.” The digestive organs serve a useful design, and so does food. Both are neutral in so far as moral significance is concerned, and belong to our transitory physical existence. God has ordained that they cease with our death. But they may be employed in such fashion by an act of will that their use may be detrimental to our eternal welfare. One may become a slave of appetite until he no longer rules his belly but it governs him. Or, he may destroy one for whom Christ died by insisting upon his “rights” with regard to eating meat (Romans 14:15).

Thus even that which was created with a lawful purpose may be inexpedient. What is meant by expedient? Our word is from the Latin, which means, “to free one caught by the foot,” that is, to get the foot out of a trap, or out of quicksand or mire. The Greek is sumphero, to bring together. It is used in Acts 19:19 where those who practiced the black arts, brought their books together, and made a bonfire of these volumes on magic. The word always relates to that which is profitable.

In Matthew 5:29, 30, it is translated, “it is profitable.” In Hebrews 12:10 it refers to the chastisement administered by the Father as “for our profit.” In 1 Corinthians 12:7, where the subject is spiritual gifts, the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man for profitable use. The best definition we can furnish for the term is “apt and suitable for the end in view, advantageous.”

The divine purpose is not the selfish gratification of one, but the salvation of all. Even that which is harmless or negative in itself, cannot be indulged if such indulgence operates against the greater and universal design of the edification of all. This lays upon each of us the grave responsibility of examining his freedom and rights, to assure that in the enjoyment of the first, and the exercise of the second, he does not violate the moral restraints imposed by God. Man is a social being, and as such must share with others his inalienable rights. As a guideline for consideration of our interpersonal relationships we submit the following propositions.

1. There are values which are superior to individual rights.

This being true, in order to secure the benefits and blessings of such superior values, one may need to forfeit or forego his rights. That which builds up, or edifies all, at the expense of one, is to be preferred over that which builds up one at the expense of all. “I try to please all men in everything that I do, not seeking my own advantage, but that of many, that they may be saved” (1 Cor. 10:33). There are some blessings which accrue only from union with others and a disruption of such union by the selfish action of one destroys all hope of sharing in such beneficence.

2. No individual can insist upon his own rights to the destruction of the rights of others.

There can be no such thing as absolute personal freedom in a universe founded upon moral obligation. Our liberty must always be limited by the nature of the relationship which we sustain to others. The means which we devise to disregard and overthrow the rights of others when we are in position to enforce them will some day be used to overthrow our rights by those who gain the ascendancy. The insistence upon our own freedom regardless of consequences is subversive of all freedom, and will result in the enslavement of all.

3. The strong individual in Christ is the one who is willing to forego his personal rights for the common good.

He is the one who has learned that the greater right is the “right not to.” This is brought out in the wonderful dissertation on strong and weak brethren in Romans 14. “It is right not to eat meat or drink wine or do anything that makes your brother stumble” (verse 21). One had a right to eat meat or drink wine. “Everything is indeed clean (that is kosher, verse 20) but it is wrong for any one to make others fall by what he eats.”

EROSION OF LIBERTY

The body of Christ is a community of free men. “Christ set us free, to be free men” (Gal. 5:1). But it is in the nature of the sectarian establishment to confiscate and destroy liberty. In order to do so it must always exalt men whose opinions and interpretations are given an aura of infallibility and to whose will all others must bow. In the Roman structure such power is invested in the pope, and when he speaks ex cathedra (from the chair), his pronouncements become dogma and must be accepted, or excommunication will result.

In establishments which argue for congregational autonomy, the body of elders or presbyters often decide upon the official interpretation on any controverted issue, and upon their statement such interpretation becomes dogma. Any dissenter is henceforth regarded as a heretic, and those who cannot violate conscience and void their own intelligence are hounded out. Yet, but a little thought will prove that there is nothing about appointment to office which provides either inerrancy of judgment or infallibility of understanding.

There are certain freedoms which belong to one as a child of God and these should not be infringed upon by either pope or prelate, for neither of these is God. They have no right to thrust themselves between God and his children. The revelation has been given to all. It is not a prerogative of an exalted few to be dispensed at their will. For that reason, and in order that our faith may rest in the power of God, and not in the wisdom of men, I shall define the liberty which inheres in being a child of God and which is not subject to the authoritarian structures. These freedoms belong to all. They should be cherished and defended for all.

1. The liberty to examine and search the scriptures personally.

This includes the right to make use of any aids which help to clarify, explain and enlighten, and to employ any translation or version which may serve to better uncover the will of God. There can be no “authorized version” in our language, for the simple reason that no one is authorized to authorize one.

2. The liberty to form conclusions and render judgments upon the basis of personal understanding.

It is a burlesque upon honesty to urge every person to study the word of God for himself, if he must reach a foregone conclusion. Because the human mind is fallible and subject to limitation, all knowledge must be relative. The imposition of bounds and restraints by “the powers that be” in any sectarian establishment represents an attempt to play at being God.

3. The liberty to implement one’s understanding in his own life.

One must be true to himself. He dare not violate his own conscience. His understanding may be faulty but he must work in harmony with it until he learns better. If he reaches a conclusion which becomes a personal conviction about the method of caring for orphans or the aged, or of training and preparing himself for more effective service, or of dispensing his money upon mission fields, or of expressing his praise to God, I dare not pass legislation to make him conform to my divergent views. To do so would make his liberty subject to my will. I must be tolerant of him while I implement my own understanding in a divergent manner. Tolerance is not the endorsement of anything that is wrong but the endurance of one who thinks that it is right.

4. The liberty to be judged by conscience and Christ, to stand or fall to one’s own master.

The faculty of the heart which condemns is called the conscience. It is not infallible for it can act only upon the facts apprehended by the intellect. The ultimate judge is God and he is able to consider all weaknesses, motivations and mitigating factors. “By this we shall know that we are of the truth, and reassure our hearts before him whenever our hearts condemn us; for God is greater than our hearts, and he knows everything” (1 John 3:19, 20).

“Who are you to pass judgment on the servant of another? It is before his own master that he stands or falls” (Romans 14:4). “Why do you pass judgment on your brother? Or you, why do you despise your brother? For we shall all stand before the judgment seat of God” (verse 10).

5. The liberty to serve in a congregational capacity with those whose joint service appears most compatible to one's understanding.

No one should be compelled or forced, under threat of expulsion or duress, to serve in a congregation where the policies run counter to his conscience and understanding. One cannot choose his brothers in the Lord, but he should be free to select the particular community of the saints where he can best grow in grace and knowledge, and he should be lovingly commended unto them.

If a brother believes, from his own study of the Word, that praise to God can be acceptably rendered where instrumental music is employed, he should be free to directly associate with others who share the view, without being accused of departing from the faith. If one believes in mutual ministry, or a certain method of caring for orphans and widows, or if he is opposed to classes or individual cups, he should be permitted the liberty of assembling with other saints with whom he feels at home. But he must not be regarded as any less a brother by those who do not share his ideas, nor should he regard them as disloyal or unfaithful for standing or falling to their own master.

Meeting in different places is not “division.” Meeting in the same place is not necessarily unity. To gather with brethren who share your views about certain things, as a preference based upon personal understanding, is not factional. It becomes so only when those who do it make such preference and understanding a test of fellowship, or of union and communion with God. If those who gather for such preferences or understanding can never meet with the whole body of saints in the community to share in praise and witness of the common faith, they are factional and sectarian, regardless of their claims to be otherwise.

RESPONSIBILITY OF LIBERTY

Most of us crave liberty for ourselves, but are hesitant about accepting the consequences which accompany it. It is therefore necessary to point out that there are certain realms in which one must be restrained from acting. We do not intend to be exhaustive in our treatment, but we shall merely mention six areas in which one has no right to intrude. He does not have a right to:

1. Bind his deductions upon others as terms of communion further than they are able to understand and concur in them.

For example, whatever conclusion one may reach with reference to the millennium, he cannot formally bind upon another, for the other has the same right to study God's word and to form conclusions based upon his deductions. This is not to say both will be right, for both may be wrong. But if one is right in his deductions he is wrong in making a creed out of them which must be accepted as a term of fellowship contrary to one's personal belief, or in ignorance of the whole subject. No one should be made to subscribe to something of which he is ignorant, for then the faith is not his, but that of the one who imposes it.

2. Make personal interpretation a test of fellowship.

The word of God must be studied by all of God's children, as brothers one of another. But those who are brothers dare not destroy the family relationship over the increasing knowledge of one or the relative slowness of perception of others. If one arrives at an interpretation of a passage after thirty years he cannot demand that others see it in thirty minutes or be ejected from the family and the father's house for his slowness.

3. Form a party around his deductions on either the pro or con of some point of teaching among those in Christ.

The party spirit is sectarian. It is a work of the flesh. It is a symptom of immaturity and carnality. There is no room on earth for a pro-instrument party or an anti-instrument party, but there is room in God's family for brethren who differ about the validity of the instrument. There is no room on earth for a pre-millennial party, or an amillennial party, but there is room enough in the Father's house for children who have divergent views about the millennium. There is no room on earth for a one-cup party or a multiple-cups party, but God's wonderful saving grace is wide enough to shelter all of his children who differ on such matters. A pro-instrument party is a sect. An anti-instrument party is a sect. A one-cup party is a sect. A multiple-cups party is a sect. All sects result from those who walk not after the Spirit, but after the flesh. The first fruit of the Spirit is love.

4. Place a stumblingblock in the way of any brother.

"Then let us no more pass judgment on one another, but rather decide never to put a stumblingblock or hindrance in the way of a brother" (Romans 14:13). "It is right not to eat meat or drink wine or do anything that makes your brother stumble" (verse 21).

Because the word for "stumblingblock" is also translated "offence," it is sometimes thought that a Christian must never do anything which will cause others to get their feelings hurt, or to murmur or complain. But the word "offend" is not so used. It is from skandalon, which originally referred to the trigger of a trap or snare, literally, the part to which the bait was fastened. It then came to refer to the trap itself. Now one does not walk into a snare deliberately. He does not stumble over that which he clearly sees. In the exercise of our liberty we are not to do those things which may cause a brother who observes us to practice them to the detriment of his personal conduct or conscience.

If an unbeliever invited a Christian to attend a feast, he was free to go and eat without asking any questions about the food. But if someone volunteered the information that the food had been consecrated to a pagan deity, the Christian had to desist from eating it, not because his own conscience condemned him, but out of consideration for the conscience of the informer. Too, there were often those in the congregation of saints who had not learned that idols were nothing. They had left their immorality but retained their superstitions. “There are some who have been so accustomed to idolatry that even now they eat this food with a sense of its heathen consecration” (1 Cor. 8:9).

When such brethren were liable to be present, although it was perfectly legitimate for the man of spiritual maturity to eat such food, he was to voluntarily abstain rather than to set an example for one whose motivation in eating might be different. “If a weak character sees you sitting down to a meal in a heathen temple— you, who have knowledge— will not his conscience be emboldened to eat food consecrated to the heathen deity?” There is a great deal of difference in eating food in spite of the fact it may have been consecrated to a heathen deity, and eating it because it has been so consecrated. While we are on the subject we should note that the scriptures do not teach that “it is not right to eat meat or to drink wine.” The teaching is that “it is right not to eat meat or drink wine” under certain circumstances. There is a difference!

5. Impose his thinking upon a congregation of saints as a condition of recognition as brethren in the Lord.

The congregation of redeemed ones is subject to the Lord, and not to men outside of its number. No man can dismember the body of those whom the Lord has accepted. No man can establish fellowship for another in the Spirit, no man can sever another from that fellowship. He only cuts himself off with the knife with which he seeks to cut others off. Whether or not one recognizes a congregation has not one thing to do with their relationship to God.

If a congregation has Bible classes by unanimous consent, and one moves into the community whose conscience does not allow him to condone such a practice he has no right to make a proposition that if the congregation will bow to his will and thinking in the matter, he will regard them as brethren and “worship” with them. Our relationship to God is covenantal and propositional, but the only proposition which must be believed for entrance into the fellowship is that “Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God.” “The kingdom of God is not meat and drink” (Romans 14:17). Neither is it cups, classes, colleges, orphan homes, music, or the millennium. It is now, as it ever has been, “righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit.”

A congregation of saints may alter a practice out of deference to the views of one because he is a brother, but they should never do so to meet the arbitrary demands of such a one as a condition of brotherhood. The first would be done out of recognition for the Lordship of Christ which makes us all brothers, but the second would be bowing to the lordship of another over God’s heritage. Even the apostle who planted the congregation at Corinth wrote, “Do not think we are dictating the terms of your faith” (2 Cor. 1:24).

6. Assist any congregation in excluding any other congregation from fellowship, or violate the autonomy of another congregation.

It is absurd and ridiculous to talk about “congregational autonomy” in one breath, and about “excluding a congregation” in the next. No group of men on earth has any jurisdiction outside of the congregation which elected and appointed them. Every congregation of brethren in the world must be left to the Lordship of Jesus and is not subject to a self-appointed tribunal of preachers and editors. There is no place in God’s system for a brotherhood jury composed of peripatetic proclaimers and paper popes.

Paul Scherer wrote, “Freedom is not so much an inalienable right as it is an interminable quest.” In a very real sense, freedom cannot be bequeathed. It is not so much an inheritance as an achievement. Each generation must struggle to attain freedom. Each must learn anew that freedom in Christ is not freedom from Christ. We cannot rest upon the laurels of our fathers, for those who rest will lose that which others gained through their labors. We covet freedom for all of God’s children — freedom to think, to speak and to act! If we conspire to take away the freedom of those in Christ who do not think, speak and act exactly as we do, we only prepare a Haman’s gallows upon which we will some day be gibbeted.

He who grinds a party axe will some day feel its keen blade and cold steel upon the flesh of his own neck. When the factional chickens come home to roost they always turn out to be chicken-hawks! Only by granting freedom in Christ can we be free in Christ ourselves.

The Clergy of God

Mission Messenger (October 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

Christianity was not designed for a Christian world. It is the divine strategy intended to probe and penetrate a pagan culture and to bring it into voluntary subjection to the Prince of peace. When it was originally introduced it motivated a group of nameless slaves and frightened fishermen with such a dynamic that they were transformed, and this message proclaimed in the inner city areas of great metropolitan centers brought thousands to the foot of the cross as believing penitents. And this was accomplished without gimmicks or gadgets, and with none of the devices and appliances which are available to us through science and technology.

Even the most optimistic proponent of the Way must admit that we can more honestly boast of the glories of the past than of the conquests of the present. After twenty centuries of possession of “the faith once delivered” Christians form a minority group which grows proportionately less with each passing year. Even those places which report marked gains confess that many of their “converts” are apathetic, indifferent and generally unconcerned. They do not add real hard muscle to the body, but are flabby tissue which must be pampered and endured. Frequently a congregation gets numerically larger and actually becomes weaker. We must never confuse blubber with muscle!

Is there any hope of reversing the trend? The disciple of Christ can have but one answer, for hope is one of the three abiding values in his life. It is his helmet, which therefore protects the seat of his intellectual powers and rational processes. If he once admits that what he has is powerless to change men when brought to bear in all of its force, he has already fled the field of battle, for he has nothing left with which to fight. The only question with which he can possibly deal is how to meet the forces of crisis effectively and responsibly.

It will probably not be disputed that, in our day the body of believers must be transformed before the world can be. This means that we must discover a principle of such tremendous vitality as to completely re-make our approach to life. But is there such a principle? I think there is, and I also think it was the secret of the electrifying results of the primitive saints. It is altogether possible that we have mistaken ideas about what made the ignorant and unlearned fishermen so effective, and we may seek eagerly to recapture some aspect of their witness which was purely secondary.

We may become obsessed with the sound of rushing winds, with flaming tongues of fire and supernatural phenomena, and forget that it was a Message which was the dynamic to save, and it was faith in that Message, even when unaccompanied with any overt demonstration except the conviction of the speaker, which caused kings and governors to tremble. Testifying about the horsepower under the hood will achieve little if one allows the family to starve because he does not know how to drive the car to market and “bring home the bacon.” The Christian Way must be the most practical approach to life on the human level, or it will be nothing. Men do not live in the clouds except in dreams.

The primitive saints were living reproductions of Christ. They were not merely members of a society or organization, but each one of them was the living, vital word made flesh. As Jesus was the word made flesh to dwell among men, during His earthly sojourn, so every disciple became like his Lord. Before there was a compilation of epistles into the New Testament scriptures, the apostle wrote to the saints, “You are all the letter we need, a letter written on our heart; any man can see it for what it is and read it for himself. And as for you, it is plain that you are a letter that has come from Christ, given to us to deliver.”

The living letters were the saints themselves, and men read their lives like the pages of a book. Those lives reflected the very essence of the teaching of Jesus who said, “The Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give himself a ransom for many.” So the disciples did not come to be ministered unto. Rather they also served and gave. We can never make an impact on the world so long as we must minister unto the church. An army which must spend the major part of its money and time entertaining its own soldiers will never make an effective fighting force. Those who must be petted and pampered are too soft to fight the world, the flesh and the devil.

The early disciples heard the call of the Captain and they followed him wherever He led. They had no concept of the boredom and spiritless routine attendant upon “going to church.” Instead, they were a part of a great adventure. Theirs was a struggle for survival “against cosmic powers, against the authorities and potentates of this dark world, against the superhuman forces of evil in the heavens.” When they met in a bivouac in a cavern or an upper room it was not to listen to a carefully prepared address or an after-dinner speech delivered by one of their number for a fee or offering, but it was to swap stories of actual engagements on the hottest front.

They reported assaults on the centers of pagan opposition, recounted what had happened when they encountered enemy ambush units and snipers, and told of victories achieved when gates were flung open for their triumphal entry. “When they arrived and had called the congregation together, they reported all that God had helped them to do, and how he had thrown open the gates of faith to the Gentiles.” And always they went back to the battlefield, back to the thick of the fight.

Today we number in the millions those who profess to be following Christ, but they are fooling themselves, and we are helping to dupe them. The devil has deceived us into making and projecting an image of the body of Christ in the form of the institutional church, a great organization, with programs, charts and graphs, with executive assistants to manipulate it, with financial devices and schemes to perpetuate it, and offering security for a price. We have confused enlistment in the army with enrollment in a mutual insurance company, and we no longer enter the fray with its blood and sweat and tears. We gather only as stockholders in an air-conditioned central office building, and after learning about our current status, we do not go back into the conflict, but to our living-room with its television set. And Satan cautions his demons not to interfere, or allow us to become disturbed. The church has come between us and Christ, and nothing else so obscures and hides him as what we call “religious organizations.”

What can be done to transform the modern “church” into a hard core fighting force? Probably very little with the current membership. These did not enlist to fight. Suppose we illustrate with a huge football stadium on a rainy afternoon. On the muddy field the small knot of players is engaged in a struggle which has left their uniforms sweaty, grimy and dirty. The sheltered stands are packed with a crowd dressed fashionably, many of them fat and paunchy. They are enjoying the spectacle below. If the announcer would invite them, over the amplifying system, to come down and get into the game, how many would respond? Perhaps an occasional show-off would work his way down to the field, but the multitude would remain unmoved, except to joke with one another about the absurdity of the announcement. They did not come to participate but to watch. They are paying observers. If you tried to force them to become a part of the action they would take their blankets and thermos bottles and head for the gates.

Our hope does not lie with the unconverted mass who call themselves “Christians.” But in every group there is a small pocket of the concerned ones. These may not always be identical with those who are designated “the faithful few.” We tend to equate faithfulness merely with showing up at meetings, giving money or volunteering for organizational projects, such as chaperoning youth meetings. All of these are important but the motivations for doing them may frequently keep them from being demonstrations of real faith.

One may be deeply concerned while pressed down with the burden of making a living and supporting his family until he cannot attend many of the regular meetings. It is a commentary on our distorted sense of values that we count as “faithful” those who grumblingly attend all of the meetings out of a sense of compulsion, while we discount those who are saddened by the fact that they cannot come.

The concerned ones are those who are distressed by the differences between profession and practice, and who have come to see that the Way does not consist of the recitation of ritual, or of presenting religious performances. Instead, it is a vital relationship with God through Christ which touches every avenue of earthly existence and changes one’s entire approach to life. There is a great temptation to one who comes to such a realization. He immediately wants to associate with those who share his vision, and often he widens the gap between himself and those who tend to place their trust in merely “belonging to the church,” or supporting an institution.

But this becomes in itself a symptom of unconcern. When the “fellowship of the concerned” becomes concerned only for its own, it simply reproduces in another party what it has previously condemned. It becomes Pharisaical, thanking God it is not like other men, and especially like publicans. The concerned ones must become leaven. They are God's yeast cakes. But there is nothing more useless or ineffective than a gathering of yeast cakes. All of them have the potential to create an uprising or a rising up, but all of this is lost when the yeast cakes form their own heap. A faction of concerned ones is no better than any other faction.

Leaven achieves life by losing it. It penetrates the mass at the expense of its own existence. Jesus entered the world knowing that to provide life for others, he must give his own. And he said to his disciples, "Whoever cares for his own safety is lost; but if a man will let himself be lost for my sake, he will find his true self." What is true of leaven is also true of salt. It must lose itself in that which it is to season or preserve. Salt achieves nothing while in the shaker. And we are to be the salt of the world, not the salt of the saved!

Wherever the unleavened, or untouched substance is, there must the leaven be found. Jesus did not commission us to call the unleavened mass unto ourselves, or to our structures, but commissioned the leaven to go. "And he called to him his twelve disciples . . . These twelve Jesus sent out" (Matt. 10:1, 5). The purpose of Jesus in calling anyone to him is to send him out. Those who come in but never go out, miss the whole point of the Christian life.

Unfortunately we have been victimized by the Enemy into dividing our forces into priests and people, or clergy and laity. The former are considered to have a vocation for soul-winning. This has been developed into a fine art, to be carried out by trained professionals. In the Roman Catholic party those who have taken special vows are actually called "the religious." The clergyman is supposed to act, talk and behave in a manner different from the rest of the saints. He has a "divine calling" or a "high calling."

Such an idea is absolutely foreign to God's program. The very thought of it automatically de-salinizes the salt, and unleavens the yeast. If the leaven is useless unless it comes in a special package, then every yeast cake which is unable to secure the required wrapping will remain on the refrigerator shelf and make no attempt to contact the mass. The clergy system operates to convince the soldiers that they cannot fight, and the athletes that they cannot run. The motto is, "Find a seat and leave the driving to us!" There is nothing left for the "average Christian" to do except to sit in the grandstand and watch the performance and pay the performers. Baptism is not a door to Christ but a turnstile!

We are not being anti-clerical when we insist that every grain of God's salt has a responsibility to bring its strength to bear on the mass. We would defeat God's purpose if we reduced all of our "clergy" to the status of "laity." What we must do is exactly the opposite. We must elevate all of the "laity" to "clergy" status. This does not imply that we should do away with public proclaimers, but rather that we should recognize that this is only one form of ministry. And like any other, it may or may not be effective, depending upon how it is carried out. It is not the only form of ministry because every child of God is a minister.

The doctor who is a Christian has an enviable place as God's minister, for he contacts people at a time of need, when they are sick, frightened and often losing hope. If we could get Christian physicians to pray with their patients before surgery, it would be much more effective than sending for "a preacher" to come in and "say a prayer."

The Christian nurse has a tremendous opportunity to serve as a minister of God. If hospital rules forbid her offering a prayer with the patients on the ward, she can say to each one as she tucks him in, "God bless you and give you a good night's sleep, and I will be praying for you." Of course, when she returns to the nurses station she must pray for guidance and understanding in ministering to each need, for it would be hypocritical to tell the patients you'd pray if you did not do so.

I know a firm of Christian realtors, the members of which believe that God wants them to minister to their clients for good. Each morning they gather for prayer before they open for the day. Frequently they pray with a client in their inner offices. It is no wonder that all of them bear a real witness outside of the office. They are active in the Christian Businessmen's Fellowship, in evangelical outreach to the Jews, in Bible distribution work, etc. They are God's ministers to the realty profession.

The universal ministry of the saints is the dynamic which can change our modern world. This is not, however, "the ministry of the laity," about which we read so much in this day. The term "lay ministry" still implies that this is a separate ministry, another kind of ministry. But "laity" is from laos, which means "the people." The preacher is also one of the people of God and when he serves he does so because of this.

There is no other ministry than "lay ministry" for it is "people ministry" and preachers are people. So long as we talk about "the ministry of the laity" we are still thinking in terms of a clergy, and unconsciously we equate their service with a professional, skilled and craftsmanlike job as opposed to the work done by good-natured, willing, but unskilled and bumbling laborers. The man who talks about "my laymen" missed his calling. He should be a Roman Catholic priest.

Why should any child of God send for a preacher to pray in a time of crisis or emergency? This would be like children in a family sending for an attorney to draw up a petition every time they wanted to ask their father for a favor. If all of the saints become ministers as God intended, there will be no "minister shortage." The early church knew nothing of such a problem.

There was a shortage of saints in the world, but there was never a shortage of ministers among the saints, for there were no non-ministering saints. To talk about a non-ministering follower of Jesus would be the equivalent of talking about a “non-serving slave.” Imagine the apostle Paul writing about “a church without a minister.” To him this would have been exactly like saying “a congregation without a member” or “a flock without a sheep.”

A recapture of the divine dynamic universal witness will not offset the need for men of ability to train the soldiers and to help plan the strategy. But it will free them from the onerous duty of spoon-feeding perpetual infants and liberate them to go into the world and share the message with every creature.

Belief and Unbelief

Mission Messenger (October 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

A good brother whom I love is a little perturbed with me and disturbed about me because I am unwilling to concede that all of the heathen who never even heard about Jesus will be eternally lost. He is extremely anxious to herd all such unfortunates into hell in order to rescue God from any manifestation of inconsistency and to prove his own loyalty to Jesus. He thinks I may be guilty of holding out hope for unbelievers and of projecting “another way” of salvation.

I confess that I do not share his excitement for wanting to consign all of the ignorant to the flames while the righteous continue to stand afar off and shout, “Burn baby, burn!” In the first place I do not think that God will judge the world by my interpretation of revelation and I do not expect him to send an angel to ask me to advise Him as to how I think He should proceed in order to maintain His integrity. Moreover, I’m having quite a time of it lately in trying to live up to what I know is His will and I’m being forced to rely so heavily upon grace to have any hope at all that I have been driven to the conclusion that divine grace may be a lot greater than my puny powers of comprehension.

The brother to whom I refer points out that Jesus plainly said, “He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned.” He argues that there are only two classes, the saved and the damned, and he seems almost as anxious to damn a lot as to save a few. I accept what Jesus said but I hold that it has no bearing upon our discussion at all because Jesus was speaking only of those who heard the gospel and accepted or rejected it. “And he said unto them, Go ye into the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth (the gospel) and is baptized shall be saved; he that believeth not (the gospel) shall be damned.”

I’m not interested in arguing about the ultimate fate of the heathen. God will handle their case according to His sovereign purpose and what I think will have no bearing on it one way or another. But I am going to note our brother’s position, for the simple reason that I do not think he understands the “unbelief” that damns, and it may be that the reason he does not, is because he does not understand the “belief” that saves. I trust that my readers will pardon me for the time and space I must consume in this study.

Faith is the belief of testimony, and where there is no testimony there can be no faith. No one can believe something of which he has never heard. “How shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard?” (Romans 10:14). When the mind receives testimony and judges the witnesses to be credible and reliable, the intellect acknowledges a firm conviction or persuasion as to the subject of the testimony. This is not the faith that saves, however, but the foundation of it.

One can never be saved by a mere intellectual state, because all intellectual states are involuntary and passive. An intellectual state cannot be commanded but we are commanded to believe as a condition of salvation. An intellectual state which registers either assent to or doubt of a proposition can never be made a condition of salvation. “Thou believest that there is one God; thou doest well: the devils also believe and tremble” (James 2:19). It is well and good to believe any truth which commends itself to our intellectual powers of discrimination, but intellectual assent will not save.

One can consent to the truth of a proposition intellectually and make no reformation of life or conduct. Such a person may be said to believe exactly as the demons are said to believe in the existence of God and monotheism. All of the demons are monotheists. But the faith which saves manifests itself in the outward life because it is an act of the will. Thus it is the yielding up or surrender of the whole being or personality to the claims of Jesus as apprehended by the intellect acting upon the testimony as to his Lordship. Such surrender is voluntary. It is deliberate. It is wilful, that is, self-determined and intentional.

FAITH AND COMMITMENT

Faith is the act of commitment to Christ of one's whole life and being. Some of the brethren are bothered about the increasing use of the word "commitment" in our day. It has not been a part of our vocabulary. Articles criticizing its use have appeared in some orthodox journals. But the writers have forgotten that the word for faith has also been translated by "commit" and "committed" in the King James Version.

Take Luke 16:11 for an example, "If therefore ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches?" The word for "commit" is the very same word translated "believeth" in Romans 1:16, "For I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ: for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first and also to the Greek."

Or consider John 2:24. "But Jesus did not commit himself unto them, because he knew all men." The word for "commit" is the same as that for "believeth" in 1 John 5:5, "Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God?"

The nature of the faith that saves is such that not only must a fact or truth be presented by testimony but the presentation must be in such form as to be grasped or understood by the mind. Just as the physical eye cannot have an image of that which is enveloped in darkness so the mental vision cannot embrace that upon which it has no enlightenment. To expect faith to function in that which it cannot understand is the equivalent of expecting one to see what is veiled or cloaked. The object may be there but one cannot envision it.

If a proposition is stated in a language which is foreign to me I cannot believe it because I do not understand it. It may be a fact or a truth but I do not know whether it is or not and until I understand it I cannot say that I believe it, for one can believe only to the extent that he understands. It is true that I may understand some things about Jesus Christ, and understand enough that I am willing to commit my being unto Him, without understanding all about His nature and accomplishments, but my faith in Him upon the basis of what I apprehend is one thing, while my belief about certain aspects related to Him is a wholly different thing.

It is impossible for the mind to receive a truth it does not understand and it is impossible for it to reject a truth it does not understand. By the same token one cannot believe a thing, nor disbelieve it until he understands it. One neither believes or disbelieves what is stated in a tongue unknown to him.

THE HONEST HEART

At this juncture I would like to inject a thought which will immediately commend itself to every rational person. It is that every honest heart will at once embrace and adopt all known truth. By the term “honest heart” I refer to a mind that is free from prejudice and bias and which is not motivated by personal advantage or profit. Such a mind is influenced by a love for truth as truth and, therefore, accepts truth because it is truth.

It is impossible for one who loves truth because it is truth, to reject any truth when it becomes known unto him. All truth is harmonious and consistent. One truth cannot contradict another truth. Truth is not affected by time or place. One may not have learned many truths but if he believes and adopts the truths he has learned because they are truth, he will embrace other truths as they are disclosed and he discovers them to be truth.

The faith that saves does not require that one understand all truths but it does demand that one understand and accept the great underlying truth of the Christian calling, that Jesus of Nazareth is the Son of God and the Lord of life, and is, by His own testimony, the Way, the Truth and the Life. Surrender unto Him is the hope of salvation but the commitment unto One who is the truth implies that he who surrenders will accept all truths as he comes to know them. The faith which brings life begins with acceptance of a truth, and the life of faith must continue to be nurtured by acceptance of truth so long as the mind is rational and responsible.

With this much before us we are prepared to examine the disbelief that will damn one. I hold that the nature of the disbelief that damns can only be understood in the light of the faith that saves. This will account for my lengthy preliminary.

Unbelief is not ignorance of truth. Ignorance is simply lack of knowledge. It may be either voluntary or involuntary. Involuntary ignorance is never a sin and cannot be. It is not a deliberate act for one in the darkness of the night to say that he cannot see an object. The eye can only respond to light. Where there is no light available one is not responsible for lack of vision. Voluntary ignorance is a sin and it may be occasioned by unbelief, but the unbelief which acts as a cause and the ignorance which results, although related, are not the same.

The unbelief which damns is not simply absence of faith. One may hear a proposition and because of imbecility of reasoning powers or slowness of perception be unable to develop a firm conviction related to it, and still not be guilty of unbelief. One may be thick-skulled without being hard-headed. Absence of faith is a mere vacuum, an unreality, and no one will be eternally doomed because of that which is insubstantial.

INTELLECTUAL DOUBT

I now approach an aspect of this discussion in which I must risk my reputation as a believer in order to elucidate what I conceive of as the truth about unbelief. I am fully aware that in doing so, I may lay myself open to attack and calumny, but I am firmly committed to truth as I apprehend it, and any statement of truth requires personal risk. Just as faith is not an intellectual state, because all intellectual states are involuntary and passive, so unbelief is not intellectual skepticism. No honest intellectual doubt or distrust is the unbelief that damns.

Just as one may have an intellectual faith that will not save because it is involuntary and inactive, so he may have an intellectual doubt or skepticism which will not damn because it is involuntary and inactive. Such an intellectual state has no moral character, for moral character cannot be predicated of anything that is involuntary and passive. It will not of itself sever one from God because it is not the result of choice or election. One might be more true to himself with an honest doubt than with a dishonest profession of faith. It was Tennyson who wrote

There lives more faith in honest doubt,

Believe me, than in half the creeds.

For several years I have been trying in forums to help my brethren differentiate between theoretic or intellectual doubt of a proposition and disbelief of it. Thus far I have had no success and I am not too optimistic about my present attempt. But I keep on in the hope that the light will eventually break through and we will allow the arms of fellowship to embrace those who dearly love Jesus even while they struggle with inner qualms. Wrestling with one's self is not necessarily fighting against God. I have learned that those who are so cocksure, are generally more cocky than they are sure!

I have no doubt that disbelief will damn but I have no inclination to augment the ranks by damning in advance those who are straining to see through blurred vision. I am convinced that we have driven some to hell whom we should have led to the Divine Optometrist, and if we don't repent we may meet in hell. We'll have no trouble in recognizing them with our perfect vision.

To make a long story a little shorter, the unbelief which the Bible calls a sin is an act of the will. It is voluntary and deliberate. It is the rejection of truth. It is closing the eyes against the light. It is refusal to see. Just as there must be a revelation of the will of God before there can be faith, so there must be a revelation before there can be unbelief. Belief and unbelief are the actions of the will in reaction to the same testimony. As there can be no belief further than there is light, there can be no unbelief further than there is light.

Where the gospel has never been heard there is no unbelief of the gospel as there is no belief of it. There is ignorance of the gospel for there could be nothing else where the gospel has never penetrated. But there is no indication that God will damn those who have not heard and do not know. Not everyone is rebellious. Some simply have not heard.

I am told that Jesus said, "No man cometh unto the Father but by me." I believe that! The Father has committed all things into the hands of the Son. Any person who is saved will be saved by the merit of the sacrifice of Jesus. This is true of those who lived and died before the cross. It is true of infants and imbeciles. It will be true of those who never hear the Good News if they are saved at all. Jesus is the only access to the Father. The blood of Jesus is the atonement for the whole world and those who are accepted because they are not responsible come in under the blood as does every responsible person who is saved!

I am then asked why we should take the gospel to the heathen if they may be saved without it. I always feel sorry for those who ask this question. They only reveal how narrow and limited and circumscribed is their view of God's purpose through the gospel. They regard Christianity as a fire department rescue squad whose members can sit around the engine house playing checkers until an apartment house catches on fire, whereupon they must rush in and save the occupants from the flames.

There is a great deal more to Christianity than keeping people out of hell. It also involves keeping hell out of people. "Godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." Christianity is not like a life insurance policy from which one only benefits by dying. There are tremendous dividends and values in this life also. We share in "all this and heaven too."

I am in favor of taking the blessed Joy Message to the whole world! I pray that all who hear it will heed it and gain the Joy! But I do not feel that God has to damn all whom we do not reach in order to save some of those whom we do. I rejoice that His grace has touched me in my weakness and ignorance and I'll praise His holy name for a glorious salvation wrought in behalf of that mighty host "which no man can number." I've quit trying to count them!

Restoring a Movement

Mission Messenger (October 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

Thoughtful men and women who are members of the community of saints planted by Jesus Christ as a result of his personal visit to our planet are deeply concerned with the fact that the proportion of those who acknowledge Him as Lord is a constantly receding one. Not only are they a minority group, but they are a shrinking minority. The birth boom, or population explosion, adds to the teeming millions who walk the surface of our troubled earth, and increases the gap between the few who know Jesus as Lord and the many who do not.

The Christian witness is hampered by the divisions among those who seek to lift it up, and the community which should be an example of unity and peace to a frightened world, presents a picture of discord and strife. Indeed, those who shared a relative degree of harmonious cooperation as pagans are often converted into warring clans when rival “Christian” parties move into their territory.

Recognition of the futility of seeking to unite men in Christ by a community militant against itself has challenged sincere men in all generations to search for a means of healing the breaches so that all disciples of Christ could engage in a united testimony to the power of the Prince of peace. One ever-recurring proposal has been to leapfrog over the existing sects and schisms, and by a mighty act of will, return to the primitive order of things, as announced by the apostles, as special ambassadors of Christ. Other suggestions have also been put forward, but every century has produced its restoration movements.

In our own nation, since its inception, numerous such movements have flourished. Most of them have been imported, and a number of them have borne the stamp of their land of origin. The majority of the readers of this paper are heirs of a movement indigenous to this New World, although directly sparked by Presbyterians of Scotch and Irish descent. Since such movements originate in reaction and revolution, they generally gravitate into other sects with their own institutions, organizations and vested interests. The search for truth gives way to the defense of traditional positions, and adherents fragment into parties, thus helping to intensify the very situation which the movement was created to alleviate.

It is the history of such movements that they generally are regarded as outcasts by the sectarian Establishment, and this helps to contribute both to rigidity of position and to frenzied effort, much of which is directed toward proselytization.

The result is that numerically they become a force with which to reckon, and eventually gain social recognition as a result of decades of improvement of their distinctive educational institutions, and the growing magnitude and location of their architectural structures.

For awhile, probably as a result of an institutional adolescence, every restoration movement seeks to attain the dignity and age denied it by the cold facts of history through direct identification with the primitive company of witnesses. On the cornerstones of edifices will be chiseled such inscriptions as "Established in 33 A.D." or "Primitive Baptist Church." The movement thereupon ceases to be a movement and becomes a monument. It has arrived and all others have departed!

Each ascending rung of the social ladder brings a new stratum to influence. The little frame building on the other side of the tracks with its appeal to the economically and culturally deprived gives way to the attractive brick edifice in affluent suburbia. Those things which were once condemned as evidence of pride—rugs, kitchens, air-conditioning, educational buildings—become a part of the modern structure. The ritual undergoes a transformation to conform to the needs of young executives and their families.

Although our brethren bitterly deny it, they have developed into another sect, and being one of the newer sects they are resentful of those which have grown older and whose sectarian peculiarities have come to mean less to them. One of the very first symptoms of sectism is exclusivism. A sect creates its own little world and equates it with God's big one. God moves and works only within and through the sect, as they view it. He is limited, hampered and restrained by the indifference of the sect. Members must be cajoled, driven and implored to become active so that God will not fail. It never occurs to members of a sect that "God is able of these stones to raise up children." God is powerless without the party!

Of course, no sect ever likes to think of itself as such, for there is a sort of subtle relationship of the term with Pharisees and Sadducees with whom our Lord had some rather stirring encounters. Various subterfuges are proposed to distinguish between "the Lord's church" (consisting of the chosen ones, ourselves) and "other churches" (made up of the rejected). One rather childish little trick is to spell their titles with a capital "C" (Church of God, Church of the Nazarene, etc.) while spelling ours with a lower case "c" (churches of Christ). The inference is that we are apostolic while others are apostate. We are called in; they are cast out!

The fact is that regardless of how we spell it, we have adopted "Church of Christ" as a distinctive title, and since “denominate” simply means to name, we have accepted an exclusive designation and we are a denomination. To say this in print makes one very unpopular. Each of our two dozen parties thinks all of the others are sectarian, and this is quite frequently implied in their respective journals, but each always excludes its own party from the accusation. The thing that strikes home to all is when one like myself, without intended rancor and simply as a statement of fact, points out that we have sectarianized the whole restoration movement. We have even made the tragic error of equating a movement with the kingdom of heaven. All of us are caught up in the same human predicament. Our real hope lies in the fact that one need not be a sectarian to be in a sect, and we will be saved as individuals, and not as a mass.

I think that history will prove that no sect ever returns to a movement status. Its vested interests will not allow it to do so. We would like to believe that the Spirit of God could prove that this doctrine of sectarian continuity and uniformity is not unalterable and that “the law of sectarian progression” can have one exception. I hold that nothing else could make the impact on a twentieth century world, sick and tired of its own sectarianism, as to see a sect reverse its trend and recapture its pre-sectarian spirit and once again become a movement. In our own case this would mean a renewal through recovery of the concepts and ideals which launched the movement.

Of course, at this juncture, some will at once interpose that they are not interested in going back to the beginning of a movement, and their concern is to go back to Jerusalem and restore the church. But there is one fly in this ointment. Those who say this actually think they have already restored the church. They are it! Thus, they have ceased to be a movement among Christians, for there are no Christians outside of the party. The only moving that can be done is toward them. To be called out of the world is to become a member of “The Church of Christ.” If every sincere person could start with their presuppositions, accept the infallibility of their interpretations, and unquestionably surrender his right to examine the scriptures for himself, some degree of uniformity could be achieved, and “The Church of Christ” could unite all believers under its authoritarian canopy. But since such conditions will be resisted by thinking men who will not surrender their freedom, we tend only to confuse and clutter up the theological landscape with our parties. What would we need to accept and advocate to return to our original aim? Permit us to suggest a few items of importance.

1. We must once more become a unity-oriented people, dedicated to an active and aggressive attempt to answer the prayer of Jesus for all who believe in Him through the apostolic proclamation. This means a calculated renunciation of the philosophy of division among God’s children as a means of proving fidelity to God.

Alexander Campbell described the movement which was launched in Washington, Pennsylvania, in 1809, as “a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects.” To revive this project we must again recognize that there are Christians in the sects, a thing which was never questioned by the restoration pioneers. We must move among the sects as did Alexander Campbell who spoke in all kinds of sectarian edifices, and in a manner devoid of arrogance or unnecessary offense we must make our plea known and felt by all who “sigh over Jerusalem.”

2. We must again affirm that “the Church of Christ upon earth is essentially, intentionally and constitutionally one,” as did Thomas Campbell in the first proposition of the “Declaration and Address,” and we must understand the meaning and implication of each of these terms. We must distinguish between the “Church of Christ” as here mentioned and the modern party which has appropriated the words as an exclusive title. When Mr. Campbell penned these words he was still a Presbyterian and there was no group known to him which was meeting behind a signboard with this designation. Indeed, when the reformers were driven to become a separated group there was long and anxious discussion of how they should be designated.

The church of Christ is the universal community consisting of all of the saints. Every saved person upon earth is in it. Many of these have allowed themselves to become allied with parties and sects. They do not grasp the glory attached to guarding the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. We must move among them in the irenic attitude manifested by Thomas Campbell, who wrote, “We would also desire to adopt and recommend such measures as would give rest to our brethren throughout all the churches— as would restore unity, peace and purity to the whole church of God.” At the time this was written, the phrase “all the churches,” did not include separatist parties called “Church of Christ” or “Christian Church,” nor did the author dream that in the future such organizations would summon his words to defend a partisan existence or to justify rival religious clans.

3. We must make a clear distinction between the divine revelation and human interpretation of it. Revelation is what God said, interpretation is what we think he meant by what he said. We cannot make what we think the basis of another’s loyalty for he also has the same right as ourselves to read and to think. Every child of God in surrendering to the lordship of Jesus over his life, thereby pledges himself to be bound by the doctrine of God’s word as he comes to understand it, but no one can formally bind that doctrine upon him beyond his personal knowledge and apprehension. And our deductions cannot be made tests of fellowship since they are not conditions of entrance into Christ, but are rather related to growth which is always gradual and by stages. In one of the most perceptive statements I have ever read Thomas Campbell put it thus:

That although inferences and deductions from Scripture premises, when fairly inferred, may be called the doctrine of God’s holy word, yet are they not formally binding upon the consciences of Christians further than they perceive the connection, and evidently see that they are so, for their faith must not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power and veracity of God. Therefore no such deductions can be made terms of communion, but properly do belong to the after and progressive edification of the Church.

We can never be a genuine movement for unity across the whole Christian spectrum so long as we postulate that oneness depends upon attainment to the same level or degree of knowledge. Each party or sect will attempt to establish its own plateau as the intellectual height to which all must climb to be acceptable as a brother without error. Each will accuse those upon plateaus above as making laws where God has not made them, and those below as being liberal and loose in their thinking. The irreducible minimum of knowledge in every case will be the deductions of the faction woven into their unwritten creed. The restoration trailbreakers saw this and Mr. Campbell wrote as follows:

That although doctrinal exhibitions of the great system of Divine truths and defensive testimonies, in opposition to prevailing errors, be highly expedient, and the more full and explicit they be for those purposes the better; yet, as these must be, in a great measure, the effect of human reasoning, and of course must contain many inferential truths, they ought not to be made terms of Christian communion, unless we suppose, what is contrary to fact, that none have a right to the communion of the Church, but such as possess a very clear and decisive judgment, or are come to a very high degree of doctrinal information; whereas the Church from the beginning did, and ever will, consist of little children and young men, as well as fathers.

It is my conviction that the “Church of Christ” projecting the image of simply another sect, as it now does in most places, will have no unifying effect upon a divided Christendom. Its preachers dare not even participate in ecumenical dialogue forums and are often restricted from association with other parties growing out of the restoration movement. They are helplessly entangled in an authoritarian web woven by editors and scholastic administrators, doomed to talk only to themselves through fear of financial loss or other reprisal.

But free men who have grown up in this background, and have caught the real vision of the restoration ideal, while extricating themselves from the party machinery, can again assert their right and intention to be Christians and Christians only. As such they can spark a movement which will help the whole Christian framework to reconsider the values accruing from renewal through recovery of the apostolic proclamation, purpose and power. As a sect we will do nothing but divide Christians into factions; as a movement we may once again become “a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects.” Then it can be said again, as it was aptly stated in 1809:

We are also of opinion that as the Divine word is equally binding upon all, so all lie under an equal obligation to be bound by it and it alone, and not by any human interpretation of it; and that, therefore, no man has a right to judge his brother except in so far as he manifestly violates the express letter of the law— that every such judgment is an express violation of the law of Christ, a daring usurpation of his throne, and a gross intrusion upon rights and liberties of his subjects.

Church of the Firstborn

Mission Messenger (November 1967)

Volume 29

The writer of the Hebrews informs those with whom God deals as with sons (12:7) that they have come “to the general assembly and church of the firstborn which are written in heaven” (12:23). In my simpler days when I had only the King James Version I misunderstood and misapplied that statement. That was at the time when we indulged in the mistaken notion that the saints of God had to have a corporate title by which the Lord would be able to recognize those who were His, and we were anxious, above all else, to justify our signboards.

It was easy to prove that Jesus was “the firstborn.” All one had to do was to flip the Bible open to Colossians 1:18, and read, “And he is the head of the body, the church, who is the beginning, the firstborn from the dead.” Since Christ was the firstborn, the church of the firstborn was “the Church of Christ.” I suppose I ought to have been a little suspicious because of the word are— “the firstborn which are written in heaven.” But we were more concerned about being right than about being grammatical, and nothing was said about this in the sermon outline book we had. I probably did not get beyond the word “firstborn” since the rest of it was not essential to my argument. Back in those days we were always “presenting an argument.”

I admit to being a little ashamed of my former ignorance, but I am thankful that I have lived long enough to correct some of my errors. It helped a lot when I learned that “Christ” was not the name of the incarnate Son, but his “office.” He is Jesus the Christ! So to “name the church after Him” you’d at least have to call it the “Church of Jesus.” You wouldn’t call the bride of Mr. Jones the butcher, “Mrs. Butcher.”

It also helped when I learned that “the firstborn which are written in heaven” are the saints whose names are enrolled, registered and inscribed in the throne city of the Great King. The Authentic Version reads, “the gathering of the firstborn who are registered in heaven.” The New English Version reads, “the assembly of the firstborn citizens of heaven.” The Concordant Literal Version says, “the ecclesia of the firstborn, registered in the heavens.”

The firstborn are God’s children. They are so designated because God claimed the firstborn of Israel as His own. They were His by right of adoption. He sanctified them unto Himself (Numbers 8:17). The Hebrews understood this so the writer had to make no explanation. The firstborn consisted of the sanctified ones, the heirs of God. The names of all of these are found in the Lamb’s book of life. They are written down in glory!

All of that is interesting but it is not what I want to discuss here. The church consists of all those whom God has called and who have responded unto that call. Only God can call men out of sin and self, and every man upon the face of the earth who has heard that call and denied himself to take up his cross and follow Jesus is in the church of God.

When the word “church” is used in a universal sense, if used properly and scripturally, it must embrace every saved person in the universe. Every man on earth who has been born again, who has been washed, sanctified, and justified in the name of the Lord Jesus and by the Spirit of our God, is a part of the church. To use such terms as “the Lord’s church,” with a view to excluding many (or any) of the Lord's people, is to speak unadvisedly with the lips and those who do it "understand neither what they say, nor whereof they affirm."

When the word "church" is employed to designate the saints in a given city area it must include every saint of God in that geographical division. The church of God in Saint Louis includes every individual in that metropolitan complex who has been called into his kingdom and glory and who has the seal of God in his forehead. This is true in spite of division, schism, ignorance, race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Regardless of what men may call them, or of what (in their ignorance) they may designate themselves, if they have thrown themselves upon the mercy of God, fled to Jesus for rest, washed their garments in the crimson flood that flowed from Immanuel's veins and received the adoption of sons, they are in the church which God purchased with the blood of His own (Son).

This is very difficult for most of us to realize and even more difficult for many to openly affirm. In our sectarian attitudes with their creedal barriers and legalistic lines, carefully drawn and meticulously defined, it is easy to equate the limits of God's grace with the boundaries of our acceptance. But God is not obligated to welcome only those we receive; instead, we are obligated to welcome all whom He receives. That He is willing to receive some rather pitiable and unworthy characters most of us are living testimony. The quality of grace in rescuing unwholesome personalities should never be doubted by those of us who have mirrors and can glance into them.

We are always in danger of assuming that the party, faction or sect, with which we are affiliated is "the church." I am not sure just how the angels regard the antics of the heirs of salvation to whom they minister. It could be that they get quite a "kick" out of some of the things we say with such seriousness, and they must smile frequently at how little we think the church is, as compared to how big and majestic they know it really is. It's a good thing our brethren do not travel around with the angels and visit some of the saints with whom the angels visit. If they did there would be a lot of angels haled up before the elders and "withdrawn from" for fraternizing with folks who are not members of the loyal church.

Every party, with few exceptions, has its membership rosters, and the sum total of these rosters of "faithful congregations" in each instance, constitutes "the brotherhood." A good many factions also have directories of "loyal congregations" where "the Lord's church" meets, so that those on vacation will not be misled by a signboard and get into a meeting of "apostates." The peculiar thing is that no two directories have "the Lord's church" meeting at the same places, and if you happen to get the wrong directory you are liable to spend your entire vacation "worshiping with false brethren" and never know it until you get back home and invite the preacher who is holding your fall meeting out to dinner. The safest thing to do is to write to the party headquarters before you start and the editor there can check your itinerary and cross off all of the doubtful points. One such headquarters has recently announced, "When a request is made for free information or assistance, please enclose a self-addressed, stamped envelope." Remember that!

About the only time all of the congregations are counted worthy and lumped off together is when we want to leave the impression on our religious neighbors that we are growing like weeds in the cornfield. The particular segment of the religious spectrum with which I am identified recently received newspaper publicity as "the fastest growing religious group in the United States." If the reporter who wrote that really knew us he would have used the plural for "group."

It was affirmed that our membership now stands at 2,350,000. Brethren of reputation hang their heads when this figure is given. They are afraid it is padded like a company expense account. Of course, no one knows how many people there are enrolled with congregations which make a test of fellowship out of the use of instrumental music. That is about the only common denominator of the two dozen kinds of baptized believers in “the fastest growing religious group.” It is astonishing that those who cannot sit together at the Lord’s table can meet together in an estimated census table.

One Texas Christian University professor thinks the number was arrived at by an editor in the southland who multiplied his subscription list by the size of his hat, and multiplied the total received by the number of divisions within our ranks. I think he was being a little facetious, because some of the professors at Texas Christian should not be taken too seriously!

I just do not think that any person on earth can number the Lord’s people. He knows who they are and that is enough for me. “God has laid a foundation, and it stands firm with this inscription: ‘The Lord knows his own.’” I do not doubt that a sect or faction can number its adherents and tell who is “on the books.” But no party contains all of God’s beloved— no party! That includes the one I am in! Jesus did not suffer to become the chief of a clan nor die to become the prince of a party. He is the head of the whole body and Lord of the whole church!

When the venerable envoy, John, was in exile upon Patmos he looked over and saw a vast throng, which no one could count, from every nation, of all tribes, peoples and languages. They were identified by a member of the heavenly presbytery as “the men who have passed through the great ordeal; they have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.” All of these were from the earth and if no man could count them in heaven after they arrived, there is no use of any one trying it here before they leave. I don’t think one’s mathematical powers are any greater in Tennessee than they will be in heaven. The truth of it is that the wonderful family of God is greater than any faction on earth, and mightier than all of them put together.

The brotherhood of which I am a part is as vast as God's redemptive love reaching down and receiving helpless humanity unto himself. The church of my allegiance is as great as the citizenry of the kingdom of God. I am a kindred soul with every consecrated believer whose name is enrolled in heaven. There is only one body and it embraces every precious soul linked to the head by the Holy Spirit, and by that same Spirit I am joined to all who are in him— and I do mean all! You can no more confine the church of the firstborn ones to party-structures, programs, houses and signboards than you can capture the Holy Spirit in a box and slam the lid shut.

Thoughts on Repentance

Mission Messenger (November 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

In the letter of Paul to the Romans we are treated to an incidental revelation of the nature of repentance and its antecedents, and impenitence and its consequences, which is very enlightening. We shall quote from the New English Bible. “Or do you think lightly of his wealth of kindness, of tolerance, and of patience, without recognizing that God’s kindness is meant to lead you to a change of heart. In the rigid obstinacy of your heart you are laying up for yourself a store of retribution for the day of retribution when God’s just judgment will be revealed, and he will pay every man for what he has done” (2:4, 5).

The word translated “change of heart,” rendered “repentance” in other versions, means literally to “take an after view,” and then to change the mind as the result of taking a second view of the subject. The subject is sin and its effect upon one’s character and destiny. One must be motivated to take a rational view of sin since his passions, emotions and inclinations are keyed to the enjoyment of its pleasure. All sin is an offence against the majesty of God, and only his kindness, tolerance and patience, operate to permit a guilty sinner to live.

The individual who is blinded intellectually by lust will not recognize the purpose of divine kindness to the transgressor, but those who do recognize it will readily see that it is intended to direct or guide them to a change of heart. This change is everywhere represented as one of moral character. This means it is not a mere state of intellect. It is not a conviction of sin, a consciousness of guilt, or a recognition and fear of retribution. All of these are passive states of the mind and can never have moral character attributed to them. All involuntary states of mind are passive and moral character cannot be postulated of a passive state.

For the same reason repentance is not a mere reaction of the sensibility. It is not a feeling or an emotion. It is not sorrow for wrongdoing, nor regret for a sinful act, nor remorse for hurtful conduct. It is not grief for the consequences of sin either to oneself or to another victim. These feelings and emotions may operate to impel one to take a second view of life and thus may be secondary causes leading to repentance but they are not of themselves repentance. You cannot command a feeling or an emotion.

Repentance is an act of volition, a positive phenomenon of the will. It represents a deliberate choice involving a complete change of purpose and intention, a choice made in the full light of intelligence. Since choice has to do with the expression of a preference, and all life can be summed up in two terms—selfishness and selflessness—repentance is an act of turning from the former to the latter. But “selflessness” must not be regarded as a mere negation of self. It is rather a surrender of the self to Jesus Christ as Lord. Repentance involves the abasement of self as unworthy, the indictment of self at the bar of conscience, and the consequent embracing by the heart of God and His ruling majesty.

While this is true, it must be remembered that in the rational being, every faculty is related. It is this relationship which is broken up when one becomes irrational, so that the irrational person may demonstrate emotions incongruent with circumstances and may be wholly incapable of exercising the will. Thus, with the rational person the intellect weighs the nature and result of the life of sin, and the sensibility registers a deep remorse and consciousness of guilt, and these impel the will to action so that the heart is changed as to the aim, purpose and duration of life.

Because of the involvement of the sensibility the penitent loathes sin. It is abhorrent because of what it does to his own personality and to the world of mankind. He hates sin because it is sin, and because it creates a battlefield within upon which he is at war with himself and God. When he realizes his helplessness and the utter futility of trying to win the conflict by himself, and gives himself in complete surrender to Christ through full confidence that God is able to deliver him, he does not make a truce with sin, but he makes peace with God.

Conscious of the fact that God can declare or pronounce him justified, not because he is no sinner, but precisely because he is one, he transfers his allegiance. And this last term is probably the best that we can do in expressing what is meant by the phrase "believe in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ." The remorseful sinner places himself, through full and unreserved commitment of self, in Him, where sin is not imputed or counted unto self, for he has no self. Self has been crucified. Such a person is dead and his life is hid with Christ in God. His condition is described in Romans 5:1, "Therefore, now, that we have been justified through faith, let us continue at peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we have been allowed to enter the sphere of God's grace."

Now let me say a few words about impenitence which is also generally misunderstood and confused with other states and conditions as is repentance. Our original text uses the expression, "rigid obstinacy of your heart," and this is a good rendering. Throughout God's entire word impenitence is looked upon as a frightful sin and fraught with terrible consequences. But a great many people are charged with impenitence who are ignorant or apathetic, or who seek to justify themselves in their present state. Such self-justification may be a fruit of impenitence, but it is not impenitence of itself.

Impenitence is not the love of sin. It is not a desire for sin, nor a craving after it. It is not an involuntary passion which cries and clamors for gratification. Rather, it is an act of the will, a voluntary and deliberate choice to pursue one's course, taken in full light of the consequences. This last is very important, for just as one must have light in which to view his true condition and be motivated to repentance, so he must have light against which he deliberately closes his inner eyes to be impenitent. Repentance and impenitence are the reactions of the heart taken in the light which illuminates and reveals the true state of the sinner.

Impenitence is rooted in the worship of self. It deposes God and drives Him from the throne-room of the heart. It installs self as the usurper of the divine prerogatives and privileges and insists that every wish of this tyrant be regarded as sovereign. Impenitence is not passive. It is not simply inattention to sin or indifference to its consequences. But it is an active, obstinate, belligerent state of the will. It is a grim, unyielding and resolute determination to be served at all costs, not from a love of sin, but because of the gratification which is derived from it. Sin is simply the lackey who does the bidding of Self, and it is no more loved than any other menial servant would be.

A knowledge of these facts will at once enable us to see why impenitence is denounced with such stringent woes in the sacred oracles. When the claims of God are presented to the mind and are weighed by the mental powers, the heart must take action in the light of these claims. It must either throw open the door to the Lord of life or begin immediately to strengthen the bars and locks to prevent his entrance.

It is this deliberate attempt to barricade the door from within which is called impenitence. The excuses which are voiced and the cavils at truth which are indulged, are not impenitence. They are the articles of furniture which impenitence piles against the door. And we need to remember that we may demolish the furniture without touching the occupant.

There is much more we would like to say and a great deal more which needs to be said upon this subject, but time and space will not permit of our saying it at this time. We shall close with the scriptural statement as to the fate which the impenitent must expect.

“In the rigid obstinacy of your heart you are laying up for yourself a store of retribution, when God’s just judgment will be revealed, and he will pay every man for what he has done . . . For those who are governed by selfish ambition, who refuse obedience to the truth and take wrong for their guide, there will be fury of retribution. There will be grinding misery for every human being who is an evil-doer, for the Jew first and for the Greek also.” Let us renounce all selfish ambition.

Speaking Unto Edification

Mission Messenger (November 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

Few readers of this journal would argue against the assertion in some of the more venerable creeds that the chief aim of man is to glorify God, yet all of us recognize that in our corporate expression of praise we have an equally obvious responsibility to edify the saints. Indeed, in the only real description of the activities of the primitive saints when assembled, it is distinctly said, “Let all things be done unto edifying” (1 Corinthians 14:26).

This admonition occurs in a setting which deals primarily with the exercise of spiritual gifts, and because of the abuse of such gifts. On the one hand the disciples were in danger of creating the impression upon outsiders who dropped in that they had mistaken the address and ended up in the insane asylum. At the same time the brethren were not being properly nurtured and strengthened, although admittedly there was a lot of excitement going on. It was like forgetting to feed the baby during a tornado and for three or four days afterwards. If there was a problem in those days when the Holy Spirit imparted special gifts through imposition of apostolic hands, we have no less a problem now that we are dependent upon natural gifts and abilities. There is every reason to believe that great congregations assemble regularly and go through a ritual or liturgy and return home with no idea of entering combat duty. It is a little like training army inductees by taking them regularly to symphony concerts. They may be pacified but they will not be edified.

There was a sense of urgency about the congregating of those first century followers of the Messiah. All of them knew that on the morrow they might be arrested and thrown into a dungeon, or immediately deported to suffer banishment on some far-off island. It was essential that in the corporate fellowship they should find that inner fortitude which would sustain them through long periods of suffering and privation until the final slumber brought peace. Every tissue of their spiritual being longed for the water of life, and for the bread of life.

In such circumstances, it is well to note what constituted the recommendation of the Spirit as to the aim and purpose of addressing the saints. First, let us remember that the gift of prophecy was to be preferred above the other spiritual gifts (1 Corinthians 14:1). The reason for this is stated. The man who spoke in another tongue contributed nothing of value to the auditors, “for no man understandeth him” (verse 2). “But he that prophesieth speaketh unto men to edification, exhortation and comfort.”

Edification, exhortation, comfort— what is involved in these? Our word “edify” comes from the Latin. In the dim past it was a combined form of aedes, a fireplace; and ficare, to make. Men tended to make their abodes where they constructed their fire rings, and so eventually the word came to mean “a building or house.”

Of course Paul used the word oikodome which means “to build a house.” To edify means to build up, and in its spiritual usage has to do with the promotion of spiritual growth. The apostle shows his concern for the development of the saints by pointing out that any message conveyed must be translated into the language of the people “that the church may receive edifying.”

In these days of theological gobbledy-gook and ecclesiastical jargon some preachers can talk English and still speak in an unknown tongue. Jesus did not say, “Feed my giraffes,” but “Feed my sheep.” To do this one needs to throw the fodder down and not put it into orbit.

Just as one cannot grow physically upon what he cannot digest, so he cannot develop spiritual strength from that which he does not assimilate. The word of God must be translated into life, for this is one version no one can oppose. The man who does the most good for the disciples is the one who trains them to stand upon their own feet. “Even so ye, forasmuch as ye are zealous of spiritual gifts, seek that ye may excel to the edifying of the church” (1 Corinthians 14:12).

The word “exhortation” is from a term which originally meant to call to a person, and then came to mean to call on, or entreat one to exert an effort. We instruct those who do not know, and exhort those who do. Thus exhortation has to do with incitation or motivation to the fulfillment of a task.

Edification is the diet table for God’s athletes, exhortation is the cheering section while they are in the race. Edification is the drill in the manual of arms for the Christian soldiers, exhortation is the call of the officers to attack the foe. The first is involved in getting what is needed, the second is getting involved where one is needed.

The term “comfort” is from para-muthia, which occurs only this once in the scriptures. Para means near, and muthos means speech. To comfort literally means to speak closely to one, to directly console or encourage him. We make a mistake when we confuse comfort with a kind of sticky or sickly sentimentality. We’ve abused the word “comfortable” until it is devoid of its original meaning. The word is from fortis, which is found in such words as fortress, or fortify. It has to do with strength and defence.

Edify means to build up, exhort means to stir up, and comfort means to cheer up. W. E. Vine says, “Edification develops the character; encouragement stimulates the will; consolation strengthens the spirit.” And the Holy Spirit indicates that this should be the aim of the assembled saints.

The Denouement

Mission Messenger (November 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

Christianity brought a living hope to a tired and jaded world. This may be one of the chief factors in its eager acceptance by slaves and social outcasts. The message of the resurrection thrilled the hearts of those whose lives and earthly lots were drab and dreary.

The threefold basis of our hope seems to be summed up in Colossians 3:4, "When Christ, who is our life shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory." Christ is our life. He will appear. We will appear with him. A realization of these facts transformed the lives of the primitive disciples.

It is most interesting to note the translation of this passage by J. B. Phillips, who has it, "One day, Christ, the secret center of our lives, will show himself openly, and you will share in that magnificent denouement." This final word, borrowed from the French, has puzzled many readers, yet it is probable that it is the very best term available for portraying the real meaning involved.

I like the translation of Phillips at this point. The Christian life is the Christ-centered life. He is the hub around which all else revolves. Every relationship is governed by Him. The world cannot see him in our heart but every thought, word and deed reflects his secret presence. The man in whom Christ dwells is a member of the new humanity. As far as the world is concerned he is already dead. His true life is hidden in God.

But it will not always be so, for Christ is destined to show himself openly. "To those who look for him, he will appear a second time, not this time to deal with sin, but to bring to full salvation those who eagerly await him" (Hebrews 9:28).

The faithful will share in "that magnificent denouement." This is from de, to undo or untie; and nodus, a knot. It referred to the final act of untying a knot, and thus came to mean, "the final revelation or occurrence which clarifies the nature and outcome of a plot." The coming of Jesus will make all else in God's great program for the universe fit into place. It is the key to all of the mysteries of life through the ages.

Those who do not eagerly await Jesus have no explanation for what is transpiring. Andre Maurois wrote, "The universe is indifferent. Who created it? Why are we here on this puny mud-heap spinning in infinite space? I have not the slightest idea, and I am quite convinced that no one has the slightest idea."

G. N. Clark, during his inauguration ceremonies at Cambridge, said "There is no secret and no plan in history to be discovered. I do not believe that any future consummation could make sense of all the irrationalities of preceding ages. If it could not explain them, still less could it justify them."

The beauty of the Way is that it is not a way of extinction but of resurrection. It is the way of the blessed hope, the glorious hope. I am convinced of the reality of the promises of God. I freely admit that I am on this earth as an exile and a foreigner. I long for a better country, a heavenly one. I want to share in the magnificent denouement. I am glad that I have caught the meaning of grace, or that it has caught me, for therein lies the only ground of my hope!

The Progress of Reform

Mission Messenger (December 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

“The good cause of the restoration of a pure speech and of the ancient institutions, I am happy to inform you, from our recent accounts up to the close of the last year, is plead with increasing success and prosperity in very many portions of this highly favored land.”

These were the words of Alexander Campbell written from Bethany, Virginia in February, 1838, and addressed to James Wallis in Great Britain. Mr. Campbell was writing about the impact of the restoration movement upon the divided forces of Christendom. Now, almost 130 years later, I can employ the same words to describe the influence of a growing movement for renewal upon the splintered and fragmented body of restoration heirs.

Almost ten years have gone by since I published the initial series of articles entitled, “Thoughts on Fellowship.” When these first appeared I was very unpopular. As was to be expected the original opposition came from members of the faction with which I had been identified and whose cause I had so often championed in public debate. I gave my attackers full space in the paper and published an uncensored version of all they wrote. The only objection I ever received was because I replied. The replies revealed that the factional spirit is unscriptural, vulnerable and wholly indefensible. For several years other groups kept silent, hoping that our pleas would die like every previous one had succumbed, while battering against the iron gates and stone walls of the partisan monasteries. But when chinks were made in the barricades an occasional knight sallied forth. A prominent theologian from Abilene Christian College chose as his field of combat the Gospel Advocate, and when I was forbidden the right to reply to him in its columns I published his article in full, and replied point by point in our little paper.

Then an editor in Texas was pressured into assailing me, but again I published all of his articles and my replies and even printed the whole correspondence exchange between us. These have now entered into the literature of the disciple brotherhood in bound volumes. Those of us who have grown up in the non-instrument wing of the shattered restoration movement know what happened in past years to those who dared to challenge men who “appeared to be somewhat.” The silence which now reigns in the papers with reference to the plea for renewal through recovery is more significant and portentous than many of the articles contained in them.

I would not want my readers to forget that I have repeatedly published an offer, and once a challenge, to appear on the platform of George Pepperdine College, Abilene Christian College, Harding College, David Lipscomb College, or Florida College, to present my views on fellowship, and submit to questioning by a blue ribbon panel selected by the authorities, or to grilling by the whole audience. To this very day a profound silence reigns. Not one word has been received from the administration of any of these institutions. The offer still remains in effect.

Perhaps the reason for the silence is found in the words of a Texas preacher who said, “If Carl Ketcherside ever speaks at the Abilene Christian College lectureship we’ll have a revolution on our hands, because three-fourths of our people in Texas already believe what he advocates. The difference is that he is not afraid to say it out loud.” Our brother is wholly correct in his last assertion and I trust that he is right on his estimate of sentiment.

In spite of attempted occasional boycott, insinuation and innuendo, the cause of reform is growing. This is seen in a score of happenings. For instance, brethren involved in building the most expensive edifice they have ever undertaken in the United States, no longer make a test of fellowship out of personal conviction concerning the use of instrumental music. They now share in “the fellowship of giving and receiving” with prominent leaders in the Christian Church. Meanwhile, editors of orthodox “Church of Christ” journals still urge their readers and congregations to contribute to the same project.

Some men from all of the parties can now engage freely in dialogue sessions across all lines, although those from centers such as Nashville still have to hedge themselves in with protective statements which can clear them with brethren back home in case of emergency. There are congregations in a number of areas now where brethren from various segments can exchange pulpits, and in which free men in the Christ are planning joint projects to exhibit openly that unity which transcends diversity of opinions and methods.

I find myself ever more frequently appearing in company with brethren of note on the platform. A good example was the last Southern Christian Convention which was arranged by our brethren in the Independent Christian Churches. A brother from Harding Graduate School (who has since transferred to Abilene Christian College) and myself, were speakers at the same meeting.

Even more revealing are the letters from students and faculty members in some of the colleges, and from preachers, who assure me of their prayers and best wishes. Many of these are not yet in a position to declare themselves publicly. This is not an exhibition of cowardice at all but a simple recognition that the tides of prejudice have not yet all ebbed out. I do not think it is necessary that they work as I do, and I think they are wise in being expedient.

The fact is that literally hundreds of brethren now realize that it was sinful to divide the precious family of our God over divergent views regarding instrumental music, the millennium, Herald of Truth, orphan homes, colleges, Bible classes, individual cups, etc. They will be happy when this motley horde of “issues” is returned to proper perspective. These men have no thought of changing their views on these matters, or of relinquishing their personal convictions, but they want to cease “playing God” with the brethren. They are sick and tired of having to perpetuate division which they did not perpetrate merely to stand in good with those whose unlovely dispositions have often been the real cause of division. Our thinking brethren everywhere are beginning to see that differences are simply concerns for discussion and not causes of division. They are problems in the fellowship and not problems of fellowship!

THOUGHTS ON FELLOWSHIP

It would seem appropriate for me to once more suggest some of the ideas I have advanced concerning fellowship. In order to facilitate replies by those who are so inclined, I will number the various points.

1. The Greek word for fellowship is koinonia, and there is no single English word which is its exact equivalent. It connotes mutual sharing or joint participation, since it stems from the word koine, which means “common.” Koinonia refers to that which is held in common, and in the new covenant scriptures it is the sharing of the common life created by the indwelling Spirit of God. Every person on earth in whom the Spirit abides is in the fellowship with every other such person in the universe.

Thus it is called “the fellowship of the Spirit” (Phil. 2:1; 2 Cor. 13:14). Fellowship is not something we extend or withdraw, but it is a state into which we are called. “God is faithful by whom you were called into the fellowship of his Son, Jesus Christ our Lord” (1 Cor. 1:9). The New English Version gives the best translation, “What we have seen and heard we declare to you, so that you and we together may share in a common life, that life which we share with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ” (1 John 1:3).

2. Harmony is not essential to fellowship but is a goal of those who are in the fellowship. We do not achieve harmony in order to be in the fellowship, but because we are in the fellowship, we seek to achieve harmony. There is not a passage in the apostolic doctrine commanding harmony which was written to bring the saints into fellowship. Every such passage was written to those who were in the fellowship and because they were in it. We suggest that you study Philippians 2:1, 2; 1 Corinthians 1:9-13; and 2 Corinthians 13:11. We are not in the fellowship because we walk in peace, but we walk in peace because we are in the fellowship.

3. Fellowship is not the endorsement of another’s position or views. Fellowship is a state into which we are called by God through the Good News of Jesus Christ. We enter it by the proper response to that News. Every sincere believer who is immersed upon the basis of his trust that Jesus is God’s Son and the Messiah, is in the fellowship in spite of his ignorance or warped opinions about many other things. Endorsement is an act of individual will in which one approves or supports the opinions or acts of another when he agrees with or concurs in such opinions or acts.

We endorse a lot of things done by people with whom we are not in fellowship; we are in the fellowship with people who do a lot of things we cannot endorse. God certainly did not endorse a lot of things done by the saints in Corinth, but they were in his fellowship (1 Cor. 1:9).

In Galatians 2:9 Peter is said to have given the right hand of fellowship to Paul, but in verse 11, Paul withstood him to the face because he was to be blamed. I do not think that anyone would be so rash as to say that they were no longer in fellowship. No congregation of believers on this earth is composed of those who completely endorse one another's views, interpretations, or ideas. It is for this reason that each faction has to arbitrarily agree upon some item on which there must be agreement as a criterion of fellowship and acceptance. And whatever that thing is it becomes the creed of the party.

4. Fellowship is not contingent upon unanimity of opinion and has no real relation to it, although the twisted factional mentality seeks to establish such a relationship. The unity of the Spirit is based upon community, not conformity. The only unity attainable by thinking men is that of diversity. The unity of conformity must first reduce men to robots. It belongs to the wax museum and not to the temple of God. Jesus did not die for puppets nor allow himself to be murdered for manikins.

In Romans 14 we learn that there were varied opinions in the early church. These were not allowed to become the basis of rejection. "As for the man who is weak in faith, welcome him, but not for disputes over opinions" (verse 1). "One man believes he may eat anything, while the weak man eats only vegetables." Paul effectively spiked the creeping creedal conformity which has so often blossomed forth in all of its inglorious tendencies in modern Church of Christism. The entire chapter is a stirring apologetic for unity in diversity. It stands squarely athwart the path of every partisan journalist in our day.

In our time one who ate anything or everything would be called a sectarian or a liberal. The one who restricted himself solely to vegetables would be an anti, an extremist, or an ultra-conservative. To Paul, who rejected such asinine labels, they were children of the same Father or slaves of the same Master. "To his own master he stands or falls." It is ridiculous for one slave to try and throw out another whom he does not own because he will not eat meat— or because he insists on singing "Jesus is all the world to me," while someone else is pounding out the beat on a piano.

A considerable number of our brethren have been suffering from a Messiah complex, and they are anxious to save God from any undue worry, by taking care of as much of the final judgment as possible in advance. Every factional leader on earth begins by giving Jesus a shove and squeezing down in the throne as his authorized mouthpiece and representative. It is no problem to push the brethren around after you have shoved Jesus to one side. It will be a great day when all of us learn that Jesus has no prime ministers!

5. Equality in the attainment of spiritual knowledge is not the foundation of fellowship. This is obvious when one realizes that in spite of his ignorance he has been accepted into the fellowship of the Father and Son. Jesus would be very lonely if he eliminated all of his "brothers in error." If we must wait until our knowledge equals that of the Father before he can receive us into his fellowship we have a long period of detention on the outside. Fortunately God accepts some fairly superficial characters, as almost any good mirror will reveal, and the apostle says, "In a word, accept one another as Christ accepted us to the glory of God" (Romans 15:7).

The family of God consists of babes and children as well as young men and fathers. These who are born of the water and of the Spirit are not born in a state of maturity. Some of them develop rather slowly and some are dwarfed from malnutrition and from being beaten over the head by their guardians. God has some children who are deformed because of being hastened to delivery before the period of gestation was completed normally. Not all of the saints enjoy perfect vision.

We must not forget that the Christian life is a walk and we are not going to heaven in a clump or cluster. We are strung out along the highway, but it is not necessary that we keep up with one another. It is only necessary that we keep in the Way. If the trumpet sounds while we are crippling along because of our blisters, God will find us. His arm is not shortened that it cannot save!

Life in Christ is a growth and all growth demands change and alteration. Not all children reach the same height. Some of our brethren are following Procrustes instead of Jesus. That mythical highwayman set up a bed on the main road and forced every traveler to lie upon it. Those who were too long had their legs cut off; those who were too short were stretched to the required length by pulleys. The perceptive reader will not need to be told whose height was used as a criterion of measurement.

There was a considerable latitude in the primitive community of saints. Take Corinth for example. There were some of the brethren who did not know there was one God. "But not everyone knows this. There are some who have been so accustomed to idolatry that they even now eat this food with a sense of its heathen consecration." Others did not accept the idea of the resurrection. "How can some of you say there is no resurrection of the dead?" But Paul did not divide them into a "Resurrection Church of Christ" and an "Anti-Resurrection Church of Christ."

Instead, he said, "Of course we all 'have knowledge' as you say. This knowledge breeds conceit, it is love that builds. If anyone fancies that he knows, he knows nothing yet, in the true sense of knowing. But if a man loves, he is acknowledged by God." I sometimes wonder if Paul was rubbing it in on the "know-it-all" in the congregation, by pointing out that they claimed to know a lot, but they didn't even know how to treat brethren who differed with them, and that is about one of the first things God wants us to learn.

He did not tell the knowing brethren to separate from the ignorant Christians or to come out from among them as if they were pagans or unbelievers. His admonition was, “Mend your ways; take our appeal to heart; agree with one another; live in peace; and the God of love and peace will be with you.”

FOILING THE CRITICS

Some of my earlier critics freely predicted that I would merely create another faction and complicate matters by starting an anti-party party. I have been able to prove that they were not possessed of the gift of prophecy. There are several things which have contributed to this.

1. When I learned that the factional attitude which prevailed among the restoration heirs was a work of the flesh, a sin against God, and a sign of immaturity and carnality, I did not leave the brethren with whom I had been associated and go join another group. I simply repudiated all factionalism but I did it from where I was by accepting and welcoming all of my brethren. I stayed where I was and loved them where they were. I no longer recognize as valid any of the artificial walls which they had thrown up. I paid no further attention to the tests of union and communion devised by any group.

2. When I went among brethren I did so simply to share my thinking with them, and to share in their concepts. I did not seek to proselyte followers nor to persuade anyone to my way of thinking. I had already learned that I could love those who differed with me as much as I could those who concurred in my views and I did not worry about “lining them up.” To me, a Ketcherside party would be as disgraceful as any other. I never asked any person to alter his methods to pamper my personal feelings. I considered every invitation from sincere saints as a door opened unto me of the Spirit.

3. I urged every person who advanced in learning not to leave the brethren with whom he had always labored to go join the faction which had taught him a new truth. This would only serve to remove the leaven from where it was needed and transfer it to where it was not, and it would breed hatred and envy. There have been some instances where brethren felt they were driven out but I have steadfastly refused to urge them to form another faction.

If every person stays where he is the spread of factionalism will be stopped cold at its present level and that level will gradually decline under the benign influence of the Holy Spirit. One of the most gratifying things that has happened is to see men who have grown in knowledge beyond their factional constituency, remaining with the brethren who have supported them in the past.

4. Now there is a vast army of the concerned ones and these are distributed among all of our factions. They will act as leaven for peace and we shall within our generation see a tremendous change of attitude. Brethren will repudiate the false propaganda that purity of doctrine can only be maintained by separation from other brethren. Many will help to build bridges across the chasms which Satan has created. There are still pockets of partisan venom. There are some men who are purveyors of hate against brethren. There are journals whose editors confuse the partisan status quo with first century Christianity. Other editors ride the factional merry-go-round and try to wave first to one side and then to the other. But these will gradually forfeit any real influence and those papers which drum up issues so they can project themselves as the defenders of orthodoxy will soon be seen in their true light.

As for myself, I would have it plainly understood that I intend to make no test of fellowship out of either the pro or con of a position on instrumental music, centralized control, colleges, orphan homes, national radio and television programs, the right to own television sets, leavened bread, unleavened bread, the manner of breaking the bread, fermented wine, individual cups, prayer coverings for women, Bible classes, uninspired literature, foot-washing, speaking with tongues, or any other of the “issues” which periodically raise their disturbing heads and breathe their fetid breath in our faces. Our real problem is not with those who claim to speak in other tongues, but with preachers who claim to speak English and are still talking in unknown tongues.

I have a firm personal conviction on all of these things but I will not impose it by force or coercion upon others. I’ll express my view and listen to brethren who differ with me and go on my way rejoicing. If a man is good enough for God to receive he is not too bad for me to accept. I am sick and tired of our whole sad, sorry and gruesome sectarian mess. I never intend to be a party to its promotion again, so help me God. I shall never be used as a cat’s paw to pull partisan chestnuts out of the factional fire. And as Patrick Henry said, “If that be treason, make the most of it!”

On the Rocks

Mission Messenger (December 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

In the simpler days of earth, rude shepherds counted their flocks and herds upon their fingers and toes. Each toe was touched by the staff and each finger with the thumbs and when a complete round was made a line was drawn in the sand and this line was called a score. A score was thus twenty; forty was two-score, or two lines; and sixty was threescore, or three lines. We still refer to the toes and fingers as digits, even as we do figures or numbers.

Sometimes a notch or line was cut into a stick for each group of twenty, and we still use the word “scoring” for the making of such lines. We say a piston is scored when reduced oil pressure causes friction to make lines in its surface. And we still talk about keeping the score in a game or contest, although it now means to keep the tally, rather than to count by twenties.

As man developed commercial interests through barter or trade, lines drawn in the sand were no longer adequate, and a new medium of computation providing for subtraction and division, as well as addition, was required. Small white pebbles were found to be best suited for the purpose. Such a pebble was called a calculus.

In ancient Rome chariots for hire were kept at the outer gates of the wall to transport passengers to the inner city. The driver counted twenty and dropped a calculus into an urn, and repeated the process until arrival at the destination, where the calculi were poured out and the passenger paid accordingly. Our word “calculate” means “to count by stones.”

These chariots were the first taxicabs, although this word is from the French. The word “cab” is an abbreviation for cabriolet, a young goat, because the first such vehicles driven over the cobblestones of Paris, jostled and jounced and cavorted about like a young goat on the rocks. Of course the word “taxi” has to do with tax, and in our day we hardly need to explain that this refers to an assessment, or fee. A taxicab is a vehicle which assesses a fee for its use.

We hope this is all interesting but it actually doesn’t have a thing to do with our real theme. We want to talk about the word scrupulus, which also meant a rock, but literally “a small sharp stone in the shoe.” All of us have experienced the acute discomfort which comes from trying to walk with such an object in our footwear. It is from this that our word “scruple” is derived and this is the word used by J. B. Phillips to translate the Greek dialogismos in Romans 14:1.

The Greek term denotes inward reasoning resulting in an opinion or personal conviction, especially as related to the formation or development of a doubt. Phillips has it, “Welcome a man whose faith is weak, but not with the idea of arguing over his scruples.” The New English Version reads, “If a man is weak in his faith you must accept him without attempting to settle doubtful points.” The Revised Standard Version says, “As for the man who is weak in faith, welcome him, but not for disputes over opinions.”

Because of the context we are inclined to like the word “scruples” in the passage. A scruple is the fruit of conscience which has been impregnated by doubt. It is the result of one’s own inner reasoning although it may have begun with a suggestion from another. When there is a question about the propriety of a thing the one who questions it must abstain from doing it, or stifle the conscience which acts as a monitor in all such affairs.

When the apostles were alive there were two matters which created real problems among the saints. One related to the eating of meats; the other to the keeping of special days. In our culture these are no longer concerns, but nothing that troubles us now is of more importance than these were then. They were questions fraught with intense emotional strain, creating suspicion and distrust. They had in them the potential for the fragmentation and disruption of the communities of the saints. Men had genuine scruples against eating meat which might have been consecrated to idols and in celebrating certain days.

The apostolic approach to the problem was unique. It is fully set forth in Romans, chapter fourteen. It took into consideration the natural reactions of two who try to walk together, while one has a sharp pebble in his shoe. The one who does not is inclined to despise the one who has the impediment; the one who possesses the scruple is inclined to judge and censure the other. Here are the considerations which should eliminate the contempt of one and the condemnation of the other.

1. God has received them both, not because of their attitudes, but in spite of them.

2. Neither one belongs to the other, but both belong to a common master. It is ridiculous for a slave to try and dispossess another slave whom he does not possess.

3. Each man is to be fully persuaded in his own mind and act in accord with his personal conviction.

4. The judgment seat of Christ has been appointed as the tribunal for all, and premature judgment of others is playing at being God.

5. A thing which is right in itself becomes wrong to one who has the conviction it is wrong, although it is not wrong to others.

6. A brother is superior in value to anything which we may desire and must never be sacrificed in order to gratify self.

7. All are to pursue these things which promote peace and which are mutually upbuilding.

It is obvious that a small gravel which appears insignificant to one who does not have to walk upon it may be a real problem to one who must do so. The one who can walk without flinching may have to slow down voluntarily to walk with his brother. He must never boast about his freedom and must not hold his brother in contempt for limping along.

Heretics and Reform

Mission Messenger (December 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

Papal Rome has been guilty of many grievous errors. Among them, none is of greater consequence than the equating with heresy, of unorthodox opinions persistently held. Men have been burned at the stake or forced to endure indescribable torture for no other crime than a refusal to submit their minds and thoughts to the herd mentality dominated by a hierarchy laboring to enforce the false concept of human infallibility.

As we have repeatedly shown in the past, this is utterly foreign to the scriptural concept, which regards a heresy as a sect, and a heretic as a schismatic. To seek to regulate men's opinions by threat, or to alter them by force or coercion is to make hypocrites of the weak and martyrs of the strong. It is also to provide effectively against any correction from within the institution by purging out the reformers, for all reformation must be promoted from within and will only be undertaken by those who think for themselves.

Any group which has imbibed the spirit of Rome and has suckled at the breast of the "Old Mother on the Tiber," will inevitably rid itself of the thoughtful and perceptive while cherishing the ignorant and the conformists. The smaller the brain and the longer the tongue, the better partisan does one make. The man who can repeat monotonously the old cliches and parrot the traditional position unthinkingly will be elevated as an example of “the faithful,” while the one who breaks the chains and fetters is branded as “dangerous.”

Every faction skims off the brains from the top and retains the mass of the unthinking below. The most hazardous thing that can happen to one is to rise above the narrow and intolerant spirit, and to outgrow the sectarian nest in which he was hatched. All sectarianism seeks constantly to push the fledgling back into the egg and prevent him from using his wings, and ends up by throwing him overboard and thus forcing him into the very state which it sought valiantly to prevent him from entering.

It is amazing to the student of history to see that every protest movement began as a rebellion against intolerance and ends by becoming more intolerant than that which it abandoned. The persecuted one of yesterday becomes the persecutor of today. Those who react against the power structure act differently when they create a power structure of their own. When Christianity was oppressed Tertullian wrote, “It is a fundamental human right, a privilege of nature, that every man should worship according to his own convictions.” He nobly asserted, “One man’s religion neither helps nor harms another person.” But later, when Christians began to gain the ascendancy, he affirmed, “Heretics may properly be compelled, not enticed to duty. Obstinacy must be corrected, not coaxed.”

Martin Luther, the reformer, was vocal in his plea for the right to think and was branded a heretic and hounded into seclusion to protect his life. But Luther, as the leader of a sect, wrote, “Heretics are not to be disputed with, but to be condemned unheard, and whilst they perish by fire, the faithful ought to pursue the evil to its source and bathe their hands in blood.”

No reformation has ever been wrought without exacting its payment of tears and sweat and blood. The jeering mob, the false accusers, the character assassins, these are the accompanists of every revolution of thought as certainly as the one who bears the cross. The compensation comes in the thought that all the heroes of today were the heretics of yesterday. No generation ever recognizes its own prophets. It is the grandchildren who pile up the stones which their ancestors flung, and make a monument to the memory of one whom their fathers murdered.

There are two persons humanity can never tolerate— a man who lives too far below their standard, and one who lives too far above it. The first they cast into prison, the second they nail to a cross. The one brings reproach upon them by his sins, the life of the other reproaches them for their own sins. Neither a sinful world nor a “sinless sect” wants to face up to its sins. The first has created its own hell, the other its own heaven, and neither one wants to face the judgment that will come! And all the nails that ever fastened men to a cross came from a box labeled “Heresy.”

Hippies and Missions

Mission Messenger (December 1967)

Volume 29

Please don't let that title fool you! There isn't any real relation between the two terms, although there well could be. But in this case it happens to represent two ends of a conversation. Not long ago I had a chance to visit with Matthew Ikeda. It was a pleasure which had been too long deferred. Matthew is a brilliant and perceptive young Japanese. He was an orphan in Tokyo when immersed by a missionary of the restoration movement persuasion. Now he is laboring with a group of saints in northern Indiana, while teaching a course on "The Psychology of Abnormality" at a nearby university and working on his doctorate at the University of Chicago.

I had been wanting to talk to him about several things. One was the development of the hippie sub-culture in our affluent society. We discussed the motivation behind the flaking off of these young intellectuals, and what they hoped to attain through the use of psychedelic drugs and mind expansion experiments. We explored briefly the results which might accrue from smoking "pot" or "grass" but my primary interest was related to why so many are rejecting Christianity in favor of Zen or Ch'an Buddhism, or some other form of Oriental religion or philosophy. I think we concurred at almost every step of our analysis of the "Flower Children."

Then we moved into another area of mutual concern— the missionary program in various parts of our world. I have been perturbed about a great many of our attitudes and practices. One is the transportation of our American factionalism and grounds for debate to other parts of the earth which are not historically conditioned to receive them. One has to be reared in our parochial areas of partisan ferment in order for it to make any sense to him. All of the furore about our loyalty to Jesus as the Son of God, being tested by an attitude toward cups, classes, colleges, instrumental music or the millennium, can only serve to confuse Buddhists or Brahmans.

It is a little silly when you think of our having five or six different kinds of "Churches of Christ" in Africa based upon what segment in America furnishes the financial pipeline to the missionaries. A lot of people, basing their judgment on what tourists and movies they have seen, think Americans are a bunch of screw-balls anyway and it is regrettable that we work overtime in the name of Jesus, trying to prove how correct they are. Most areas of the earth have enough confusion of their own without allowing us to come in and stir up an international religious hullabaloo by moving in some of the molehills which we have inflated into artificial mountains.

Matthew pointed out another thing that leaves a bad taste in the mouth of others, and that is the practice of some of the missionaries and of a goodly number of their stateside visitors who "talk down" to the groups which they address. For instance, a preacher from the United States who is called upon to speak to a group of young Japanese who are college students gives them a lecture on "first principles" on the Sunday School literature level. One can understand how this would appear to those who are students of philosophy and eager to share in those concepts which probe the meaning of life and the universe.

I suspect the day is fast approaching in the increasingly improving intellectual climate, when one will not be respected merely because he is an American, and comes from a land where you can purchase “education” in an affluent social structure. And I’ll not be too greatly surprised if a lot of countries decide they can get along without “ambassadors for Christ” who tend to confuse western culture and mores with citizenship in the kingdom of heaven. When we present Jesus to people of another nation we are not generously and gratuitously offering something that is ours to them, but we are merely calling attention to Someone who is also theirs. We do not “take Christ” to Japan, for He has already been there!

Because of the shrinking world in which we live I hope to increase my personal association with a great many of those who represent other peoples, nations and tongues. I want to do this, not alone because of what I can convey to them, for that is little indeed. I want to share in their insights for my growth and development. If God needed all of us to make up His family I certainly need all whom He has adopted into it whatever their race or color! Surely we must strive to understand one another.

Family Culture

Mission Messenger (December 1967)

Volume 29

[Abstract]

When Nell and I were in Ulverston, Lancashire, England, we stayed in the home of the venerable brother, Walter Crosthwaite, while I spoke nightly to the little band of saints and a few friends who convened to hear me. It was an unforgettable experience. One evening we were invited to dine with a widowed sister whose husband had been a book lover. I was urged to inspect the remaining volumes and to select any one as a souvenir of our visit.

Tucked away in one corner I found a little pocket-size book by Alexander Campbell, titled, “Family Culture; or Conversations in the Domestic Circle at the Carlton House.” These articles were never printed in a single volume in America, but they had been gathered by Henry Hudston and brought out under the patronage of the Mayor of Nottingham in 1850. In spite of the fine print I read the 343 pages in the book on board our ship sailing back to America.

And now I have read the book again in a wonderful large print edition of the Restoration Reprint Library. Interesting indeed is the preface by George Greenwell, penned 117 years ago. The plate of the pen-and-ink drawing of the profile of Campbell made in Glasgow is impressive.

In the book, Campbell creates a family of Mr. Olympas and his wife Harriet, their nine children, natural and adopted, and six servants of various ages. Each morning from six to seven o'clock, this household is summoned to family devotions and Bible study. The children and domestics are divided into three groups. The little children give the facts of the lesson, the second group explains them, and the oldest draw the inferences and make the practical deductions and applications. A second session is held each evening at dusk.

The reader is taken through a thorough study of the first twenty-two chapters of Genesis, and a subsequent exploration of part of the book of Luke, as Olympas questions his family and supplies answers to the deeper questions when others ask him. There is an appendix by Thomas Campbell on how to teach nursery children in which he affirms that by following his instructions parents can be sure that, "by the time the child has completed its third year, it will have become a practical deist or theist." If that seems a pretty stiff assignment for the tricycle clan, remember that his success in training his son, Alexander, lends some weight to his words. Of course, Thomas Campbell was not bothered with television!

It is interesting beyond description to read Campbell's views on creation, the flood, the tower of Babel, the call of Abraham, etc. The profundity of his knowledge and the simplicity of his trust in the Bible are clearly exhibited through the discussion of this hypothetical family. Any person who thinks he has exhausted the possibilities of the first half of Genesis is in for a surprise. No less interesting are the discussions on Luke's account of Christ.

One intriguing thing is the glimpse provided into problems of the early restoration movement. A good example is found in the application by Olympas of certain Old Testament principles to the discussion on "the order of worship" based on Acts 2:42. The book is a nostalgic trip into the simpler days of yesteryear when there was a daily meeting of the family at the domestic altar and when all were bound together in an almost patriarchal trust. It was a day of hard physical labor and of strong faith. The reader is seized with a pang of regret at how far our land has drifted from that which provided its pioneer courage and stability.

After two readings of the “conversations in the domestic circle at the Carlton House,” I find myself with an increased respect for Alexander Campbell, who is unquestionably the “Olympas” of the book. I also find myself drawn closer to the God of creation and providence. I am glad that this book is at last available in our United States after more than a century. I treasure it as a valuable addition to my collection of restoration literature.

A Good Question

Mission Messenger (December 1967)

Volume 29

A very perceptive brother in one of the western states writes as follows:

I have just read your article “Belief and Unbelief” in the October MISSION MESSENGER. I admit that you have given me some good things to think about. But I would like to have you explain 2 Thessalonians 1:8, where Jesus is pictured as rendering vengeance on them that “know not God” along with those who “obey not the gospel.” These are two different groups, one knowing, the other ignorant.

A careful reading of the passage cited will show that our Lord will be revealed from heaven with his angels, “taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ.” It is apparent that two classes are represented since the article is repeated in the original.

Vengeance is from ekdikesis, that which is enacted out of justice. It does not imply a spirit of revenge. In the sense here mentioned, one may know God and never even have heard of the gospel. “His invisible attributes, that is to say his everlasting power and deity, have been visible, ever since the world began, to the eye of reason, in the things he has made” (Romans 1:20).

Man can be under no governing principle of which he has never heard, and to which he has no personal access. He cannot make a choice if he does not know there is an alternative. He cannot decide to be under the Lordship of Jesus if he has never heard of Jesus. But the entire world of rational beings has testimony related to God in nature. To the heathen it was said, “He has not left you without some clue to his nature, in the kindness he shows: he sends you rain from heaven and crops in their seasons, and gives you food and good cheer in plenty” (Acts 14:17).

When man, by reason, follows this clue to its logical end, he will either acknowledge God or reject him, for his reasoning will become the law by which he will be judged and to which he will be held accountable until he is informed of a higher or superior principle. To act out of reverence for God in the light available unto one is to “know God” as the term is here employed.

“When Gentiles who do not possess the law carry out its precepts by the light of nature, then, although they have no law, they are their own law, for they display the effect of the law inscribed on their own hearts. Their conscience is called as witness, and their own thoughts argue the case on either side, against them or even for them, on the day when God judges the secrets of human hearts through Christ Jesus. So my gospel declares” (Romans 2:14-16).

If the light of nature is all one has, that is all the light in which he can walk. That light is sufficient to reveal the existence of God, determined by reason. If one does not have the reasoning capacity to ascertain this, he is not accountable in his imbecility. But it is argued that the gospel was given as a light for the whole world. That is true. But the sun was also given as a light for the whole world, and yet if it is on the other side of the earth I'll be in darkness. There is nothing wrong with the sun, and I'm doing the best I can, but I'm in darkness through no fault of mine. It is just as logical to argue that people should see as clearly in darkness as those in the sunlight, since it is shining somewhere, as it is to contend that those who have never heard the gospel should be judged on the same basis as those who have constant access to it.

Those who will receive punishment for not knowing God, are those who have willfully and deliberately rejected the testimony of nature, and that of their own reason and conscience. W. E. Vine says of the passage, “The wicked persecution of inoffensive persons was an outcome of the sin of willful ignorance against God.” The New English Version translates the passage more in harmony with the original, “Then he will do justice upon those who refuse to acknowledge God and upon those who will not obey the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ.”

There is a vast difference between a refusal to acknowledge that of which you have heard, or to which you have access with proof, and involuntary ignorance which you cannot help. I am in favor of taking the Good News to all men, but I do not think God has to damn all those who die before I reach them in order to save some of those who are alive when I get there.

The Community of God

Mission Messenger (January 1968)

Volume 30

It was Simon Peter who answered the greatest question ever proposed to sinful man, and set the stage for a theological controversy which has echoed through the centuries. And the circumstances surrounding the occasion are filled with consuming interest for all who are caught up in love for Him who asked the question then, and who still requires a personal reply from each of us.

The physical environment in which Jesus chose to propound the question was extraordinarily appropriate. It was in the district of Caesarea Philippi. This was about twenty-five miles northeast of the Sea of Galilee, and about four miles from the site of Dan, the northernmost city of the ancient tribal inheritance. The area was populated heavily with non-Jews and rival cultures and religions strove for recognition.

The hills were sites of ancient altars and ruined temples devoted to the Baals of Syria and Phoenicia. These were fertility gods, sometimes grim and implacable, and sometimes smiling and beneficent. They were worshiped by the release of sexual passions in orgies at harvest festivals. It is a matter of history that whatever men employ in their liturgies will be furnished by others for a price, so the green hills and forest glades became the haunt of cult prostitutes, both male and female.

Near Caesarea Philippi there was a towering hill, a steep wall of rock, and opening into its bowels was a famous cavern, regarded by many as the birthplace of Pan. This god of flocks and fields and forests was described as the son of Zeus, and the nymph Callisto. His playing upon the reeds, or the shepherd's pipe, was supposed to strike a frenzy of sudden fear into the hearts of all who heard it. We still call such groundless fright panic.

Pan was pictured as an animal-like figure with horns, a crooked nose, a tail and goat's feet. In medieval times he became the prototype of the devil in superstitious minds. It is interesting to remember that the city of which we speak was first called Paneas. The Greek influence thus blended with the more primitive paganism of the area.

But this is not all. The cave which we mentioned was the entry to a great subterranean lake. Just as every prominent cave in the Ozarks region where I was born was said to have a bottomless pit, so Josephus declared of this lake that its depth was unfathomable. "When anyone lets down anything to measure the depth of the earth beneath the water, no length of cord is sufficient to reach it." Out of the cave's mouth flowed a great spring which was the principal headwater of the Jordan River, hallowed by the Jews because of its historical influence on their national life. Thus the Jewish influence was felt, as well as that of the Greek and pagan. Of even greater significance was the political status of the city. When Herod the Great, half-Jew and half-Idumean, was given control of the country by Caesar, he included Paneas as one of the cities where his Works Project Administration engaged in an urban beautification program. Here he built a great temple of gleaming white marble which was dedicated to emperor worship. Later on, his son, Philip the tetrarch, remodeled the temple and carried out a slum clearance project. He changed its name to Caesarea which means "Caesar's City." Because there was already a city of the same name which was the seat of the occupation government in Palestine, he added his name Philippi, which means “of Philip.” The Roman interests were joined with the pagan, Greek and Jewish concerns at this spot.

The great question of Jesus was not asked in Jerusalem, the religious center of Judaism in the world. It was not asked along the shores of Galilee, the teeming commercial center of Palestine. Instead, he waited until he stood near the foot of Isbel Shrik, the Prince’s Mount, a lofty branch of the Lebanon range which formed the boundary between Palestine and Syria. Here at the one spot in Palestine where all of the cultures of the world met, on the very threshold of “the nations” and at the back door of “the land of the people,” he asked his disciples about his identity.

We do not imply that there was preconsidered significance in the location. We only point out how remarkable it was that a question, whose answer would affect the destiny of all the world should be propounded at such a place, remote from the area where the greater part of the personal ministry was carried out.

THE QUESTION

When Jesus came into the region of Caesarea Philippi, he asked his disciples, “Who do men say that I the Son of man am?”

They said, “Some say that you are John the Baptist; some, Elijah; and others, Jeremiah, or one of the prophets.”

He said unto them, “Who do you say that I am?” Simon Peter answered, “You are the Messiah, the Son of the living God.”

The time of Jesus on earth was growing short. It was imperative that there be those who understood his mission and identity, or his work and advent would be a total loss. He begins by asking about the public reaction, and the answers were varied. This furnishes us a good example of the difference between the opinions of men and the revelation of God. All of the opinions proved to be in error. Only the one to whom God revealed the truth had the correct answer.

It is sometimes easier for men to adopt error than to accept the truth. To believe that Jesus was any of the characters designated, except Elijah, would have necessitated believing in the resurrection of those who had died long before, yet many of these very people refused to believe that Jesus had risen from the dead when they were confronted with the claim.

The names with which the people identified Jesus stand as an indirect proof of the powerful impact of his preaching and work. John the Baptist had exercised such a tremendous influence that all Jerusalem and Judea and the region round about Jordan “were baptized of him in Jordan, confessing their sins.” During his life all men mused in their hearts, whether John was the Messiah, or not (Luke 3:15); now that he was dead, many questioned if the Messiah was John the Baptist. Such are the vagaries of human thought.

When Herod Antipas, who had John beheaded in the prison at Machaerus, heard about the wonders performed by Jesus, his stricken conscience immediately jumped to the conclusion that John had risen from the dead. It is obvious that others also felt that the slain reformer had returned to prosecute the work of turning the hearts of fathers and children back toward each other.

Some said that Jesus was Elijah. In doing so they paid him a great tribute because the scribes placed Elijah at the very top of the prophetic roster. He was the great restorationist who was to come before the great and dreadful day of the Lord. Even Jesus declared, “Elijah shall truly come first and restore all things.” Elijah was the prophet of zeal and of miracles, and the fact that people thought of Jesus and Elijah in the same connection demonstrates how the signs had affected them.

Still others argued that Jesus was Jeremiah. The tradition was widely held that Jeremiah would also come before the Messiah did. This prophet was living at the time when the Chaldeans sacked Jerusalem and carried the people into exile. It was believed that before the city fell in the siege that Jeremiah had spirited the ark of the covenant away and carried it across Jordan to hide it in a cave in Mount Nebo, the burial site of Moses. It was also confidently expected that before the Messiah came, the prophet would precede him and restore the tables of stone containing the Torah. So the people confused Jesus with those whom they regarded as forerunners, but they did so because they could not otherwise account for his mighty miracles, and yet they believed that the Messiah had to be preceded by these other great personages.

The world is always attempting to fit Jesus into traditional patterns. They seek to pour him into traditional moulds or fit him into human categories. In spite of the passing of twenty centuries there are those who still say that Jesus was one of the prophets, but that is all. But the greatest prophets of all ages pale into insignificance beside him who is the Lord of all. The answer still rings true, “You are the Messiah, the Son of the living God.”

THE PROMISE

Jesus answered, “Blessed are you, Simon son of Jonah, because flesh and blood did not reveal this unto you, but my Father who is in heaven.

And I tell you that you are Peter, and on this rock I will build my church, and the gates of Hades will not prevail against it.

I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven and whatever you bind on earth will be bound in heaven; and whatever you loose on earth will be loosed in heaven."

In an attempt to understand this we must remember that the word for "blessed" is makarios, which literally means "happy." The source of happiness in this case was that Peter had access to divine revelation, and was thus enabled to ascertain the truth. Without it he would have been reliant upon speculation and could have been as mistaken as others. That man is fortunate indeed who is permitted to know the will of God.

Our readers may be aware that one eminent modern Jewish scholar suggests that "Bar-jona" may be the Aramaic "Baryona" which means "unrestrained or lacking self-control, that is, impetuous." He translates the statement, "How fortunate you are, impulsive Simon!" Examination proves there is such a word, and we grant that the disposition of Peter seems to exhibit this characteristic, but it is our personal opinion that Jesus identified him by naming his father, since Simon was a common name in that day, and distinctions were ordinarily made by using the father's name.

Simon had just said, "You are the Messiah (that is, the Anointed)." Jesus replies, "And I tell you that you are Peter (a Rock)." Then he makes the statement, "And on this rock I will build my church." Our readers will be familiar with the various positions taken as to the identity of the rock, and especially as relates to the Greek petros and petra. It is generally supposed that the Romish commentators are the only group which seriously contends that Jesus alluded to Peter, but this is far from being the case. Many Protestant commentators lean to the same view, without giving credence to the claim of papal or apostolic succession.

It is our personal opinion that the rock referred to here is neither Christ nor Peter. Nor do we believe that it is necessarily the confession made by Peter. We incline rather to the idea that it is the fact of the Messiahship and Sonship of Jesus. The foundation is that which was revealed to Peter by the Father, and it would have been a fact if Peter had never confessed it.

In this article we are going to be more particularly concerned with what our Lord meant by the word which has been translated “church.” And that there may be no doubt of the turn our study will take, let us at the very outset say that we hold that this translation is correct, and the ecclesiastical connotations connected with it in our day are misleading and deceptive.

We are not unaware of the attitude of many who do not want their prejudices disturbed. It is much easier not to have to study again these things we have always accepted. But we think that nothing else is quite as important to us just now as recapture of the real meaning of “ekklesia,” the very word our Lord used for what he would build. We make no apology for this investigation of it!

THE DEFINITION

Ekklesia is a combined form of ek, meaning out, and kaleo, to call. The term signifies those who are called out and by the same act are gathered or called together. When Jesus employed the word it was already colored by Greek and Jewish usage. Because of our association of it with matters exclusively religious or ecclesiastical it is difficult for us to realize that it did not have such a connotation originally.

When we use the word “church” we automatically connect it with a religious institution. This is because we have adopted this word which really has no relation at all to what Jesus said, and have given it a meaning of our own. When Jesus declared that he would plant or construct his ekklesia upon the fact of his Christhood and Sonship, he certainly was not talking about “building a church” in the sense in which we use the expression today. And not one of the apostles would ever have thought about it in such a light.

The Greeks used ekklesia to designate a certain gathering of citizens summoned to deal with problems related to a Greek city-state. It was not applied to a casual crowd such as often convened to argue in the marketplace, nor to the informal throng surrounding a philosopher. It was a proper assembly of qualified and accredited citizens possessed of credentials and the right of franchise, called out of the mass to discuss matters of state.

There are certain things which invite our attention at once when we consider the original connotation of the term. First, the ekklesia is composed of persons. It is not a place or a structure. Second, those who compose it do so as the result of a summons which has been issued and to which they respond. One could not be a part of the ekklesia who had not heard the call. Third, the act of calling out is also an act of calling in, or calling together into a fellowship.

We must not overlook the fact that the disciples of Jesus were Jews, and any term he used in addressing them would impress them in the light of their Jewish experience with it. And the old covenant scriptures employ two words to signify the gathering together of the people, Israel.

One was edhah which was sometimes used for gathering the sheaves of grain at the threshingfloor, or the grapes at the winepress. It was also used for the assembling of the people preparatory to a battle. Thus it came to be used for the congregation of Israel.

More than two hundred years before the birth of Jesus eminent Jewish scholars had translated the Hebrew old covenant scriptures into Greek. Because there were seventy men employed in the task, their version is called The Septuagint. This was the version in common use in the days when Jesus was upon earth. And generally, although not invariably, this version translated the Hebrew word edhah, by the Greek sunagoge.

This word is a combined form of syn, together; and ago, to bring. The bringing together, as we have found of the Hebrew equivalent, might relate to things, or persons. Eventually it came to refer primarily to an assembling of persons. In an attempt to find a consistent English term for translating edhah, the Revised Standard Version adopted the word “congregation.” This is from the Latin grex, flock; combined with con, together. A congregation is composed of those who are drawn together as sheep in a flock.

The other Hebrew word is tahal, to call or summon. Where this term occurs the Septuagint generally uses ekklesia, and the Revised Standard Version uses “assembly.” Note then that “congregation” and “assembly” are employed by our English versions to translate the equivalent of sunagoge and ekklesia in the old covenant scriptures. Not once does the King James Version or the Revised Standard Version use “church” in the old covenant scriptures. If the proper translation of ekklesia in the version used in our Lord’s time on earth was “assembly,” why do the translators carefully avoid it and substitute another word?

ORDERS FROM THE KING

There is an interesting story behind this. The word “church” is not a translation of ekklesia at all. There is not one element in it which is even remotely related to the idea of calling out any person or thing. It has no connection whatsoever with the concept of congregating or assembling. It is absolutely foreign to the very implications of ekklesia.

The word “church” comes to us as an abbreviation of kuriou oikos, which literally means “house of a lord.” It referred to the manor house of a feudal lord, as contrasted with the huts of his serfs, thus, an elevated house occupied by a dignitary. It is true that the ekklesia of God is “the house of the living God,” a temple composed of living stones, but neither the word “house” or “temple” can translate ekklesia.

Why do we have “church” instead of a word which signifies a body of people who have been called out of a former state to share in a new communal relationship in the Lord Jesus Christ?

We may blame the developing hierarchy which carried the saints into what Martin Luther described as “the Babylonian Captivity.” More particularly the fault lies at the door of James I, who commissioned the translation of a version “authorized to be read in the churches.” Earlier free English versions employed the word “congregation” for ekklesia. But James was an ardent exponent of the divine right of kings and a firm advocate of the rule of the state over the church. He did not want to be merely the titular head of the congregation.

Accordingly, he dictated a set of fourteen orders to be observed by the translators, the third of which provided: “The old ecclesiastical words to be kept; as the word church not to be translated congregation, etc.” The translators followed this directive, as they pointed out in their preface, where they declared they had “avoided the scrupulosity of the Puritans, who left the old ecclesiastical words and betook them to others, as when they put washing for baptism, and congregation for church.” Do not forget that scrupulosity means “carefulness, exactness, or conscientiousness.”

Alexander Campbell was aware of this, and printed the list of “King James’ Instructions to the Translators of the Bible—with extracts and remarks” in the November, 1824, issue of “The Christian Baptist.” When he published his new version of the new covenant scriptures, familiarly known as “The Living Oracles,” he did not include the word “church” even once. Instead he used the word “congregation” as a translation of ekklesia. In this he followed the lead of Drs. George Campbell and Philip Doddridge.

Campbell wrote about ekklesia, “It is an assembly of the called, or those brought together by one leader, or profession. The whole community of professing Christians make the one body or congregation of the Lord; and those meeting in one place constitute the Christian congregation in that place.” George Smith, editor of the Episcopal Recorder in 1834, attacked Mr. Campbell’s usage and deemed it incongruous that Christ should be referred to as “head of the congregation.” To this Campbell replied, “But what incongruity in the word congregation here more than in calling Christ the head of the church. The head of the community, or the congregation, or the assembly is to my optics as clear and intelligible as the head of the church” (Millennial Harbinger, 1834, page 299).

MY OWN SUGGESTION

I am convinced that our use of the word “church” is responsible for many of our problems in the religious world. We were saddled with a term which was in no sense a translation of the word it was intended to represent. It has now taken on certain ecclesiastical accretions which only serve to complicate it further.

In addition to this we have compounded the offence by applying it to sects, factions and parties in such a manner as to defeat the very purpose of God.

I am inclined strongly toward the use of “community” as our best modern English equivalent for ekklesia. The Authentic Version uses this word in every instance where ekklesia is found in the original. This is the only translation of the new covenant scriptures by a Jew. In his preface the author states that he rejects the word “church” because it is an ecclesiastical term.

While I am not at all averse to the employment of “congregation” or “assembly” it seems to me that both of these words now represent a concept that is somewhat too limited or restricted. I find myself rejecting the view of some very admirable and respected brethren that the ekklesia is manifested only when assembled in a local sense. I am wondering if their reaction to the “institutional church” with its forms and structures may have driven them to a position which will eventually prove untenable.

The word “community” signifies a company of persons joined together by common ties, and in the case of the saints the ties that bind are faith in the Lord Jesus as the Son of God and love for one another kindled by an awareness of the love of God for all. The community is formed by God. The formation is an act of divine creation. It is established on the foundation that Jesus is the Messiah and God’s Son. It is a community of the reconciled and a reconciling community.

But if the idea of “community” is inherent in ekklesia, why did Jesus use the word “build”? I think it stems from the circumstances surrounding the area where his question elicited the answer from Peter. The city of Caesarea Philippi was built upon a ledge and it honored the name of him who claimed universal dominion. At this very time Caesar-worship was rife in the land.

The statement of Jesus assured that he would not found a community upon a crumbling ledge but upon a principle of such enduring significance that the gates of hades would not swallow it up as they have long since engulfed the Palestinian centers of Caesar-adoration.

I think Jesus was saying something like this: “Simon, you have just acknowledged that I am God’s Son, and I recognize that you are only Jonah's son, but you are fortunate because my heavenly Father has revealed unto you a truth which you could not have learned from men. Truly you are a stone but upon the bedrock fact which my Father disclosed unto you I am going to found my community, and the gates of hades will not engulf it."

QUESTIONS FROM BRETHREN

Because of the nature of my essays this year I am going to submit some of them in advance to brethren who are concerned. I want them to raise questions for clarification so that I may print them in conjunction with the articles. Here are some of the questions about my foregoing thesis with my replies. I trust that you will find them interesting. You need not concur with my answers to be loved and revered as my brethren in Him who died for us all.

1. Although the word "church" is not a translation of ekklesia, is it not possible that through common usage it may become expressive of the idea and be rendered indispensable?

Yes, this could happen, for the word could be invested with a meaning regardless of origin, or it could acquire a meaning through usage. All written words are simply combinations of characters representing certain sounds employed for communication, and they convey only the meaning infused into them by the writer or reader. However, the word "church" is now a professional term of the ecclesiastical establishment and it is unlikely they will ever relinquish it from their grasp.

Moreover, it is very confusing because it is now used to designate a multiplicity of sects. This is an unthinkable thing in the light of God's revelation. One might as well speak of a Methodist God, a Baptist God, or a Presbyterian God, as to speak of these sects as separate "churches." There is only one ekklesia. It is composed of all the redeemed and reconciled ones.

No man can call people out of sin, therefore no man can form an ekklesia of the saints. There is one body!

2. Do you seriously think that what you have said will influence many of what you call “the heirs of the restoration movement”?

No, I do not. But I never ask what results will accrue from my writings, nor do I concern myself with how many people will concur. I am committed to stating the truth as I understand it if I must stand alone. I am willing to stand in the judgment and answer for what I say. Our brethren have delivered too many inane lessons on such subjects as “The Name of the Church” to really study what I am saying. I know how they feel; for one of my favorite topics used to be, “Whose Name Shall the Bride Wear?” The arguments which I borrowed and made in my sincere ignorance appear downright silly in the light of maturing study and meditation. It would have been much more harmonious to have spoken on “What Common Nouns Designate an Uncommon People?” The community of heaven has no distinctive title. It needs none for there is nothing else in its class from which to distinguish it.

Our brethren have been conditioned and influenced by men with the kind of sectarian spirit which I once possessed, to find their safety in a signboard rather than a Savior. They will hardly accept a translation which reads: “The Christian communities send greetings to you,” instead of: “The Churches of Christ Salute You— Romans 16:16.” To do so would wreak havoc with signboards, cornerstones and “altar cloths.”

If we give up such distinctive titles as “Church of Christ” we will lose our identity among other parties and sects, so I doubt that many whom I know will want to read about “the communities of the saints,” or “the community of God which is at Corinth.” To some it is much more important to defend our traditions than to acknowledge the truth.

3. How can the local “community” be identified and even distinguished from other such communities?

Exactly as it was done in apostolic times. The ekklesia was never identified by a special title. To give such an organizational name is to denominate and this creates a denomination. The primitive saints were identified only by the location of their assembly-point or gathering-place. For example: “This is to commend to you Sister Phoebe, who is an administrator of the Cenchræ community.” “Paul, prisoner of Christ Jesus, with Brother Timotheus, to our dear friend and co-worker Philemon. . . . and to the community in your house.” “Give my regards to the brothers at Laodicea, also to Nympha and the community in her house.”

Our brethren have not only sectarianized themselves with a title, but have doubly sectarianized themselves in parentheses. They not only want to be distinguished as to sect, but also to be separated from their brethren in the same historical party. Thus one reads such absurd signs as “Church of Christ (Christian)” and “Church of Christ (Vocal Music).” Those who erect such signs ought never to have the audacity to go on the radio and condemn only single-minded sectarians. They should at least limit their attacks to those like the “Brethren Church (Progressive Bunkers);” or “Baptist Churches (Duck River);” or to the “Reformed Presbyterian Church of North America (Old School).”

Try and imagine an apostle writing, “All the Christian communities (Christian) send their regards” (Romans 16:16). Or, “Paul, Silvanus and Timotheus, to the community of Thessalonians (Vocal Music) in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.” Of course I know in advance the arguments which will be made to justify these twentieth century signboards. Please pardon me for mentioning that it still looks a little childish and silly to me!

4. In the divided state of the religious world today, whom do you regard as constituting the ekklesia?

We must recognize that the state to which allusion is made is of post-apostolic origin. This complicates matters when we attempt a scriptural approach, and this is the only approach in which I am interested. However, I regard all naturalized citizens of the kingdom of heaven on earth as being in the ekklesia, and the citizens are those who have been delivered from the power of darkness and translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son.

To state it in another fashion, every person who has been born from above and has been inducted into the family of God is a citizen of the community of the holy ones. In our fragmented world God's sheep are scattered over the sectarian hills. They are not all in one partisan corral. Those who think they are generally count some goats and overlook a lot of sheep about whom they know nothing because of lack of association.

5. Just what do you regard as essential to becoming a part of the ekklesia?

Since the word means "called out" one must hear the call of God (1 Corinthians 1:9) and make a proper response to it. Those who never hear the call are not among the called; those who hear it and refuse to respond, or who do not respond in God's way are not called out. The call is made through the gospel, that is, by proclamation of the kerygma (2 Thessalonians 2:14). The proper response to the message is belief of the proclamation and immersion in water upon the basis of that faith (Mark 16:15, 16). It seems to me that there can be no question but what those who believe and are immersed thereby become citizens of the community of God on earth. Certainly one who has complied with these things from the heart, may safely assure himself that he is in the ekklesia. Such an assumption by others would be without scriptural warrant, and hazardous to say the least.

6. Do you think that those who do not recognize the distinctions that you have made are guilty of sin?

Of course not. Our brethren need to grow up and stop equating every error of judgment and vocabulary with sin. A little child does not sin against its parents when it becomes confused and does not call everything by its right name. We should not always remain in the baby class, but it requires time to grow and develop greater communication skills. The problem is augmented when we have tutors whose vocabulary is faulty and who threaten those who want to improve.

One can be honestly mistaken about a lot of things without being a sinner, and no one is more seriously mistaken than he who does not know this. It is probable that, in our current climate of investigation, all of us will learn a great many things. This will require alterations and amendments in life and speech conformable to our newly acquired knowledge. There is little to be gained by those who are too stubborn to learn, or those who under the impact of new insights become fervent iconoclasts and start chopping down signboards and other symbols. After all, the real issue is not so much what appears on a signboard as what occupies the hearts of those who gather behind it. Violent revolution of ardent spirits will not serve the divine interest half so well as the gentle reformation of the Holy Spirit.

Next month, if God wills, we will present another phase of our investigation of the primitive community of believers under the heading “The Crisis of Change.” We will show how difficult it was for the Jewish saints to countenance acceptance of uncircumcised Gentiles, and how a council of apostles and elders at Jerusalem fixed upon a compromise, with the help of the Spirit, which provided for unity in diversity. This provided for recognition of cultural and national differences while preserving the unity in Christ which made for one body. We earnestly solicit your attention to this coming article which may have tremendous implications for those who seek renewal through recovery of the apostolic order of things.

The Reason Why

Mission Messenger (January 1968)

Volume 30

[Abstract]

“The gentleman complains that our foundation is too broad—too liberal. It is indeed broad, liberal and strong. If it were not so, it would not be a Christian foundation. Christianity is a liberal institution.” (Alexander Campbell in “The Campbell-Rice Debate,” page 808).

I have as my goal to be a Christian, and a Christian only. It is not at all easy for me. My fleshly desires are opposed to it. So are most of my fellow-believers. The love of security entices me to covet the close-hearted association of the sect with its easy answer philosophy to all of the major problems of life. But I am committed to the life of hard struggle essential to free myself from the quicksand of the partisan quagmire, and I am resolved to pursue this dream for my life until death.

Obviously I am not alone in my ambition. A great many thoughtful people make the same claim and quite a few of them are serious about it. But I think a lot of them want to be “Christians only” because they do not want to be something else in our patchwork crazy-quilt religious world. Theirs is a negative approach. They are what they are because they do not care to be what others are. They do not want to be Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, or Catholics, so they create a “Christians only” party. This satisfies their consciences, gives them identity, and may even inflate their corporate ego.

My approach is exactly opposite to this. I want to be a Christian only, because only by so being, can I share in the values of all others who believe in Jesus, but who have become fragmented by the purely human level of their lower nature. I know that they have a great many things which are not values, and in these I do not care to share. I have more than enough of such things of my own. But I do not want to miss any spiritual value for I need all of them.

My readers know that I personally feel that one of the great abuses of spiritual language is to apply the word “churches” to our various modern sects, yet we sometimes have to “speak after the manner of men because of the infirmities of the fleshly mind.” Perhaps you can forgive us for doing so in this article that we might be better able to explain. I want you to see that I am not a “Christian only” simply because I am prejudiced against something else, but that it is only by being a “Christian only” that I can really be everything else.

1. I am catholic in my religion. The word katholikon originally was applied by physicians and metaphysicians to a universal remedy which, if it could be discovered, would cure all ills and allow men to live forever. I have discovered it. It is the blood of Christ. It cleanses from all sin. It provides eternal life.

My faith is catholic. My love is catholic. I believe all truth and I love all men. I love the world. I have not seen all truth nor all men, but my faith and love are not limited by my personal experience since they are rooted in God.

2. I am a baptist. A baptist, in the true sense of the term, is one who baptizes. He is a baptizer. I have baptized a good many thousands of believers in the Messiah. I am not a baptist because I believe in baptism, but because I believe in Jesus who ordained baptism as the response to the message of God’s grace.

3. I am a methodist. It is my conviction that our God is a God of order. The very universe which he created is a majestic display of order and method. I think that my approach to his service should not be slipshod or haphazard. I would want the apostle Paul to be able to write to me, "For though absent in body, I am with you in spirit, and rejoice to see your orderly array and the firm front which your faith in Christ presents."

4. I am presbyterian. I hold that each community of believers should select from its constituency a number of qualified presbyters who are properly qualified, men of unimpeachable character, who adhere to the true doctrine, and who may be well able to motivate their hearers with wholesome teaching and to confute objectors, and that these should be ordained to tend the flock of God. They constitute a presbytery in that community.

5. I am episcopal. It is my position that elders who are ordained to tend a flock are bishops; that is, overseers of the community, superintending it through power of example. The word for bishop is episkopos, so that the presbytery is the episcopate of the community of saints. The divine order is a plurality of bishops over one community; it is never a plurality of communities under one bishop.

6. I am one of the brethren. The greatest relationship we can sustain to each other is that of brethren. This simple collective noun indicates a state which transcends all others which create artificial titles to flatter the dominant and further denigrate the subservient and weaker. Few of us have ever caught the glory of the statement, "But you must not be called 'rabbi'; for you have one Rabbi, and you are all brothers."

Rabbis are made by men but brothers are made by God. Men can choose a rabbi but one cannot choose his brothers, either in the physical or spiritual realm. There is a difference between what men are called by other men and what they really are. "You must not be called 'rabbi' . . . you are all brothers."

7. I am one of the united brethren in Christ. Unity is not really something we attain or achieve. It is not gained but given. It is a gift of the Spirit. We are all baptized by one Spirit into one body, and through faith we are all the sons of God in union with Christ Jesus. The only real unity we can enjoy is in Christ. Outside of him we are caught up in national, cultural, status, social and sexual differences. But in him “there is no such thing as Jew and Greek, slave and freeman, male and female; you are all one person in Christ Jesus.”

Do not misunderstand this. There are Jews in Christ and there are Greeks in Christ. There are slaves in Christ and there are freemen in Christ. There are males in Christ and there are females in Christ. But in Christ, that is, in union with him, there is no such thing as Jew or Greek. National, social and sexual characteristics have nothing to do with this relationship.

Jesus did not die for only one or the other. He died for all persons that they might all become one in him. Anyone who attempts in his human blindness and prejudice to create or perpetuate a community of saints based on color, culture or caste, wars against the purpose of the Christ. You may be sure Christ does not dwell in such a community and it does not dwell in Christ.

8. I am a friend. The Master said to his disciples, “I call you servants no longer; a slave does not know what his master is about. I have called you friends, because I have disclosed to you everything that I heard from my Father.” This does not indicate that I am not a servant, but rather that I am a servant who has been taken into his confidence. I know what his plans are. As a mere slave I would be on the “outside” but as a friend I am on the “inside.”

Sharing in a knowledge of my Lord’s intentions does not exempt me from doing what he commands. My obligation becomes even greater because it is enforced by warm regard and intimacy. “You are my friends, if you do what I command you.” This was not said to the envoys of Jesus because they were apostles, but because they were disciples and I share in that discipleship.

9. I am in the church of God. As a part of God’s household, I am in the church of the living God. This makes me a vital part of “the pillar and bulwark of the truth.” It defines my task as responsibility to support and sustain the truth in my personal witness. A bulwark is a defense or rampart and I am obligated to stand in defense of the truth.

10. I am in the church of God in Christ. The Gentiles in Thessalonica became followers of the churches of God in Christ Jesus which were in Judea. They did so because when handed God’s message, they received it not as the word of men, but as what it truly is, the very word of God at work in those who hold the faith. When I was handed this message that is how I received it. I have not changed one bit in my attitude toward it. It is still at work in me and on me and it is making some pretty radical changes in my attitude.

11. I am a protestant. While I recognize that this word has come to mean the registering of an objection, and there are a great many things to which I object, I want to remind you that originally it did not relate to something one was against, but to that which he was for. “Pro” literally means “for, or forth.” It means an argument or vote in favor of something. Testari means to “testify” and is from testis, a witness.

For one to say he is not a protestant is to affirm that he does not stand for anything, to intimate that he is not willing to testify in behalf of anything. Like the apostle Paul, I am a two-edged protestant. I protest both for and against. I commend what I can and condemn what I cannot commend. I declare my faith and object strenuously to that which would weaken or destroy it.

12. I am a conservative. A conservative is one who seeks to conserve that which he admires and respects and which he believes to be for the general welfare. I believe in the preservation of natural resources such as forests, fisheries and wilderness areas. I am a lover of wildlife and am dedicated to the ideal of preserving its habitat. I believe in the preservation of economic resources. I am opposed to throwing money down ratholes, whether the rats who made them are domestic or foreign.

I believe in preservation of spiritual resources and I am committed to protecting them from erosion and attack to the extent of my ability. I am not interested in maintaining the status quo, because that is just Latin for the mess we are in. Too many are concerned merely about holding the fort when they should be involved in fighting the devil.

13. I am a liberal. This word is from liberalis and means “pertaining to a freeman.” “The man who as a slave received the call to be a Christian is the Lord’s freedman . . . You are bought at a price; do not become slaves of men.” I am resolved to remain free as a slave of Jesus. And I am not so much concerned with what I have been freed from doing as what I have been freed to do.

I am liberal in the sense that the term implies one who is characterized by or inclined toward opinions favoring progress or reform. I want to see the cause to which I have devoted my all make gain and growth in the hearts of men. I want to see the unfinished reformation continue, and I want to be an activist in promoting God’s design for his people.

MY POSITION

Thus I am a Christian only, not because I want to be narrow, limited and inhibited, but precisely because I do not want to be. If I were a Baptist I could not be a Methodist. I would be frowned upon as a compromiser by both. No sect is big enough to include all of the truth or all of the saved. Truth cannot be caught and confined in sectarian containers any more than the atmosphere can be canned and dispensed by the Democrats or the Republicans. Neither the truth to be believed nor the air to be breathed can be captured by any party, although both can be polluted by all of the parties.

I must either settle for less than the whole truth, which means trying to content myself with less than the undivided Christ, or I must be just a Christian. The love of God was not designed to run on a narrow-gauge track. I say this in full cognizance of the statement of our blessed Lord that, "The gate that leads to life is small and the road is narrow." Many of my brethren misunderstand that like they do a lot of other sayings of Jesus, and their misconceptions have dwarfed a lot of them. Some of them are pretty small and narrow, fearful of growing either up or out! Jesus was not trying to stunt us by scaring us! He was not trying to produce pygmies or manufacture midgets!

If I am any kind of Christian, I become a hyphenated one, and what is before the hyphen restricts what is after it. But I do not want to be restricted. "Christ set us free to be free men. Stand firm, then, and refuse to be tied to the yoke of slavery again." I shall not be some kind of Christian nor all kinds of Christian. I do not want to be grouped, typed, classed or categorized, except as a follower of Christ Jesus. "It is enough for the disciple that he be as his master, and the servant as his lord." If it is enough for him to have me so it is enough for me to be thus.

No man belongs to Jesus because he is a Baptist, a Methodist, a Presbyterian, a Conservative, a Liberal or a Protestant. Disciples of Jesus may create parties, but no party can create disciples of Jesus. If men will be disciples of Jesus it will be in spite of their parties and not because of them. The body of Christ consists of many parts, not parties. I can share in all that is holy, just and good in all of the parties as a Christian only, and I simply do not want to share in less than all that is good.

All parties have a combination of truth and error. Of course this is also my condition, but as a Christian only I am free to adopt new truth at once when I apprehend it. I am also free to immediately reject error when I am made aware of it. This is not true of a partisan. He must subscribe to the error as well as the truth in the party creed, whether written or unwritten, else he will be ejected from the party. Generally he will be retained longer while questioning the truth than while questioning the error of the party. Parties are often quite sensitive about their errors, because it is their errors rather than their truths, which serve to give them identity. Others may have discovered the truths they hold without having been betrayed into their errors. The distinctive errors of the party are always their own brainchildren and we tend to lavish more care upon our own offspring.

It is true that most parties tend to outgrow their errors, or their errors outgrow them, but this takes centuries and I do not have time to wait. I cannot be saved by the truth held by others and I refuse to be damned by the errors held by others, so for that reason I insist that I shall belong only to Jesus.

This does not free me from a relationship to others. It enlarges it. There is no place for a lone wolf among God's sheep. A single member does not constitute a body and a head requires a body! Just as Jesus belongs to all of his disciples and all of his disciples belong to Jesus, I also belong to every person on this whole wide earth who belongs to Jesus. "We being many, are one!"

Let me say once more that I am a Christian only, not because I desire to be narrow and exclusive, but rather because I want to be expansive and inclusive. No sect on earth is broad enough or comprehensive enough to provide all of the love or truth which I crave. I am not an ecumenical Christian, but as a Christian, I am ecumenical in the inherent meaning of that term, although not in its imposed and infused partisan connotation. I do not care too much about a One World Church, but I am deeply concerned about a “one church” world, and some day I shall see it when “the sovereignty of the world has passed to our Lord and his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever!” Amen. Even so, come Lord Jesus!

We get a number of letters these days from college men and women. It is a privilege to hear from them. Here is part of a recent letter we received.

I am a graduate student in biology at the university here. I grew up in the Church of Christ but have been very depressed recently because I simply cannot condone the arrogance and dogmatism which characterizes the large congregation where my family belongs. In fact, I was getting ready to throw it all overboard when someone sent me your publication. It offered me a glimmer of hope and I have decided to stay with it a little while longer.

The great number of letters of this general tone indicate that a lot of very fine young people in our day are having difficulty with the sectarian spirit which has captured a large part of our segment of the restoration movement. It is only natural that they should chafe under the rigidity of a party system which projects its every pronouncement and interpretation as infallible, and regards as second-class citizens of the heavenly kingdom those who do not conform. The rebellion against “our establishment” is understandable in the light of the current revolt against the sham and pretence of all such citadels of orthodoxy.

However, we need to realize that there are thousands who are crusading for reform from within. We should not underestimate what is taking place. Changes in the thought patterns of ponderous structures always come slowly and those made in religious structures are the slowest of all. This may be good for religion involves our deepest feelings and innermost emotions. We should not sacrifice the discoveries, gains and values of the past in a mad rush to reach a higher plane. Mountain steeps are best climbed slowly and with due regard for the supply base.

Our brethren are under a great deal of tension. They do not want to throw the chart and compass away, but they have been misusing them as weapons against the brethren, rather than using them as steering guides. The primary purpose of a compass is not as a knuckle-duster to clout brethren over the head. Now there is a genuine appeal to get on with the task at hand rather than running in crazy circles around some of the issues which have engrossed our attention. I think we will eventually get back on course and when we do we will find others there who are also piloting their lives by the bright and morning Star.

Probably the easiest thing to do in this age of restlessness and uneasiness would be to desert and “go over the hill,” but I am not about to quit. The fact is, I am just getting started. If there are those who are waiting for me to shut up shop and retire to a cave of Adullam they are due for a sad disappointment. I intend to stay with the brethren I have always known and to work for the Master from this base, revealing the sheer folly of our divisions and encouraging all who will listen to labor for fellowship and unity.

I shall not be scared off, shoved out, or shaken loose. I have been around enough to know that there are problems wherever you go and I don’t want to swap the problems that I am familiar with for new ones that I might not understand. I do not know how a dog would better himself by trading the fleas he has scratched and fought so long, for strange ones that might not understand his disposition!

I can sympathize with those in scholastic disciplines who are taught to think for themselves, and who find that the one place they are not allowed to do so is in the congregation. It must be a little difficult for some of them to listen repeatedly to our pious platitudes which are calculated to augment our apathy and commend our complacency. Surely it is a letdown to come from the campus where the air is rife with discussion about such matters as the population explosion, hunger, famine, war, and the rights of mankind, to hear a dissertation on why we do not contribute to Herald of Truth or use individual cups in the Lord's Supper.

But there is an oasis of concerned ones in almost every splinter among us, dry and desert though it may seem. And these need the encouragement of all the rest of us. As for myself, the word "depression" is not in my spiritual vocabulary. I am confident that God can take our few little sardines and wiener buns and feed a multitude. I do not think the Holy Spirit has retired on social security. It is my task to plant and water; it is God's work to give the increase. If I fulfill my responsibility He will not fail in His part. I have no qualm or doubt about the outcome. I am glad our brother is staying. I urge all of our younger brethren not to defect. We shall win the battle for returning sanity in a movement which has been tearing at its own flesh. One of these days we shall see fellowship in its true light and will be able to join hands with all of God's children to bring a powerful witness in our neo-pagan world. In the meantime we count it a pleasure to hear from any of our brothers and sisters on the college or university campus. You are an inspiration to me, and I hope I can be an encouragement to you.

The Crisis of Change

Slavery is that which cramps powers. The worst slavery is that which cramps the noblest powers. Worse, therefore, than he who manacles the hands and feet is he who puts fetters on the mind, and pretends to demand that men shall think, and believe, and feel thus and thus, because others so believed, and thought, and felt before. (Sermons by Frederick W. Robertson, page 213).

The Good News which Jesus authorized to all the world consisted of seven facts. These related to his life, death, burial, resurrection, ascension, coronation and glorification. The first five were attested by the personal experience of the apostles who were required to company with him during his entire public ministry from his baptism until he was taken up from them. The last two were certified by a manifestation both visible and audible of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost.

These seven facts were first presented only to Jews and proselytes, and when they embraced them by faith, and were immersed by the authority of Jesus, they constituted the first community of the saved ones by the blood of atonement. Their recognition of Jesus of Nazareth as the Messiah of the prophets did not convert them from their exclusive “Jewishness” and they had no thought of forming any association outside of the pale of Judaism.

Having grown up in an atmosphere of tolerance for sundry viewpoints which enabled Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes and others to gather at the same temple and participate together in the same liturgy, they expected to compose a Messianic sect in which the circumcised ones who regarded Jesus as the Messiah could share in a communal relationship while remaining within the framework of the law.

There was no intention of forming a “Christian church” and many saints suffered persecution and death without knowing they were expected to be “Christians.” Certainly the term would have been meaningless to Stephen who died for the faith. The first disciples continued to share in the temple worship at the hours of prayer, to circumcise their children and observe the law. The apostles, who were orthodox in practice, kept the dietary laws meticulously, and Peter assured God that he was kosher, long after Pentecost.

There was no discord among them as to their relationship to Judaism and “they continued daily with one accord in the temple.” In their homes they ate together in small groups, maintaining that hospitality which Jerusalem Jews had always shown to their foreign brethren, and at the principal meal each day they partook of the bread and fruit of the vine, in memory of Jesus who had enjoined them to do this until he returned.

They created no special days or hours of worship with the exception of gatherings for united prayer when persecution drove them together to call upon God to grant them boldness. Otherwise they remained in the synagogues where they had been wont to study and read the law, the psalms and the prophets.

When a persecutor, breathing out threats of death against the Messianists, wanted to arrest them in the capital city of Syria, he requested letters from the high priest addressed to the rulers of the synagogues, demanding that any believers in Jesus among their number be delivered up to be bound and transferred to Jerusalem for trial. There was no separate or segregated group in Damascus.

These primitive saints observed the customs and traditions, and kept the law, being zealous for it. They celebrated the passover and other days of national significance. In their new relationship created in the belief that they had found the Prince of life, and had recognized the Holy One and the Just, they experienced a sense of closeness which enabled them to exhibit joy, so that in praising God they found favor with all the populace, and daily their number was augmented by those who were being made whole through trust in the Messiah.

They were Jews and their natural inclinations and prejudices remained deeply ingrained in them. This was especially true of those members of the sect of the Pharisees who became believers, for these were the uncompromising proponents of the law. Too, the human failing of cupidity raised its ugly head above the serene and placid surface and the first two of their number who died, perished by divinely administered retribution for greed, conspiracy and falsehood.

At the original proclamation there were Jews present from every nation then in existence and those who accepted Jesus as the Messiah were drawn from both the Hebrews, or Palestinian Jews, and the Hellenists, or Greek-speaking Jews. The latter often tended to be more liberal in association with non-Jews than the former and were sometimes suspect because of this. The first discontent in the new community arose between these two groups.

It was traditional with every synagogue that it was responsible for the sustenance of the widows who found a haven within it. Deacons, or almoners, regularly made collections which were employed to purchase the necessities of life for the poor. The new synagogue of Messianists followed this procedure of caring for dependents. However, the Greek-speaking Jews alleged that favoritism was being shown and their widows were being neglected.

The apostles, who had been receiving funds, and distributing food each day, asked to be relieved of the time-consuming task and requested the company to choose from their number seven honest men of reputation whom they could appoint over the business of supplying needs. All were highly pleased with the suggestion and averted future criticism by selecting only Hellenists, including a proselyte of Antioch with the others.

THE GATHERING STORM

The subsequent calm was disturbed when various foreign Jews engaged in a debate with Stephen, one of the seven, who was charged with treason and haled before the Sanhedrin. In his defense he argued that any place where God confronted man was a holy place, and that the fathers had met God in Chaldea, Egypt and Midian, and that the very law was given on a mount outside of Palestine. Thus, Jerusalem was not unique, and God could not be confined to a temple constructed by men.

This speech with its implications of God's universal concern so inflamed the hearers that they stopped their ears and ran to assault Stephen, while gritting their teeth in uncontrollable rage. They hustled him out of the city which they regarded as holy, and murdered him by beating his body into a pulp with rocks.

The action of the court, in open defiance of the Roman law, kindled the fire of persecution in the heart of a young rabbinical student from Tarsus, who was in the city as a student of the Hillel School. In an action, bordering upon the berserk, he broke into private dwellings and dragged men and women from their homes, throwing them in prison. The helpless disciples fled the city with the exception of the apostles, all of whom were Palestinian Jews, and regarded as orthodox.

Those who were forced to flee went everywhere telling the Good News that the Messiah had come. One of the seven went to Samaria and found a ready reception for the Message. When the apostles heard that the Samaritans had received the word of God they sent Peter and John to investigate, because the Jews had in the past had no dealings with the Samaritans, although the latter were circumcised. When they ascertained the correctness of the report they prayed that the Holy Spirit might be received by those who had been immersed in the name of the Lord Jesus.

Meanwhile, the chief persecutor had undergone a shaking experience while en route to a foreign capital to arrest believers. He encountered the Messiah just outside the city walls, and was blinded by the heavenly vision. When he was led by the hand into the city and taken to the house of Judas on Straight Street, he was so stricken that he could not eat or drink for three days. At the end of this period one of the very persons whom he had come to arrest visited him with the result that his sight was restored and he was baptized.

Immediately he entered into the very synagogues to which the high priest had given him letters of authority and introduction, and proclaimed that the Messiah was God's Son. All of the Jews were astonished at this turn of events, but when they attempted to contradict the former rabbinical student, he refuted their arguments with ease, and proved that the Nazarene was unquestionably the Messiah.

Unable to meet him on the forensic level, the Jews conspired to murder him from ambush, and placed a guard at the city gates on an around-the-clock basis. However, their quarry escaped over the wall and returned to Jerusalem, where the Messianists were afraid of him and refused to believe that he had changed. A Cypriot Jew vouched for his story, and when he was accepted, he inaugurated a discussion with the very Hellenists whose act of murder had started his own career of pillage and slaughter.

When they plotted to do away with him the brethren learned about it and spirited him away to Caesarea from which he returned to his boyhood home of Tarsus. The historian records, "Then had the churches rest throughout all Judea and Galilee and Samaria, and were edified; and walking in the fear of the Lord, and in the comfort of the Holy Spirit, were multiplied." The community of believers was still safely Jewish. Not an uncircumcised person had found his way into it. Perhaps none would ever find acceptance with many of the original Jerusalem company.

THE OPENING DOOR

Then occurred an astonishing event which was fraught with explosive potential. Peter had visited the saints at Lydda and while there learned of the death of a member of the widow ministry at Joppa. He went to the seaport town and raised her and presented her to the saints and widows who had been "enrolled in the number." He remained in the city dwelling with a man who operated a tanner's vat, who also was named Simon.

About this time an angel appeared to a Roman military captain stationed at Caesarea, while he was praying about three o'clock in the afternoon. The angel informed him that his prayers had been heard and instructed him to send to Joppa and call for Peter to come and tell him what to do. He immediately dispatched two slaves and a soldier who was his personal bodyguard, on the mission.

The next day as the envoys were nearing the city about noon. Peter became very hungry, but because of the delay in luncheon preparations went to the house-top to pray. He fell into a trance in which he envisioned a great vessel descending from heaven and containing all kinds of unclean animals. A voice instructed him to arise and slay the animals and eat. Peter resisted and declared he had never violated the kosher laws. The voice addressed him again with the words, "Do not refer to that as common which the Lord has cleansed." This occurred three times, after which the container was drawn back into heaven.

Peter was in a quandary as to the significance of the vision but even while he was revolving it in his mind the emissaries from Caesarea were approaching the house. Peter was informed by the Holy Spirit that he should accompany the men, and the next day, accompanied by six Jewish disciples he went with them. When he arrived at the home of the military captain, Peter at once informed him that his presence should not be considered as endorsement, and it was not lawful for him as a Jew to associate with, or even enter the house of a non-Jew. He made it clear that, except for the vision, he would not have come at all.

Although Peter was a herald of the Good News about Jesus and had learned three days previously that an angel had instructed the army captain to send for him to hear words from him, his reluctance to share the message with the uncircumcised household was evidenced in his opening question, "Let me ask what you had in mind in sending for me."

When Peter became convinced that God really wanted the Gentile gathering to hear about Jesus, he recounted what had transpired, but pointed out that the word was sent unto the children of Israel and the witnesses were commanded to preach to the people (Jews). While he was saying that "whosoever believes in him shall receive forgiveness of sin," the Holy Spirit descended on the whole Gentile company. The six Jews who had come with Peter were astounded at this phenomenon, and could hardly believe that the Gentiles were given such a token of God's grace. While they questioned what had happened Peter demanded if any one of them would dare deny the right of these Gentiles to be immersed.

However, when Peter arrived in Jerusalem, the circumcision party in the congregation attacked him for associating and eating with Gentiles who were uncircumcised. Peter rehearsed all that had transpired and summoned the six Jews as witnesses. He made it clear that he would not have gone except for the vision and that he would not have encouraged the Gentile household if it had not been for the Spirit. “Who was I to oppose God in this situation?”

Although this silenced the immediate opposition, it soon became obvious that many of the Palestinian Jewish disciples had no intention of opening the door to the uncircumcised on a wholesale basis. It seems evident that they regarded the incident at Caesarea as unique and only in case of a direct demonstration by the Spirit would they reluctantly immerse Gentiles in the Name.

It was different with some of the Hellenists who had been driven out of Jerusalem at the time of Stephen’s murder. At first those who fled to Cyprus, Syria and Phoenicia limited their proclamation only to Jews. Then, some of the more daring and liberal ones, who came to Antioch, the cultural capital, proclaimed Jesus as Lord to the Greeks. A great number believed and turned from their idols.

When word of this seeped back to Jerusalem, they sent Barnabas to investigate what was happening. The choice of a delegate was fortunate. A Cypriot, Barnabas was a good man who was full of faith and the Spirit. He rejoiced upon beholding the manifestation of God’s grace, and encouraged the new converts to cling to the faith. He went to Tarsus and located Saul and brought him to Antioch, where these two Hellenists labored without prejudice or racial bias.

Meanwhile, the circumcision party in Jerusalem, bent on confining the Way to a Jewish sect, and without consent of the whole company, dispatched certain of their number to Antioch to inform the brethren that their salvation was contingent upon their submitting to circumcision after the manner of Moses. Paul and Barnabas, recognizing that the universal purpose of God was in jeopardy, boldly challenged these teachers from Jerusalem. When the dispute became heated it was decided that Paul and Barnabas, with some others, should go to Jerusalem and lay the question before the apostles and elders. The circumcision party would not have consented to this if they had not thought that their position would be upheld.

Paul took Titus, a young Greek, as a test case. If Titus was forced to be circumcised in Jerusalem the case for freedom would be lost; if he returned uncircumcised the attempt to make the called out ones a mere Messianic sect would be thwarted. The community of the saints never faced a more crucial test. Only the Holy Spirit could keep it from fragmenting into a splintered movement, with one headquarters at Jerusalem and another at Antioch.

Paul and Barnabas received a cordial welcome from the apostles and elders, as well as from the Jerusalem community. They reported on their achievements in the pagan environment and the basis upon which they had received believers from the Gentile world. It was at this juncture the circumcision party threatened to disrupt the proceedings.

Members of the Pharisaical sect who had become Messianists demanded that all Gentiles be circumcised as essential to being in the fellowship. The battle centered around Titus. Men who pretended to be brethren, but were not a part of the community, were secretly brought in and put forward to contend against Paul and upset the meeting. But Paul was adamant. He refused to allow them to touch Titus or to bring him into bondage to their legalism. The issue was clearly drawn.

Will men be saved by works of the flesh, or by grace through faith?

In a public meeting, after lengthy and stormy debate. Peter arose and took his stand. “We believe that it is by the grace of the Lord Jesus that we are saved, and so are they.” This marked a decisive turn in the proceedings. Paul and Barnabas recited the list of miracles by which God had attested and confirmed their labors among the Gentiles. But the one man whose decision would most count was James. Already he was venerated as the most respected leader in the Jewish community. His orthodoxy was unquestioned.

Hegesipus relates how James went daily to the temple to pray for the forgiveness of the people, and how through long periods of kneeling, his knees became hard and worn like those of a camel. His integrity and equitable dealing earned for him the name of “The Just,” or “the Oblias,” which means “the bulwark of the people.” Just as every synagogue had three “pillars” or supports, so the Messianic community looked to Peter, James and John. Clement of Alexandria says that James served in the same capacity as the ruler of a synagogue, that is, the first among equals.

The judgment of James was that no irksome restrictions should be imposed upon the Gentiles turning to God, but that they should simply be instructed to keep the four Noachan precepts. The Jews believed that when Noah, as the father of all mankind, came forth from the ark, that God lifted the ban on the eating of animal flesh which had existed to make ante-diluvian man a vegetarian. It was also a matter of tradition that in conjunction with the permission to eat flesh, God demanded of Noah and his descendants that they abstain from things polluted by contamination with idols, from fornication, from that which had been killed by strangulation, and from blood.

Since these principles were given long before the law of Moses, and were universal in application, the whole community saw the wisdom of not binding anything which was distinctly Jewish upon the Gentiles. They decided to write a letter incorporating the suggestion of James. The conference ended in a compromise. Peter, James and John would go to the Jews and would continue to tell them to circumcise their children; Paul and Barnabas would go to the Gentiles and instruct them that it was not necessary for them to be circumcised. The terms of the compromise were clearly stated by James himself a long time afterward (Acts 21:21, 25).

This meant that the community of believers on earth would find their unity in Jesus and not in uniformity of thought or practice. Jew and Gentile would hear the same good news and in accepting it would acknowledge the same Lord, so there would be but one body in Him, but cultural and environmental differences would regulate their approach to Him. There would continue to be differences between attitudes in Jerusalem and Antioch, but they would not affect the fellowship in Christ.

It is always easier to agree to a thing theoretically than to apply it practically. Although the Jerusalem community amicably agreed not to bind circumcision on the Gentiles they continued as a segregated congregation, refusing to eat with the uncircumcised. The community at Antioch was the first integrated congregation. This created a problem for Peter who was one of the chief spokesmen in the Jerusalem fellowship forum, and who helped draft the letter to the Gentile communities.

When Peter paid a visit to Antioch he entered into the spirit of the community and indulged in the love feasts at the communal table with all of the brethren. But when he learned that certain brethren had come from James, and that the report would be conveyed to Jerusalem that he was eating with the uncircumcised, he quickly divided the brethren and refused to be seen eating with those not of the circumcision. The factional spirit was kindled until even Barnabas and other Jewish brethren joined in the exclusivistic attitude.

Paul wrote thus about the occasion, “Later, however, when Cephas came to Antioch I had to oppose him publicly, for he was then plainly in the wrong. It happened like this. Until the arrival of some of James’ companions, he, Peter, was in the habit of eating his meals with the Gentiles. After they came, however, he withdrew and ate separately from the Gentiles— out of sheer fear of what the Jews might think. The other Jewish Christians carried out a similar piece of deception and the force of their bad example was so great that even Barnabas was affected by it.”

It is evident from this that those in the Jerusalem community did not eat with the Gentiles, and while they were willing to accept their admission at distant points they did not receive them at home. Paul called Peter’s hand for trying to bind this discriminatory attitude on a community where both races were integrated as equals.

History confirms the fact that the idea of making the community of believers another Jewish sect died hard and slowly. Even after the apostles were long since departed there remained many who were zealous of the law. Justin Martyr in his “Dialogue with Trypho the Jew” writes, “As for the Jews who, professing to believe in Christ, would yet compel the converts from paganism to adhere to the whole law of Moses, under pain of perdition, I cannot recognize them as belonging to the church.”

It was not easy for men to forget their early teaching and background. Thus there were Jews in the community who thought that every person must be circumcised after the manner of Moses in order to be saved. There were Gentiles who believed there might be something to idols. “For some, who until now have been used to idols, eat the meat as meat really sacrificed to a god, and their delicate conscience is thereby injured.” Yet these were in Christ and were instructed to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

One thing is apparent. The primitive saints were not conformists. One congregation differed from another. Jerusalem and Antioch were not alike. There were grave cultural differences which were bridged only by mutual love for the Lord Jesus. He who makes it appear that the lifetime of the apostles was a period when all was rosy and pleasant does not recognize the facts. Their very letters were written because of turmoil and friction. The many exhortations to mend their ways and to live in peace are indicative of the problems which arose.

IMPLICATIONS FOR OUR DAY

Let us repeat that the smug assumption that the community of the saints during the lifetime of the apostles was a smooth-running organization of conformists is shown to be fallacious in the light of history and the new covenant scriptures. Thus, the real goal of restoration-minded believers in our day should be the recapture of the noble spirit of tolerance which preserved the one body from disintegrating under serious tensions and stresses.

Men have sought for the recovery of forms and rituals and “acts of worship,” and in their feverish search for that which may never have existed in fact, have fragmented into hostile splinter movements. The unfortunate state which we have allowed to happen is the very thing the apostles and elders at Jerusalem sought to prevent. They were successful because of a firm resolution not to bind upon the brethren anything which was not essential to a personal relationship with God. It is a pertinent question whether we have any right to bind upon immersed believers anything beyond the four things which were bound upon Gentile converts. What else would the apostles bind if they were living today?

It is absurd and asinine to divide the saints of God over such questions as the millennium, for example. By no stretch of the imagination can this issue be made as important as was circumcision. The same attitude which prevailed at Jerusalem would have prevented our shameful and disgraceful schism over such matters. Why did the brethren not give each other the right hand of fellowship to go to their respective areas without seeking to bind their dogmatic decrees upon one another and frustrate the grace of God?

It is useless for men to plead that they are “patterning after the early church,” so long as they allow such matters to divide them. Their action is as contrary to the attitude of the apostles and elders at Jerusalem as anything can be. Only the densest ignorance can equate our position with the spirit of the primitive saints. The scholarly world will see through the hypocrisy which pays lip-service to restoration while denying the very essence of that original spirit.

It seems almost incredible that men with doctoral degrees in such liberal arts colleges as Abilene Christian College or George Pepperdine College could be so provincial and naive as to condone and even try to defend the factional barriers created over matters such as a view of the millennium. Surely our brethren are sadly lacking in their theology. Surely they have a warped view of the ancient order of things.

This becomes even more apparent if you substitute one of our “issues” for the word “circumcision” and if you insert the name of one of our chief centers for Jerusalem or Antioch in the apostolic writings. “But some men came down from Nashville and were teaching the brethren, ‘Unless you espouse the millennium according to the custom of the Gospel Advocate you cannot be saved.’” Or again, “But some believers who belonged to the amillennial party rose up, and said. It is necessary for them to embrace the amillennial position and observe the creed of the loyal church.”

Why can we not realize that in Christ Jesus neither premillennialism or amillennialism is of any avail, but faith working through love?

More than anything else in our day we need to restore to the saints that spirit of Christ which will enable us to “lead a life worthy of the calling to which we are called.” It is manifested “with all lowliness and meekness, with patience forbearing one another in love.” It makes us eager “to maintain the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.” Of what value are forms and structures, doctrines and dogmas without this?

The apostle Paul, more than many others of his day, caught the vision that the herald of Christ did not force others to adapt to himself in order to hear the message. Instead the proclaimer subjected himself as a slave to others that the influence of a slave might capture them for Christ. “For though I am free from all men, I have made myself a slave to all, that I might win the more.” A slave does not assert himself, he does not debate or argue with one whose slave he is.

Paul became as a Jew, as one under the law, as one outside the law, as one who was weak. He said, “I have become all things to all men, that I might by all means save some.” There were things which Paul regarded as important to himself and his faith personally which he was willing to forego for the sake of others; there were things important to others that he was willing to adopt while among them. He did not ask anyone to adapt to him but he adapted himself to everyone. “I have become all things to all men, that I might by all means save some.”

All things, all men, all means— what a terrific approach to the saving of men! What maturity, what stature, what freedom! “I do it all for the sake of the gospel, that I may share in its blessings.” Paul was clear as to the content of the gospel. He did not confuse it with anything else, not even with the apostolic doctrine. The gospel was superior to all else. It was the message about a person. There is a difference between that which produces life and that which sustains it.

This concept is vital to our need of today. If we elevate every trivial discussion to the realm of gospel, we can make no overtures, for to do so would compromise the gospel, in our warped view. But if we restore the gospel to proper perspective and realize that our controversial issues are no part of the kerygma, the proclamation, we can make adjustments without forsaking the gospel. We must restore the vocabulary of the Holy Spirit or wallow in a welter of semantic involvements, while men go to hell and the world burns down around our persons.

The tragedy of our day is that men confuse the very spirit of tolerance and longsuffering enjoined upon us by Christ Jesus with unworthy softness and spiritual effeminacy. They regard as deadly poisonous plants the very flowers which God has planted to beautify and grace his heritage. They put light for darkness and darkness for light even as they profess to be guides for the blind. They seek to extinguish the one spark which alone can make our lives wholesome and enlightening.

It is absurd to assume that the way of love which makes allowances for one another is the easy way. It is the most difficult of all ways. It is only when one grows into such maturity that he realizes the bigness of the universe that he does not try to circumscribe it with his own narrow and feeble thought-processes. To love and revere those who differ because they are the offspring of a common Father, and to view the relationship thus established as more vital than the peculiarities of those within it is no task for little souls. The cult of conformity is the habitat of the contracted heart!

Satan never enforced a more subtle or damnable strategy than when he seduced the children of God into thinking that the way to prove their loyalty to the Father was by separating from His children over matters of opinion and intellectual perception. And hell rejoices and the demons clap hands in glad abandon because the heirs of heaven have been brainwashed into thinking that love unlimited is dangerous. The wicked one can take a holiday as long as he can employ us in throwing his fiery darts at one another. Love that will not function in spite of differences is not brotherly love at all!

A NEW LOOK

We need to take a new look at ourselves in the light of God's record of the primitive saints. Are the things over which we have divided really as important as we have made them to appear? It is evident that many of them cannot compare in gravity with some of the problems which affected the early communities of believers. If those communities could remain unbroken in spite of serious divergencies, how can we justify our fragmentation over inferior matters?

Are our factional emphases as important to God as they are to us? Does the Father think so little of his children that he would rather have the fabric of the family torn to shreds than to have them study the Bible in classes, or use individual cups to distribute the fruit of the vine?

Have our fathers in a previous age of debate and controversy projected their views and interpretations as the will of God, and saddled us with a system which makes our plea for unity the butt of ridicule among thinking and perceptive people? Are we committed to the perpetuation of strife and division out of a false sense of loyalty to the framers of our partisan tests and creeds. Shall we continue to lay upon the shoulders of our children a yoke which neither we nor our fathers were able to bear?

We revere those who broke with the false systems of the past to bring us thus far on the path to a brighter day. But if our ancestors are to be honored because they sought to undo the mistakes of their fathers, can we honor their memory by breathing life into the body of their own errors? Can we be worthy sons of our sires if we plod blindly along in their footprints without the courage to launch out upon our own and blaze a new trail of compassion and understanding through the jungle of sectarian complexity into which our factional attitudes have lured us?

If the restoration plea was valid when applied to the sects of the first half of the nineteenth century why will it not be equally valid to apply to our own parties in the last half of the twentieth century? Is the schism which we damn in others to be applauded in us? If we can plead with others to go back beyond their divisions to the apostolic proclamation as the hope of unity why can we not go back beyond ours to the same great rallying point, the cross of Jesus?

I know not what course others may take, but as for me, I shall seek to return to the abiding values of the apostolic era. I shall seek to revive in my heart and life the fruits of the Holy Spirit, and to recapture the generosity and tenderhearted concern for all of my brethren which will make it possible to be forgiving as God in Christ forgave me. I want to be made new in mind and spirit, to put on the new nature of God's creating which shows itself in the just and devout life called for by the truth. I want to let love for the brotherhood breed warmth of genuine affection.

Without these things whatever is restored will be an empty shell, a vacant hull, a decaying corpse. Of what value is it to clean the outside of the cup or dish while the inside is greasy with self-indulgence? To what avail shall we meticulously pay tithes of our modern mint, dill and cummin, while we overlook the weightier demands of justice, mercy and faith? I am wearied with the spirit of Pharisaism which contrives new modes of travel over land and sea to win one convert, only to make him twice as factional and partisan as those who boast of his accession.

Let us restore the ideal of God, not by first recapturing every jot and tittle, but by recovery of the lost nail from which everything in the law and prophets were meant to be suspended. What good will be done by codes of conduct, rules of ritual and precepts of priesthood, if we have nothing upon which to hang them? “And indeed this command comes to us from Christ himself: that he who loves God must also love his brother” (1 John 4:21).

Absolute Proof

Mission Messenger (February 1968)

Volume 30

[Abstract]

A young friend whom we have never met, but who is attending a prominent state university, writes to ask if we can produce in simple and useable fashion absolute proof of the existence of God. It seems that if we cannot do so he is ready to become a skeptic and abandon what he has been taught from childhood in order to maintain what he defines as his “intellectual integrity.”

I take all such letters seriously but I must confess that they do not perturb me as they do a lot of those in my generation. I rather expect such communications from those who are freshmen and sophomores in college because I realize that they are passing through a period when they must question and re-evaluate all they have been taught in order to arrive at a personal and disciplined faith. We cannot always go through life trusting for support upon what our fathers and grandfathers believed. We must fight our way through the jungle of terrifying doubts until we emerge into the sunlight on our own.

At a certain time in our lives we are betrayed by our very inexperience, coupled with our search for assurance and meaning, into demanding dogmatic data upon which to rest our case. Increasing growth toward maturity eventually leads us to the place where we recognize that happiness in the intellectual and moral sphere is not contingent upon a collection of correlated propositions in a well arranged catalogue. God cannot be reduced to a mathematical equation nor relegated to a table of contents.

An absolute is one thing and absolute proof of the absolute is a wholly different thing. There may be no absolute proof for the simple reason that the prover is fallible and all of his proof must be relative. The finite cannot embrace the infinite with reason nor encompass the ultimate with logic. God is greater, if he is God, than any criteria we have by which to measure. But the fact that a package is greater than the range of a scale to weigh, does not prove the parcel does not exist. It but proves the inadequacy of the device upon which we depend for ascertaining weight.

Now one is not dependent for well-being solely upon what he can test or prove by the limited criteria available unto him. He may project himself upon wings of faith beyond the reach of rational proof. One may see with a powerful telescope that which is outside the range of his gun, and he may envision with the eyes of the inner being that which cannot be bagged by the weapon of logic. Faith is as much an attribute of the spirit as reason, and the man who refuses to employ it is as handicapped as one who blinds an eye until it is atrophied from disuse.

It is a fallacy to assume that everything can be proven or must be proven to be believed. Such an assumption itself would have to be proven in order to be accepted. There is ample evidence available that men have fervently believed things which they could not finally prove and have been as profoundly changed by that faith as if they could test the reality in a laboratory or an experimental research. If the ultimate proof of God's existence available to man is the effect of his transforming penetration into our personality, such a change achieved by faith is as meaningful as if we could establish it by a logical process.

To merely prove the existence of God as another fact of intellectual perception, or to have a prize book on the library shelf dealing with the logical sequence essential to arriving at the conclusion is useless. If God is personal the real proof must be person-to-person, and it must lie in the rising above the purely human and the triumph over the natural.

The inability of man to present absolute proof constitutes no ground for affirming the non-existence of God. To so affirm would mean that the one making the declaration possessed unlimited knowledge and infinite vision. Everyone who promulgates the proposition that there is no God ends up by making himself a God. If man is powerless to present absolute proof of God's existence, his powerlessness does not constitute absolute proof of God's non-existence. No fact is affected by the ability or inability of one to prove it. The fact is one thing, the ability to prove it is something else, and outside of the fact itself.

Our friend who rejects God for want of absolute proof can turn to nothing else for security. If he predicates his "intellectual integrity" upon such proof as he requires he will eventually be unable to build upon science or any other scholastic discipline for none of these can furnish absolute proof. Thus, his reaction is not intellectual at all, but anti-intellectual. Integrity is not conditioned upon demand for absolute proof in advance of faith, but upon unprejudiced examination of data as it is disclosed or discovered, and the interpretation and acceptance of all such data as appears to be relevant, with a mind held open for reception of additional testimony which may subsequently appear.

It possibly gives one who is forced to re-examine the grounds of his faith by exposure to new ideas on the college campus, a real feeling of sophistication to announce that he is rejecting his childhood faith to maintain "intellectual integrity." Being a lot older and having long since passed through the same stage of development, I trust that I may be excused for smiling rather than exhibiting the profound shock which such announcements are intended to provoke in old fuddy-duddies and traditionalists like myself. You see I do not equate intellectuality with arrival at such doubts any more than letting your hair grow down to your collar as a freshman or taking up smoking a pipe as a sophomore.

Most of us in our intellectual development are like a wasp, which is bigger when first hatched out than at any other time. Fortunately some of us live long enough to be able to look back with a patronizing smile upon our former selves, and to learn that the truly sophisticated do not measure the universe finally and irrevocably by their own feeble and limited resources and thought processes. Once we quit playing God it is much easier to resume praying to him. And we need to pray!

As for myself, I have examined the available data related to God and revelation, and I humbly accept for my own life in simple trusting faith the existence of God and the authenticity and genuineness of his word. When I see rabbit tracks in the newly fallen snow I cannot prove absolutely that the rabbit exists but I believe that if I patiently follow the tracks I will eventually see the rabbit. There are too many God-tracks on the face of the universe for me to ignore. I'm following them with confident anticipation that some day I shall see him as he is. Does that strike you as sort of childlike? It is!

A Personal Decision

Mission Messenger (February 1968)

Volume 30

[Abstract]

I am not sure you will be the least bit interested in what I am going to tell you, but I felt an urge to share with you some personal attitudes about MISSION MESSENGER. It could be that I am unconsciously seeking justification for something and am not aware of my real motives. In any event, here is what happened.

Not long ago a group of fine brethren, possessed of a great deal of business acumen, set up a conference with me. They had been talking with one another about my work and they wanted to talk with me personally. They said a lot of very complimentary things about my writing and the paper and they implied that its impact had helped to spark a revolution in the restoration movement in our day.

They felt that I deserved a larger audience and they proposed to make the paper into a much larger monthly. They suggested a use of color, art work on the inside, a new format with varied type faces for chapter headings and a lot of other things. Space would be sold for legitimate advertising. The subscription price would be increased to $3.00 per year. They offered to raise $25,000 to finance the changes and underwrite the costs of production as a start. It was suggested that I be the editor and receive a salary, and that we have a managing editor as well as a contributiorial staff of writers selected purely on the basis of ability rather than on identification with any party or school of thought in the restoration movement.

I listened very carefully to the whole proposal and then I turned it down. I am sure these brethren think I am either stubborn or nearsighted. As it is, the paper is small and stereotyped in appearance. We have no office in which to edit it or from which to mail it except the room downstairs in our home. I have no secretary. There is no one to type the manuscripts except myself. And that's the way I want it.

Nell and I live a simple life. We believe it is the way He would want us to do. Our personal wants are few. We seek to serve God and all of His children without trying to impress anyone with a sense of importance which we know we do not have. I write the articles for the paper on planes, in air terminals, in hotel rooms, and at our own kitchen table. I read all of the proofs and I go get the papers when the printer notifies us that they are ready.

Nell takes care of all of the subscriptions, address changes and files. With the help of Emily (our daughter-in-law, Jerry's wife) she wraps the papers, addresses them and sorts them for mailing. When the eight mail sacks are ready I label them and take them to the post office. Every paper touches our hands. Each one is sent on its long journey by our own labor and with our prayers accompanying it.

We put many hours of our own lives into each issue. We see the names of our family of subscribers every month. We wonder how those in school are doing, we are interested in those who are parents. We are especially interested in those who are grandparents. We wonder if they know "The Joy" as we know Him. And because we never take one cent from the subscription price or contributions sent for the work it is a work of faith and a labor of love.

MISSION MESSENGER is not an organization. It is just us! And we know who we are, just down-home folks from the Missouri hills. We're interested in being ourselves and not someone else. I have no illusions of greatness about our feeble effort. I am not carrying on a crusade and I am not leading a movement. I am not much of an editor, and I do not aspire to be one.

All I want to do is to share what I think with all of our brethren who are in the fellowship of the concerned ones. I have a sort of old-fashioned notion that if you love people (really and truly) and write from the bottom of your heart, it will shine through and they'll read what you have to say if it is printed on brown wrapping paper salvaged from the meat market.

I do not want to write because I am a member of an organization or an incorporation. I'm sick and tired of having to organize something in order to be friendly and neighborly. I am weary of institutionalized religion. I am tired of vested interests and party machinery. So MISSION MESSENGER will continue to be plain in appearance as long as I have anything to do with it. It is for plain folks!

We have no trust funds, no endowments, no nothing! I've given orders that when I die, MISSION MESSENGER will die with me! We will bury it the day I'm buried! I want to share with others while I live but I do not want anything I've started to be used to pressure them after I am gone. We will not send any money back if a subscription has not expired at the same time I do. If you send a five year subscription you'd better pray that I live that long.

It costs us more than a dollar per year for each subscription, but we do not intend to raise the price, I like to know that a college boy can stick a dollar in a letter and tell us to send the paper for a year. The difference is always made up by friends and brethren who believe in what we are doing. The Holy Spirit did not whisper to us to start the paper and we have no information from the Spirit as to what we ought to write, beyond a firm trust in God and His blessed word! We also trust our brethren.

I would not want you to think that I do not appreciate the interest of the good brethren who would like to help us dress the paper up and make it a little more appealing. We thank them for their evidence of concern but we'll continue as we have been for as long as God allows us to serve.

There are a lot of journals which are very attractive. Many are doing a good work. We are not rivals or competitors with any of them. I like to mention them and urge others to read them, and especially if they make a direct attack upon us. We have nothing to lose but our souls, therefore, nothing to fear! Nothing! Best of all we're free in Christ. We can publish articles from anyone. We do not have to worry about what "the faithful brethren" will think.

This is not very businesslike, but we will keep on like we have been, and those who feel that we do not deserve reading can drop out. We'll love them just the same. We do hope to have the honor of retaining most of you for a long time and we trust you'll not be too disappointed that we have chosen to continue as plain individuals to put out a plain paper.

The Fellowship of the Unashamed

Mission Messenger (March 1968)

Volume 30

[Abstract]

The final address delivered at the Hartford (Ill.) Forum, December 29, 1967.

“For I am not ashamed of the good news concerning Jesus Christ, it is God’s dynamic to save every person who believes it, the Jew first, but the Greek also.”

I am not ashamed! This is the motto embroidered on the spiritual tunics of the mightiest fighting force ever mustered. It is engraved upon their shields. It is burnished upon their hearts. It has provided the motivation for successive generations to wage a war in which there can never be a negotiated settlement, and never a cessation of hostilities to pick up the wounded and bury the dead.

It is a relentless conflict, universal in its scope, involving men of every nation, kindred and tongue. And behind the curtains of the drama are the shadowy forms of the angels, divine emissaries to the flagging spirits of the hosts of light. Within the realm of the unseen are also the malicious and malevolent myriads, flying forth from the realm of darkness to incite to hate and to lash into fury.

Some there are who say it began at Pentecost— the Pentecost. And in some respects this is true. But if one could have stood like a giant colossus astride the turbulent stream of history upon that memorable day, and from his superior vantage point surveyed the whole panorama of human involvement he would have seen the line stretching out to become enfolded in the gray mists of both horizons.

Turning his face to the west, where the last rays of the dying sun transform every feathery cloud into a golden fleece, he would have seen what Vachel Lindsay referred to as “an endless line of splendor, these troops with heaven for home.” And he would have recognized the receding forms of some of them despite the intervening time and distance.

John the Baptizer, austere and uncompromising as the unsparing wilderness in which he grew to manhood. In his rude garment of camel’s hair caught up with a leather belt about the waist, a fiery denouncer of wrong, damning the lust of a demagogue, and because of his denunciation, shedding his blood upon the cold stone chopping-block of a gory dungeon.

Judas Maccabeus, stern iconoclast from the hill country of Galilee, brazenly challenging the might of a Syrian invasion force which had deliberately desecrated the sacred altar with the burning of the flesh of swine, and then smeared the rendered unclean fat upon the stones of the open court.

Daniel, of royal lineage, taken captive and deported to the sensual and profligate court of the proud monarch of Chaldea, stubbornly defying the order to eat at the king’s table, risking death rather than partake of the food which had been dedicated to Bel and Nebo, the national deities of Babylon.

Jeremiah, of the priestly family of Anathoth, called of God in the days when his nation reeled and staggered like a drunken man, called to write the epitaph of Jerusalem, called to write with tears gushing forth like a fountain, “How lonely sits the city that was full of people . . . She that was a princess among the cities has become a vassal.”

Elijah, implacable enemy of the treacherous and murderous Jezebel, calmly standing by the altar of God on the brow of Carmel as the frenzied priests of Baal danced and contorted themselves on the stones made slimy with their own gore, while they vainly entreated a deaf god to hear their frantic cries.

David, summoned from the sheep-cote to rule the flock of God, a curious combination of love and lust, of sweet songs and sordid standards, whose gentle plucking of a harp could bring tranquillity to a neurotic king, and who could steal the wife of his best friend, only to repent in a veritable torrent of grief.

Samuel, called of God to be the first national prophet, dispensing justice throughout his circuit, refusing to be tempted by political bribes, and resisting every evil conspiracy of the ancient Mafia.

Abraham, the father of the faithful, tuning his ear to hear the voice of God amidst the discordant clamor of the wild devotees of idolatry, and in obedience to that voice leaving his homeland and journeying to a destination known but to God.

These were men who freely admitted that they lived on earth as exiles and foreigners. They saw God’s promises at a distance and hailed them as true. They were convinced of their reality. They longed for a better country altogether, nothing less than a heavenly one. While they lived in tents like nomads they dared to dream of a city with solid foundations of which God himself is both architect and builder. And when the dreamless sleep closed their eyelids, they went as joyfully as travelers who set their sails for home. “These all died in faith.” The fellowship of the unashamed who lived and died before the creative Infinite allowed himself to be clothed in the flesh and sinews of a creeping infant, was a mighty army of those who “preferred sharing the burden of God's people to enjoying the temporary advantages of alliance with sinful nations." They "considered the reproach of Christ more precious than all the wealth of Egypt." Here is a paean of victory composed about them by one whose quill was dipped in the ink of the Spirit.

There is simply not time to continue by telling the stories of Gideon, Barak, Samson and Jephtha; of David, Samuel and the prophets. Through their faith these men conquered kingdoms, ruled in justice and proved the truth of God's promises. They shut the mouths of lions, they quenched the furious blaze of fire, they escaped from death itself. From being weaklings they became strong men and mighty warriors; they routed whole armies of foreigners. Women received their dead raised to life again, while others were tortured and refused to be ransomed, because they wanted to deserve a more honorable resurrection in the world to come. Others were exposed to the test of public mockery and flogging, and to the torture of being left bound in prison. They were killed by stoning, by being sawn in two; they were tempted by specious promises of release and then were killed with the sword. Many became refugees with nothing but sheepskins or goatskins to cover them. They lost everything and yet were spurned and ill-treated by a world that was too evil to see their worth. They lived as vagrants in the desert, or on the mountains, or in caves or holes in the ground.

All these won a glowing testimony to their faith, but they did not then and there receive the fulfillment of the promise. God had something better planned for our day, and it was not his plan that they should reach perfection without us.

The cross symbolized the change from promise to realization, from prophecy to fulfillment. It was God's hypodermic needle thrust beneath the skin of the lorn earth, the elemental mother of us all, and the reaction even of nature was violent. The earth convulsed and shivered and shook. The sun at its meridian was veiled with a sable curtain. For a little while it was as if time itself stood still until the sand resumed its flow from the upper hourglass. And when man raised his startled head and looked there was a new calendar on the wall.

The hand of God had reached down and the raking fingers had gathered all of the sin and degradation to which the human race had fallen heir, and the staggering burden was laid upon the sagging shoulders of the One on the tree. Like the scapegoat of antiquity he bore our transgressions to the far country through the portals of suffering and the gate of death. And then He came back and the glad sound of rejoicing was heard. "The Lord has risen and appeared"

Now the new army of faith, the fellowship of the unashamed, began to form and to march. And the casualties began to be registered on the battlefield. Stephen, eloquent and fervent was beaten and battered into a bruised pulp while he prayed for those who dashed the rocks against his quivering flesh. Homes were invaded, possessions confiscated and destroyed, and the saints thrown into prison. This was heralded as the signal for an onward movement under the banner of the King.

From the porticoes of the temple in Jerusalem into the environs of Judea, down to Samaria and on to Cyprus and Antioch. Here the torch was taken by a former enemy and carried to the islands of the sea, on to the great university center of Cilicia, through the rocky defile called "The Tarsian Gate," and down into the miasmatic plain and the malaria infested swampland of Asia, and up to the temple of Diana, lustful goddess of a thousand breasts suckling a venal priestcraft.

Then to fabled Troy, home of Priam and Hector, and of fair Helen whose face was so beautiful it launched a thousand ships. And at the summons of a midnight visionary visitor, across the Aegean Sea to Samothracia and on to Philippi on the River Strymon, “the deathbed of the Roman Republic.” Then along the great military highway. Via Egnatia, to Thessalonica with its mob, and then to sensual Corinth and intellectual Athens. And finally, borne in hands on which shackles clanked, into the dark recesses of the Mamertine Prison in Rome.

No earthly power could halt their triumphant processional. They invaded every part of the earth and penetrated every stratum of society. Eventually they toppled the tyrannical Caesars from their thrones and the cross which had been a badge of shame became the symbol of their conquest.

The heart pulsates more rapidly as one contemplates their fearless exploits on the frontiers of life, the eye grows moist and the vision becomes misty when one reads of the way in which they faced death. And admiration deepens and wonderment increases when it is realized that their magnificent accomplishments were achieved without any of the machinery deemed essential to promote and procure our own feeble successes.

The primitive liberation army had no buildings of its own. There were no cathedrals, no edifices, no suburban chapels with well-manicured lawns, stained-glass windows, or cushioned pews. They operated from the small homes of the members, from third-story walk-up halls, from caves and catacombs, and from dens in the earth.

They had no lighted signboards flashing forth their address, no printing presses, and no newspapers. They could not distribute scripture portions, or pass out copies of the new testament. They could not give chapter and verse. There were no journals, no bulletins or tracts; no inspirational volumes, no religious libraries, no duplicated lesson sheets.

There were no television sets, no radio stations and no telephones with which to correlate arrangements. There were no cars, no buses, no trains, and no planes to link together the far-flung outposts of the empire.

They had no bank accounts, no budgets, no endowments, no investments, no interest-bearing bonds or annuities. They established no institutions, chartered no organizations, and created no fraternal orders. They had no schools or colleges to train and polish their vanguard, no courses in hermeneutics or homiletics, no missionary societies to send them forth and sustain them, no conventions to draft resolutions to the Caesars or their procurators, no board of church extension, no council of agencies.

There were no promotional secretaries, no crusade directors, no headquarters on earth. They sought no prestige by parading before the world the politicians, professionals or actors within their number. There was no appeal to a pagan public through sensationalism, sophistication or fabrication.

Then what did they have?

The answer is found in their lives, their documents and the indictments of their enemies. First, they were aware of the astonishing change which had been wrought in their hearts by the Spirit who moved in when they unreservedly surrendered themselves to the Father and pledged allegiance to His Son. They remembered what they were before the hand of God had touched their lives. One of them wrote:

For at one time we ourselves in our folly and obstinacy were all astray. We were slaves to passions and pleasures of every kind. Our days were passed in malice and envy; we were odious to ourselves and we hated one another.

And they knew what had happened!

But when the kindness of God our savior and his love toward man appeared, he saved us in his mercy— not by virtue of any moral achievements of ours, but by the cleansing power of a new birth and the moral renewal of the Holy Spirit, which He gave us so generously through Jesus Christ our Savior. The result is that we are acquitted by his grace, and can look forward to inheriting life for evermore. This is solid truth; I want you to speak about these matters with absolute certainty, so that those who have believed God may concentrate upon a life of goodness.

This sense of constant communion with God at the altar of incense in the new sanctuary, the consecrated heart, bred in them an unquenchable ardor, and an unflagging zeal which bordered on quiet fanaticism. Their bodies were holy temples, the dwelling-place of Deity, and they not only lived for God, but with Him.

Gone was the emptiness and futility, gone the depression and sadness which had been theirs before the illumination burst upon them and exploded within them, and they had been welcomed into His precious presence. No longer was life meaningless and fruitless, a despondent plodding toward the grave of weary refugees from a wretched and doleful existence.

They had an overwhelming sense of mission which transcended every earthly value and every purely mundane consideration. They had been called out of the world to be sent back into it. Because the Master came into the world to seek and save the lost, they went into the world to seek and save. Like Him they came not to be ministered unto, but to minister and to give their lives.

There was no distance too great, no night too dark, no sea too wide, and no mountain too high, to keep them from attempting to reach the wandering and straying and to lead them gently home. The three “I am’s” of Paul in as many verses in Romans, chapter one, were the marching orders for every soldier in the army of the King. “I am not ashamed of the gospel;” “I am debtor both to the Greeks and to the Barbarians;” “I am ready to preach the gospel to you also.”

And it was this man who could say,

In my travels I have been in constant danger from rivers and floods, from bandits, from my own countrymen and from pagans. I have faced danger in city streets, danger in the desert, danger on the high seas, danger among false Christians. I have known exhaustion, pain, long vigils, hunger and thirst, doing without meals) cold and lack of clothing.

Listen again!

Yet every advantage that I had gained I considered lost for Christ’s sake. Yes, and I look upon everything as loss compared with the overwhelming gain of knowing Christ Jesus my Lord. For his sake I did in actual fact suffer the loss of everything, but I considered it useless rubbish compared with being able to win Christ. For now my place is in Him . . . How changed are my ambitions.

They lived in a constant state of jeopardy. They teetered daily on the brink of danger and physical disaster. They hazarded life itself and were so indifferent to the consequences that the pagans referred to them as “The Gamblers.” They played the game with utter abandon and their own lives were the stakes. They flung them down on the table of time, ready to lose them without a whine or whimper. They hungered and thirsted for the souls of men with a passion that could never be quenched or satisfied.

So they did not send missionaries, they went! And they made no such distinctions as home and foreign missions, for this earth was not their home. They readily acknowledged, “We have no permanent city here on earth, we are looking for one in the world to come.” When they stepped out of their houses into the street they were among pagans. Every saved person was a missionary, every lost person on earth an object of concern.

They had no pulpits to mount, no speaker's stands from which to orate. The counter of the merchant, the desk of the banker, the bench of the shoe cobbler, the plow handles of the farmer— these were their pulpits, and across them they faced their clients and visitors with hearts filled with concern, eyes filled with love, and lips filled with fervent testimony and eager pleading. And their number increased and their ranks multiplied until “their sound went out into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world.”

They had the vessel concept of life. Their very bodies were earthen vessels, made of clay by the master potter on the whirling wheel of destiny. And no vessel was useless. Every one was functional. The glorious gospel was a treasure beyond value. And they were the receptacles into which it had been poured, not to be hoarded but to be shared. “This priceless treasure we hold — so to speak, in a common earthenware jar— to show that the splendid power of it belongs to God and not to us.”

They were chosen vessels to bear his name throughout the earth, over land and sea, across mountains and through deep valleys, fulfilling the purpose of the Master. “If a man keeps himself clean from the contaminations of evil he will be a vessel used for honorable purposes, clean and serviceable for the use of the master of the household, all ready, in fact, for any good purpose.”

Thus the saints of the first centuries had three things: a divine relationship through the Spirit, a divine mission with the Spirit, and a divine service in the Spirit. They were consecrated, animated, motivated and activated by the Spirit. He was the Spirit of life, so theirs was the life of the Spirit in which there was no condemnation. In the power of the Spirit they went forth conquering and to conquer.

It is here that we have been betrayed into resting our hopes in that which cannot give life. We have sought to entice the world by piling up brick and stone in fantastic and bizarre shapes, and all too often we have gotten into our structures that to which we have appealed— the world) We have allured and attracted by sanitized nurseries, tiled kitchens, air-conditioned auditoriums and cushioned pews. But the world does not come. We must even push and pressure our own constituency to keep up our attendance figures.

We cajole those who come to get them to empty their purses into congregational coffers and threaten with hell those who are reluctant to heed, and we spend the bulk of what we get on our own comfort. We equate the expanding of our facilities with the growth of the kingdom, and measure the degree of our success in the number of rooms in our educational annex.

But we do not endure hardship as soldiers of Jesus Christ. And those who see through the tinsel and glitter, the sham and pretence of our frantic programs, are deserting. We pay a frightful toll in lost youth every year, and they do not leave because we have made Christianity too difficult, but because we have made it too easy! It requires little spirit of adventure to park your automobile in the parking lot and sit for an hour in an air-conditioned building listening to a well-dressed preacher harangue a pampered audience on the frightful sin involved in sending a part of the contribution to help support an old folk's home.

Thoughtful men see no real relationship between the reason for which they enlisted and the serious and involved arguments in business meetings over what color of shingles to put on the roof, or what color of tile to put on the restroom floors. In a world wrenched apart over such problems as life in the sordid and stinking rat-infested ghettos, the war in Vietnam, the population explosion, the famine in India, the increase of crime in the streets, dope addiction, the increase of illegitimacy and juvenile delinquency, we can no longer afford the thumb-twiddling luxury of casual preoccupation with trivialities and inconsequential.

It is for this reason I challenge you to become a vital part of the fellowship of the unashamed. Let us get the army out of the rocking-chairs and out where the rocks are flying. Let us quit acting like a peacetime patrol and begin fighting on the front lines and in the trenches. Instead of taking the danger out of life, let us restore it; instead of removing the risk, let us renew it. Let's move the battle from the mess hall back on the battlefield. Let's stop confusing the vineyard with the storage shed, and the wheatfield with the granary or air-conditioned elevator.

I challenge you to help turn our meeting-houses into arsenals, supply centers, ammunition dumps and training grounds. To quit talking about holding services and to start rendering them. A service is not sitting in a comfortable pew singing, "Must Jesus bear the cross alone?" Crosses were not made to sing about, but to carry and to die upon.

Service is entering into a life situation to supply a need—food for the starving, clothing for the naked, visitation for the imprisoned, medicine for the sick— and anything you can hold is not a service, for service must be given and not held. I challenge you to stop thinking that the service begins on Sunday morning at ten o'clock when you enter a religious structure, and start thinking of it as beginning on Monday morning when you enter the factory or office, or along the road or street as you go. Today there are many roads which lead down to Jericho, along which a man may fall among thieves!

I challenge you to cease the silly and inane practice of compartmentalizing life into some areas marked "sacred" and others marked "secular." Jesus came to remove for ever such categories and those who maintain them are living B.C. lives in an A.D. world. A man is as much a son of God while sitting at his breakfast table as he is while sitting at the Lord's table. He is worshiping God as much while singing to himself for the sheer joy of living as he drives his automobile along the freeway, as he is when a song director announces a hymn.

Every word of cheer one speaks to the disconsolate, every little act of kindness he performs out of reverence for the Father of mercies is an act of worship. Either every act we perform as a Christian is an act of worship, or none of them are. Love must be a fountain flowing freely all of the time. It is not turned on and off with a faucet or spigot on certain days or at certain hours.

I challenge us all to get up from lying in the cool shade by the wayside, to buckle on our packs and join the serried ranks of courageous souls marching with their feet in the mud but with heaven in their hearts. Let's go where the action is. Let's be in on the happening. We are expendable! If we die, let us die with our boots on, with our faces on the green turf and not on white pillows filled with down. Let those who search the battleground of life find us there, crumpled and still, but with our armor buckled on and our weapon still clutched in nerveless fingers, with a half smile frozen on our lips and our sightless eyes turned toward Jerusalem's walls.

I am a member of the fellowship of the unashamed!

I am not ashamed of Him who left the world of glory to be cradled in the virgin womb for nine months, and then to fight his way through pangs and paroxysms into this world of suffering and sadness. I am grateful that not one experience through which I have passed from the night of my conception did he escape, except my sin, and he atoned for that! I am thankful that Christianity did not begin with a book but with a baby, that it is personal and not merely a perusal. I am not ashamed of the way he entered the world of mankind!

I am not ashamed of the wonders which he performed to prove His divine mission. I make no apology for any of his miracles. I do not seek a way to explain them, nor do I seek to explain them away. I accept them. I glory in them. I rejoice in the blind eyes that were opened, the ears of the deaf that were unsealed, the very dead that were brought back to life and restored to the arms of their loved ones.

I am not ashamed of the cross which towers over the wrecks of time. It is a frightful memento of man's hate but an even greater monument to God's love. In it I find my hope. To its firm base I cling in moments when despair would threaten my sanity and temptation would wash me out into the unknown. I kneel before it in wonderment that it was for me he died, but I arise refreshed to return to the busy thoroughfares of life content to believe that he cares for me! If any man glory, let him glory in the cross!

I am not ashamed of the gospel, the good news, the joyous tidings! It is still God's dynamic to save every one who believes it. I know because that salvation has been mine to experience. It is mine now! It is mine in all of its fulness and assurance. It is not by works of righteousness that I have done. It is not reckoned according to works. It is the gift of grace. "Marvelous grace of our loving Lord, grace that exceeds our sin and our guilt."

This is the message that the world needs. It is the message that satisfies the God-craving in the human spirit. I have resolved that it will be my testimony while I am able to proclaim it, and when I feel the mist in my face, and the fog in my throat, I will not forget it.

The soul of Jesus is restless today;

Christ is tramping through the spirit-world,

Compassion in his heart for the fainting millions;

He trudges through China, through Poland,
Through Russia, Austria, Germany, Armenia;
Patiently he pleads with the Church,
Tenderly he woos her.

The wounds of his body are bleeding afresh for the sorrows of his shepherdless people.

We besiege him with selfish petitions,
We weary him with our petty ambitions,
From the needy we bury him in piles of carven stone,
We obscure him in the smoke of stuffy incense,
We drown his voice with the snarls and shrieks of our disgruntled bickerings,
We build temples to him with hands that are bloody,
We deny him in the needs and sorrows of the exploited “least of his brethren.”

The soul of Jesus is restless today,
But eternally undismayed.

A Marked Copy

Mission Messenger (March 1968)

Volume 30

[Abstract]

It is not an unusual thing for me to receive marked copies of papers and bulletins from brethren who feel they would like to have me read something of special interest. Thus I was not much surprised to receive a mimeographed copy of a letter sent out by a preacher to his congregation to warn the saints of the grave danger involved in reading after certain men. The marked portion read as follows:

Perhaps the most controversial figure on our list is Carl Ketcherside, of St. Louis, Missouri. He is a prodigious writer and even some of the faithful brethren have been captivated by his style and have grown soft toward such errors as instrumental music and premillennialism. While Ketcherside does not personally endorse these things, or institutionalism, he persistently works with those who favor them and steadfastly refuses to disfellowship them. If this man is not somehow stopped he has the ability to completely undermine the church as we have known it. In his talk about fresh insights he writes as if he had a new revelation or commandment which the rest of us have not received.

At one time in my life this kind of thing would have disturbed me. I would have thought about the people who would read it and form prejudiced opinions without ever having met me or even read a single word I had written. But that was before

I really came to know Jesus as a genuine personal friend. Ever since I invited him in and he came, not just as a passing acquaintance but as an abiding Presence to sup with me, and me with him, all that has changed.

It is easy now to look back and see that I once reacted just as our brother who wrote me up. I was fearful and frightened and factional, and I attacked those who did not conform to our party program to prove that I was sound and solid on “the issues.” I remember how proud I was when I was introduced at our factional conclaves as “an outstanding defender of the truth,”— the truth being our party line and factional creed, of course.

I still have a long way to go in measuring up to the Father’s expectation for one of his children, and I’ve got a lot of weak spots that trouble me, but I think that the biggest relief I have ever experienced comes from a realization that I no longer have to prove everything. It’s a tremendous thing to realize that it is a fact that Jesus lives in you, and you can just accept it and go on your way rejoicing. No conscious effort is demanded to prove it to anyone else. If it is true it doesn’t make any difference if anyone else knows it or not. If it isn’t true it wouldn’t make any difference if everyone thought it was.

As a result of his moving in when I opened the door, I can now read what brethren write about me a lot more objectively than before. So I study what they say to see what good I can derive from it. Obviously we cannot learn a great deal from those who agree with us, and the more they agree with us the less we can learn from them. Since we are all finite and fallible, we need the criticism of others to help us eliminate our errors. In one sense our enemies are the best friends we have.

In analyzing the warning of our brother, I think he over-estimated my ability and influence. It is true that I write a great deal, although not nearly as much as I would like to write. I have to practice a great deal of restraint in that area. I doubt that my style is captivating. I never studied journalism and I do not have the educational background for proficiency in this discipline. I just get full up on the inside, and when I do I simply have to share my views with others, but I'm never satisfied with what I've written after I see it in print.

Perhaps I am getting credit I do not deserve for articulating ideas whose time has come. Anyone else who said the same things would be in my position, although he could probably do a much better job of stating them clearly. Our brethren were all moving toward a change in attitude. I just came along at the right time. I had to alter my views for I could no longer live with my own inconsistencies in the sphere of fellowship and brotherhood. I tried hard to remain a narrow, bigoted party champion but I lost the battle to the Spirit and now I am trying to be his willing captive.

I must plead guilty to the charge of refusing to create tests of union and communion out of our variant views about the things that trouble us. It isn't because I've grown soft or spiritually flabby about error. I've just had my sense of values straightened out by reversal. I've learned that Jesus died for people, not for systems, methods, or legal codes. As he put it, "Man was not made for the sabbath, but the sabbath was made for man." If I use my interpretation of the millennium or music to destroy my brother for whom Christ died, or to justify my treating him like an outcast and an alien, I think more of my views than I do of God's children.

Since I share in the abiding Presence it isn't necessary for me to play God and exercise censorious judgmental attitudes toward others who are caught up in the same human predicament as myself. I will go anywhere and share with any of my brethren just like Jesus came and shared with me. He didn't wait until I was good, and right about everything, or we would still be living apart. I find it much more satisfying now that I do not have to be infallible. It was always a hard task for me as I'm sure it is for the pope.

Really I don't think that anyone will stop me. I anticipate that senility or death will do so, and I hope the last one beats the first one to it. And I am not at all disturbed that what we write about factionalism and fellowship will upset "the church as we have known it." It needs to be undermined, although as openly as I try to work, I doubt that is the proper term. Perhaps instead of being undermined it will be overwhelmed by the Spirit. That would make a difference!

"The church as we have known it" is quite sectarian and inadequate. It is not really the body of Christ but an institutional image which we have created and animated. It moves when the right strings are pulled, and in the midst of a lot of dead wooden images it fools a lot of us into thinking that it is alive. Satan has hoodwinked us into thinking that those who attack this ponderous structure are battling against the soma (body) of Christ which is enlivened by the pneuma (Spirit). This does not follow. The two are not identical.

I think we need a radical change in our whole approach to the problems of a sorry, sick and sinful world. And the first change that must be made is in "the church as we have known it." We must return to the community of saints as God wants it. It will be a costly process. Most of us will not pay the price and will die defending our sects under the delusion that we are preserving the one body. Our lives, our money, and our hopes are all invested in our monastic structures. To surrender these would be like having to hate our own lives to take up the cross and follow him. That's the last thing most of us will ever do.

I have a deep sense of compassion for my attacking brother. He spends much of his time fighting what he brands as "institutionalism." He thinks that because his faction does not congregationally support some of the projects, promotions and programs which have been dreamed up and drummed up to coax the world into the “Church of Christ” camp, it thereby constitutes the “faithful church.”

But what he calls “the loyal church” with its unlovely attitude and unbrotherly posture is a human institution much worse than what he opposes. This will sound like blasphemy in his ears because he equates his faction with “the Lord’s church.” But these things need to be said much as we regret the situation which gives rise to the need. I only pray that all of our good brethren will take an unbiased look at the multitude of rabid sects we have spawned under the guise that each is “the Lord’s church.”

I simply could not resist smiling at my brother’s words to the effect that I write as if I had a new commandment. His idea is correct but he has it backwards. A new commandment has me! Jesus said, “A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another.” Of course that was there all of the time, but I was just not all there at the time!

I recall how we used to protest and bluster that we loved everybody, even our brothers in error. But we were hypocritical and dishonest. We were uneasy when those from another faction came around our meetings. We’d get a little clump of the loyal ones together and hold a caucus, and take a quick poll on whether we would call on one of them to lead in prayer. We had goose pimples for fear someone would take word back to our “spiritual Jerusalem” that we were eating with the uncircumcised.

When Jesus came in at my invitation, he swept such sham and pretence out of my poor shriveled and sinful heart. He made me realize that what I had regarded as fidelity to him was nothing but partisan pride. So I gave in and let him begin to love through me. Great new vistas were opened up. The scales fell from my eyes. My horizons were pushed back and for the first time I found myself able to love my enemies and pray for them. I mean really love them instead of feigning and fabricating. When I quit lying about loving all of my brethren and my enemies and got rid of the gangrenous guilt that was eating at my heart because of such pious fraud as the party designates faithfulness, life took on new dimensions.

Don't think that I'm free from all of my littleness and bigotry and intolerance. I am not purged from all prejudice and I know it better than anyone else. It's pretty hard for one who was raised in slavery all of his life to act like a free man all of the time. The temptation to hate and to let the flesh take over is still there.

I often have to hold a conversation with Jesus about it and apologize to him for barging in ahead of him and generally messing up my life by trying to handle things on my own like I used to do. I must be very trying to him. But at least I have gotten to the point where I can be thankful that brethren who think I am dangerous can write it up and get it out in the open so I can pray for them. And if that is being dangerous, brace yourself, for I have just started!

One Day of Life

Mission Messenger (March 1968)

Volume 30

[Abstract]

I don't think one ought to keep count of the things God does, that is to run a tally sheet on heaven's blessings. God cannot be confined to a calendar or regulated by a clock. Both of these are devices for measuring time and God is timeless. But life is very rich and full for me right now, and I would like to share with you some of the things that are occurring. What I am going to describe can happen to anyone, but it would never happen to any two of us in exactly the same fashion.

When I became aware that all true happiness lies in being God's slave, after I'd been living off of his bounty for years, I was talking with him one day, and I confessed that I was ashamed of the fact that a lot of times in the past I had made excuses to justify my neglect of going into areas which I felt ought to be contacted and penetrated. I acknowledged that I was sometimes motivated by fear of failure and of making an even bigger fool of myself, or of falling flat on my face.

I mentioned to him my lack of formal education and the deprivation of my early home life, and how these were factors which probably gnawed at my inner being and acted to keep me from going into a lot of "the worlds" from which I had shied away. But I also told him I was tired of running and that I knew now that my real trouble had been lack of faith. I went on to promise that from that time forward I'd go wherever a door opened up and I would share what I knew about our relationship with all who would listen.

I have lived in Saint Louis for a good many years but I might as well have lived in Patagonia or Timbuctoo, so far as some areas were concerned. I couldn't have been much farther from them. But almost from the time that I surrendered to God's purpose in my life opportunities began to come. I explain it by saying I had followed Jesus for years and then finally caught up with him.

The first thing I noticed was a sense of inner peace and freedom from fear. A consciousness of the abiding Presence actually made me want to enter into new and untried situations. I wanted to see how I could be his tool to mend and repair. The second thing that became apparent was that new meaningful relationships were being created. Bridges were being built where no means of communication had existed.

Let me take just one twenty-four hour period, for example. At noon one day, by invitation I attended a dialogue session. The Metropolitan Church Federation arranged a discussion on "The Meaning of Infallibility." The chief speaker was Dr. Constantine J. Andrews, pastor of St. Nicholas Greek Orthodox Church, with the reactors being Msgr. Joseph W. Baker of the Roman Catholic persuasion, and Dr. Gerald Slusser of the theological studies department of Eden Theological Seminary.

In order to prepare myself for the occasion I talked with God and asked him to help me see everyone as he saw them and also to keep me from building cultural or other walls which might prove to be barriers. I wanted to be open and receptive but I also wanted to be discriminative in the realm of ideas.

As soon as I arrived I saw two young men standing somewhat apart so I went to them and ascertained that one was an assistant pastor of a Lutheran congregation while the other was a senior seminarian. We immediately became involved in a discussion of our varying concepts. When we came to the subject of baptism they informed me that many of the young men were coming to see it as the immersion of a penitent. I made arrangements for them to visit our home and to bring other young men with them to continue our mutual exchange of thought.

The three presentations by the principals were excellent. Each speaker was perceptive and kind, but also firm. The reactors stated the areas of difference as clearly as they did the points of agreement. Since I have long been a member of a kindred type of dialogue group, I made a note of the things which originally acted as mental barriers for me, and made it difficult for me to openly witness to my convictions. Fortunately I no longer allow these to interfere. Here are the things that came to mind.

(1) The vocabulary which makes use of a great many expressions cast in the modern theological mould and which are seldom heard among us. I have learned that if I am to communicate meaningfully with these men that I must understand their terminology. Ordinarily we do not talk about Christological anthropology, naturalistic objectivism, idealistic subjectivism, or eschatological development. But if we are to reach men we must go where they are, linguistically as well as geographically. It has helped me to realize that Paul became all things to all men with the highest motivation and with Spirit approval.

(2) The clerical dress is abhorrent to me because it symbolizes a caste system among believers. I have learned that a lot of young men are rebelling against a special costume of rank which separates them from man in general, but I also know that if I had been born into the same theological situation as these men, I also would be thus attired. I always whisper to God to help me not to look on the outward appearance but to try and understand the hearts of men as they are unburdened and disclosed in word and declaration.

(3) The personal habit of smoking bothers me. Fully one-third of the clerics in the audience had their pipes going and a haze of blue smoke filled the upper reaches of the room where three hundred men were listening very intently. I think that a number of them smoked even more because of the tension of the occasion just as I tend to eat compulsively at night when working under stress on some research task. I hope they are all as ashamed of their weakness as I am of mine.

(4) The physical surroundings once acted as a deterrent. For instance, the sacred pictures used as icons in the Greek Orthodox structure disturbed me but when I silently prayed about it, the thought intruded into my mind that Jesus had to come into a world where there were many worse things to be seen and it seemed to me that he wanted me to get the point that I should quit looking at things and start looking at men. I'm not sure that all the wall hangings in the house of Simon the leper were in good taste, but Jesus visited it and ate with the guests.

When the three speeches were finished we divided into four smaller groups for an hour of discussion. As the King James Version puts it "my hap was to light" in a group led by Peter Kastaris, an amiable Greek Orthodox priest. Present also was the Catholic monsignor. I have never attended another session which was conducted on a fairer basis. Almost at once we were plunged into a study in depth of authority and absolutes. Everything was on an eminently elevated plane and no one felt obligated to "pull any punches." I am convinced that everyone in the room was honestly trying to understand the position of every other person present. I was invited four times to testify to my own convictions and the basis for them.

The next morning I accompanied Walter and Ruth Short, who are doing a tremendous job in the heart of the Negro ghetto, to a monthly breakfast and Bible study conducted by men and women of various religious affiliations. I was impressed by the lack of sectarian emphasis and the apparent eagerness to probe the real meaning of the Word. Here where human need is so appalling, Negro and Caucasian servants of their fellowmen can sit down together with open Bibles for two hours and share their insights without rancor or restraint.

While in the area I also visited the site of the Head Start program and saw what volunteers are doing to make it possible for little boys and girls from bleak tenements to know some of the life values of which they are deprived by situations beyond their control. I will be visiting this work again.

At noon I was with the Messianic Forum which meets weekly in a downtown hotel and brings Jewish business and professional men together for an examination of the claims of Jesus as the Messiah of the prophets. It has been my good fortune to address them six times recently and to answer their penetrating questions. My theme was "The Credibility of the Messianic Witnesses," and the questions were asked of me by attorneys and judges of the courts. I think I have never at any other time felt the nearness to Christ as when speaking to the descendants of those unto whom the Good News was first taken.

These are but a few of "the happenings" and "share-ins" and each day is different. Since he provides not only the possibilities but also the power to perform them, we pray for many more. Life is not drab when he leads and every day becomes a thriller-diller to those who have tuned their hearts into heaven's frequency. One cannot afford to sit around under juniper trees when there is work to do on Mount Carmel. And yet, no two Carmels are ever alike!

The Solvent of Doubt

Mission Messenger (March 1968)

Volume 30

[Abstract]

My casual invitation to college and university students to write to me has produced a real contribution to my life and thought. I have sought to listen and learn as well as to reply and I find my life enriched by the exchange. I am never shocked by disclosure of doubt or dismay, and I am not at all concerned with selling someone a bill of goods consisting of my own views and opinions. This makes for a great deal of freedom and understanding. One can grow mighty tired if he feels obligated to bend everyone in his direction and especially when a lot of folks don't want to be bent.

No one else can raise as many questions as a college student, and no one else is as eager to find answers. One thing I notice is that the questions are not new. They are the same ones that were asked in childhood but they take on a greater significance in college. I wonder if this is an indication of an innate sense of quest for the meaning of life and of personal relationship to the universe which comes as naturally to the rational being as eating when hungry.

Does one start searching for God like a newborn babe starts nuzzling its mother's breast until it fastens upon the nipple with the mouth already drawing and pulling? If so, is there no universal breast, no source of supply for the soul hunger? Must we wail in vain, like an infant in the night whose mother has died and is growing cold beside it?

I got to thinking about this when I received a letter from an art major in a western college a few weeks ago. He grew up in a strict “Church of Christ” environment, but he is about to slip his cable and go adrift with the tide. He has reached the conclusion that God is not real and that each person creates his own image of God. He points out that his own mental picture of God has been changing, and that the God-image is conditioned solely by environment. The “God” of the Hottentot or the pin-headed pigmy is not the “God” of the Wall Street broker, for example.

I must confess that my own concept of God has undergone some changes also, but these alterations have produced exactly the opposite effect upon me as upon my young friend, whom I have yet to meet. I find my trust in God grows stronger each day of my life. Instead of taking “French leave” from the camp of the believers, I am driving my tent stakes down ever more firmly. I’m here for life. Read that again. I mean I’m here “for life.”

A vagrant thought flitted through my mind that perhaps his flirting with modern art which thrives upon distortion and seeks to reduce the real to an unreal imagery, might have upset my young brother. I think one might shut himself up with pictures which there is ever a danger of hanging downside up, until he might get out of focus and have his thinking upside down. I know that I trust I will never meet a woman or a cow like they are pictured by some of our more garish “pop art” entrepreneurs.

Seriously, though, changing concepts about the nature of God have nothing to do with the existence of God. We need to alter our concepts about a great many personalities and things as we mature, but to postulate that we invent that about which our concepts alter, and that such alteration is a proof of invention, seems a little immature to me. Some fairly great intellectuals have even argued that the ability to conceive of God, and the universal exercise of that ability, constitutes a very strong presumption that God exists. It is their contention that the concept of God as the Eternal One could not originate with man as he is, and that the Creator had to plant this seed in the human consciousness.

I'm not much of a philosopher, being more of the old-fashioned cracker barrel type, so it is necessary for me to stay pretty close to earth in my rather feeble attempt at reasoning. There are a number of theological experts and geniuses, and I owe them a tremendous debt for the insights they have given me. I read what they say with profound admiration and appreciation, but my faith is not based upon their reasoning. Middleton Murry said, "Man cannot accept certainties, he must discover them. An accepted certainty is not a certainty, a discovered certainty is."

That is why I know the only way I can be sure of God in my life is by surrender to him in obedience. Faith can never be separated from doing his will. I know God, I experience God, I share with God, by obedience. Jesus said, "Whoever has the will to do the will of God shall know whether my teaching comes from him" (John 7:17). And this works! I have the will to do the will of God, although I bumble around a lot in practice. And I know where the teaching originates!

It couldn't originate with me because it is too pure. If I originated it I would eventually drag it down to my level. As it is, it keeps hauling and tugging me uphill, even when I dig in my heels and try to grab at passing tree limbs to slow the progress. There is nothing more persistent or relentless than the God-pull on a human heart which has once tuned its directional finder so as to "home-in" on the divine runway.

One reason why I do not think man is a direct descendant of a long line of animal ancestors stretching back into the scum of a primordial swamp is because of the phenomenal faculty of faith. It is true that an ape can make a long leap from one tree to another, but it has to see the other tree before it lets go or cuts loose from its perch. Only man can “obey the summons to go out . . . and set out in complete ignorance of his destination” as did Abraham. I’ve launched out on the promises. I have “seen” them in the distance and I am quite convinced of their reality. It is the very essence of faith to see the unseen!

I am no more of a prophet than I am a philosopher, but I predict that our young friend will not drop astern and veer completely from the course. As he probes deeper into art forms he will come to appreciate that this great universe is itself a work of the Artist whose landscapes and seascapes no canvas can capture. Instead of that special breed of arrogance which has tempted him thoughtlessly to imagine he invented God, he will arrive at that state of humility where he will be grateful to God for creating him.

W. H. Fitchett has said, “And truth, no matter how beclouded by doubt, becomes at the touch of the loyal and assenting will translucent. The effort to obey scatters the shadows. It brings an instant verification. Obedience is the true and final solvent of doubt.”

Priests and Pontiffs

Mission Messenger (April 1968)

Volume 30

[Abstract]

Every Christian should be a minister!

Every Christian should be a priest!

Every Christian should be a pontiff!

The fact that some Christians sneer and others snicker at such statements does not disprove them in the least. It only demonstrates ignorance of the real nature of Christianity by a lot of those who profess it.

Most Christians do not want to be thought of as ministers or priests. Ministers are stuffy individuals who look with jaundiced eye upon what average folk like to do and who make the company ill at ease when they walk in. Priests are “holy Joes” who wear clerical dog-collars and pace up and down in front of the “sanctuary” dressed in long robes.

What has happened, of course, is that those who ought to be ministers and priests have abdicated their function and have created an office and developed men to fill it and now they do not want to be personally identified with the function. They prefer to pay others to do the work and lend just enough support to them to salve their own consciences and keep the functionaries off their necks. And they secretly resent the caricatures of their own creation.

Any relation between such a custom and the genuine militant sword-wielding army of the Captain of salvation is purely incidental. The two should not be spoken of in the same breath. Perhaps they ought not to be mentioned in the same article. Forgive me then, and I'll get on with the task of explaining the bit about the universal pontificate of the believers. And don't be frightened off from reading further by that big word.

The word "pontiff" simply means "a bridge-builder." It might be argued with some degree of consistency that it just means a bridge. No other term more fittingly portrays the relation of Jesus to God and ourselves. There was a big chasm between us. It had been created by a universal tremor of disobedience and then widened and deepened by erosion of the stream of iniquity.

There was no way to cross it from our side. But it never became wider or deeper than God's love, and to prove it he launched grace into orbit and spanned the grand canyon of sin. But grace was not something to be shot across like a breeches buoy from shore to sinking ship. He was in grace, so that it was not a system, a sequence of events, or a series of things.

Grace was God coming! It was God coming in the form of a Son. Over and over again he said, "I have come!"

He came from the other side. We had been without God but now He became "God with us." In order to do this the living Word which was with God and was God had to become flesh and dwell among us. He had to come into the world and the only way he could come was as Word become flesh. This is the only way God can penetrate the world. The bridge upon which men cross from the world of flesh to God is one which results when the word of God becomes flesh.

And this is where we come in. The Word had to enter the world at a point in history. There was a “before he came” and an “after he came,” and “before” and “after” are historical terms. Thus it was with us also and since he had to return we are here with his commission and demand to go into all of the world.

Our trouble is that we think of “all the world” from a geographical sense. We conceive of it as a matter of time and space. It is a question of distance covered and miles traveled. But he came to the whole world and yet he never got beyond a hundred miles from the stable in which he was born. Of course, all the world must sometimes be thought of as the surface of our spinning sphere, but it must not be limited to that.

To go into all the world for him meant to empty himself of any thought of equality with God. It meant to take on the form of a slave, to be made like a man. It meant willing acceptance of humiliation and obedience unto death, even the death of the cross. It was not covering every mile of every road to contact every man, but it was accepting the burden and the concern and the human sensitivity of every sinful being on earth, wherever that being was.

If we are to fulfill our mission we must start as he did. The word of God must become flesh— our flesh. He did not merely quote passages or read scriptures, although sometimes he did both, but he translated the word into life. The word became virile, vital and vigorous. It lived and moved and had being.

And we must leave our heavens and our structures and go into the world. In our day the world is fragmented. It is split asunder and hostile against itself. Thus, there are now many worlds and between each one of them and God is a great gulf fixed. When the word becomes our flesh we move into these worlds and we become bridge-builders (pontiffs) so those who inhabit these worlds can cross over to God.

We are miniature Christs. He was “the Anointed One” but we are “the anointed ones.” That is what Christ means. It is also what “Christian” means. When he was baptized he was anointed and acknowledged as God’s Son, when we are baptized we are anointed and acknowledged as God’s sons. And our mission is identified with his from that time on.

As “little Christs” we can never become the bridge from earth to heaven. We can only be the approaches to that bridge. There is no supreme pontiff upon earth. This is not the language of the anointed but of the antichrist. Supreme pontiffs become the heads of organizations which stand athwart the way to the goal. They do not build bridges to the glory of God, they erect buildings to the honor of saints.

We must not dramatize our role, for we are not acting a part, but being a partner with him. We must be in the world as he was in the world. There is nothing glamorous or sensational about a bridge although it may lead to all sorts of dazzling possibilities. Its function is to be there to provide men with a way out of where they are and a way in to where they long to go.

Some of us will go into the educational world as teachers, others into the world of physical suffering as doctors and nurses. Still others will go into the distorted mental world as psychologists and psychiatrists, or into the ghetto world as sharers and counsellors. But wherever we go we must be “little Christs” and while we feed the poor, heal the sick, console the distressed and comfort the mourners, we must lead men to God. We must never forget the purposes of our anointing.

To be born again is simply to become incarnate, to allow the word of God to become flesh— our flesh— suffering, shrinking, sensitive, tempted flesh. When this happens we will know what he meant when he said, “As thou hast sent me into the world, even so have I also sent them into the world.” And as he became the pontiff of God even so shall we be pontiffs of God, bridges across the frightening chasms whose awesome depths separate men from the city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God.

This is the work of all of us. We cannot relegate it. We cannot delegate it. If you fail, some world— your world— will be left stranded, hopeless and helpless. It will be a world of untouched lives and lonely hearts. Wherever your lot is cast by temperament, choice, qualification, or natural bent, there is your destiny, there is your world. And you are sent into that world as minister, priest and pontiff.

A good Roman Catholic friend with whom I shared this concept objected strenuously. “You would have every man his own pontiff,” he said. I replied to him as I now say to you, “I am not interested in every man becoming his own pontiff, but I am desperately concerned that every believer become a pontiff of God.” One greater than any of us has said, “It is enough that the servant become as his lord.”

The Ministry of the Cross and the Growth of the Church

Mission Messenger (April 1968)

Volume 30

An address delivered at Milligan College, February 13, 1968

The cross! On that day it was a scandal, a badge of shame! The time would come when crowds would assemble to see crosses pinned on men, but that was in the dim and distant future. Today a mob had gathered to see men pinioned on crosses. And they did not know as they followed their divergent roads to the cross, that they would stand that day at the cross roads of history and of the world.

The religious leaders were present, a sleek pack moving in for the kill. There were chief priests, the temple butchers who had grown callous from thrusting the knife into the jugular veins in the quivering bodies of helpless sheep. They were drawn together by the smell of warm blood, which spurted from jagged holes torn in the flesh by cruel spikes. It was a holiday atmosphere which they sought to create with their wisecracks and backslapping of the scribes and one another.

Their taunts developed into a chant, a unified yell from a hysterical cheering section watching the grim and grisly game of death being played before their eyes. "Let the Christ, the King of Israel, come down now from the cross that we may believe." And little did they realize that they were that day writing the words and setting the tune for the composition which would be the theme song of the chief priests in the temples made with hands twenty centuries after Golgotha.

Let Christ come down from the cross! But he did not because it is written that one took courage and went to the Roman procurator, and asked for the body of Jesus, and took him down. Then he was taken down from the cross by a friend, but now he is taken down by his betrayers. For every generation crucifies the Son of God afresh at its own Place of the Skull. And every generation takes him down under the pretence of making possible belief in Him.

Theories of incarnation which deny his quickening in a virgin womb, theories of naturalism which efface his signs and wonders; theories of pragmatism which explain away his doctrine; theories of atonement which belie the efficacy of his blood; theories about his own search for identity which make his death explainable by human standards; theories of his resurrection which result in making every apostle a Judas Iscariot— these are the intellectual crowbars, the rationalistic clawhammers which men use to pry and draw out the nails and take him down from the cross. It is easier for the sons of men to believe in a man on the earth, than it is for men on the earth to believe in the Son of God on a cross.

There was a Joseph present when he was born, and a Joseph present when he died. Joseph of Nazareth helped to wrap him in swaddling cloths; Joseph of Arimathea in a linen death shroud. But there have been many others since who have also tried to wrap him up. Some have sought to keep him a perpetual infant, reproducing annually in their homes and temples the manger scene with the helpless child. They have hung on the walls of their hospitals and art galleries paintings of “The Madonna” and have created a cult which has elevated an earthly handmaiden to the throne of the Son of God in the heavens. The world is not saved by baby hands stretching forth from a rude crib, but by a man's hands stretching out on a rude cross. Jesus cannot be forever swaddled by our own infantile thinking.

Others have sought to keep him enveloped in the shroud and have spoken long and learnedly about what might have happened to cause the frightened and forlorn disciples to think they had seen him after his sad death. But Jesus will not remain in the wrappings of men. Eventually all must be brought to confront him as he is, devoid of all the trappings with which they have bedecked and invested him. He will discard our theological habiliments and fold them up as he did the graveclothes in the sepulcher.

Our present personal task is to explore the relationship of the cross ministry to the spread of the reconciling community over the face of the earth. What was there about the cross which would supply the motivation, the drive, the power, to penetrate every segment of society with the Message of grace in its redemptive fulness? How could unlearned and ignorant men, unschooled in philosophy, make an undying impact upon the very centers of Greek sophistication? How could those from a remote province move into the lordly core of the political arena and topple the pagan Caesars from their imperial thrones?

What was the secret of the cross which captivated men of diverse tongues and divergent ways and welded them into an invincible army whose soldiers would conquer while shedding no blood but their own? In the second century, Justin Martyr declared, "There exists not a single race of men, barbarians, Greeks, or by whatever name they may be called, warlike or nomadic, whether they live in tents or wander in wagons, among whom prayers and thanksgivings are not offered in the name of Jesus the crucified, to the Father and Creator of all things."

In a passage, which has become famous, Tertullian wrote to the Roman emperor, "We Christians are but of yesterday and we have filled your cities, your islands, your fortresses, your towns, your market places, the very camp, palace, senate, forum, and have left you nothing but the temples of your gods. . . . If we were to make a general secession, and betake ourselves to some remote corner of the world, you would be horror-struck at the solitude.”

It was the divine plan that the Good News should spread by radiation. The order of witnessing was to be first in Jerusalem, then in Judea, then in Samaria, and on to the uttermost parts of the earth. Radiation requires a center, a fixed point. And God fixed the center of the earth at Jerusalem. Hear the words of Ezekiel, “Thus says the Lord God: This is Jerusalem; I have set her in the center of the nations, with countries round about her” (5:5).

Of this passage. Dr. Faussett writes, “Here Jerusalem is regarded as the center of the whole earth, designed to radiate the true light over the nations in all directions. No center in the ancient heathen world could have been selected more fitted than Canaan to be a vantage ground, whence the people of God could act with success upon the heathenism of the world. It lay midway between the oldest and most civilized states, Egypt and Ethiopia on the one side, and Babylon, Nineveh and India on the other, and afterwards, between Greece, Rome and Persia. The Phoenician mariners were close by through whom they might have transmitted the true religion to the remotest lands; around them were the Ishmaelites, the great inland traders in south Asia and north Africa. Israel was thus placed not for its own selfish good, but to be the spiritual benefactor of the whole world. Compare Psalm 67 throughout.”

Professor Kurtz said, “Its own near approach to the most important channels along which the commerce of the world flowed, combined to establish it in the center of the activity of the world. The country was in this manner, specially adapted to become, at first, the silent and retired nursery of the kingdom of God; and afterwards to spread abroad, in all directions and among all nations, the great salvation, when the latter had reached the period of its maturity.”

When men wish to draw a circle they drive a stake into the ground and fasten a string to it. Using that stake as a center they can reach out in ever-widening areas by the simple expedient of lengthening the cord. The cross was God’s stake driven into the earth with the invisible cord of faith attached to it. Philip reached down to the superstition-ridden city of Samaria and proclaimed the Christ unto them. Peter stretched the cord to include Caesarea, provincial capital of the Roman power, and took the message to the home of an army captain whose prayers had been interrupted by an angelic visitor.

Paul took that faith from Antioch across to Cilicia, down through the rocky defile known as “The Tarsian Gate,” across the miasmatic plains of Asia Minor and into the ancient city of fame and fable, Troy. Then, at the call of a night vision, he crossed over the sea to Philippi, “deathbed of the Roman Republic,” along the Egnatian Way to sensual Corinth and intellectual Athens. At last with chains clanking on his wrists he brought it into the dark dungeon of the Mamertine Prison in Rome, and it broke free even while he was chained and captivated the hearts of some of Caesar’s very household.

If we are to walk in the footsteps of these soldiers we too must start at the cross, and wherever we go over land and sea we must feel the tension created by the fact that our faith reaches back and is fastened to the torture-stake of Calvary. The Christian can never be at loose ends. When he fails to feel the pull of the past, or the haul of history, he can be certain that he has no future.

The earth was the scene of violence and the wretchedness of sin. Those who lived upon its surface were walking in the shadow of their own iniquity, those who slumbered in its bosom were mute witnesses in their narrow cells to the fatal effects of the venom. "The sting of sin is death!" But the cross was God's hypodermic needle driven into the quivering heart of the universe, conveying the antitoxin to evil and the serum, of life. And although the earth shook and writhed in convulsion until the sun hid its face, hope was restored and the flush of life replaced the pallor of approaching death. We live because he died!

The cause of Christ grows by planting and cultivation. It is not mere chance which prompted the apostle, in the very context of the cross, to talk about planting and irrigation. To the community at Corinth he said, "You are God's husbandry." We would have said, "You are the field of God," or "You are God's ranch."

The Greek term signifies land that is tilled or soil that is worked, in contrast with unbroken prairie or untrammelled forest. It suggests fruitfulness and productivity. The original proclaimers of the Word are pioneers who clear the fields, others come to scatter the grain, and still others to irrigate and cultivate. "I planted, Apollos watered, but God gave the growth. So neither he who plants nor he who waters is anything, but only God who gives the growth. He who plants and he who waters are equal, and each shall receive his wages according to his labor. For we are fellow workmen for God; you are God's field, you are God's building."

The cross is the implement of divine invention capable of doing all that is required to cultivate God's heritage. It is the power take-off which makes possible every operation. It is the plow which drives deep into the untouched soil of human hearts and cuts a furrow which turns them over toward God. It is the harrow which breaks up and pulverizes the clods of doubt and fear and works the soil into a mellow loam so the seed can fall on good ground.

It is the reaper before whose blade the grain ripened by the grace of God bows and falls, and is made ready for the gathering in. And the cross is God's threshing instrument, winnowing and sifting the wheat from the chaff. The tribulation of the cross is more than mere semantics. The Latin "tribulum" means a threshing instrument and it is when men are confronted by the cross that they are separated from one another for the granary or the consuming fire.

The community of believers advances when the army marches abreast. There must be straight paths for the feet. The valleys must be exalted. The hills must be brought low. There can be none looking down from heights of arrogance upon the many, nor the many looking up in adoration at the few. And the cross is God's great leveler.

It is the "headache ball" that smashes incessantly at the high walls of pride, reinforced by the iron rods of selfishness, until we are brought down in a cloud of inglorious dust from our self-exaltation to the place of our beginning. In the beautiful twenty-third psalm the phrase "He restoreth my soul" in the Hebrew is literally, "He takes me back to the place of my beginnings."

But there is the other side of the picture. So the cross is also God's elevated crane which dips down into the miry slough of despond and tugs and pulls me free of the sucking clay, and draws me up and out of my own despair and frustration. It is not in vain that we sing:

I want to live above the world,
Though Satan's darts at me are hurled,
For faith has caught the joyful sound;
The song of saints on higher ground.

The cross came into a world of human inequity, injustice and bigotry. Mankind was separated and segregated by racial, national, social and ritual barriers. Nameless slaves were given hope where despair and degradation had reigned, cruel taskmasters found their hearts melting under the influence of an irresistible heaven-sent influence. Those who had been filled with hostility were suddenly transformed until they thrilled with humility. The clinched fist gave way to the open hand. Unity prevailed where hatred had once dwelt.

The cross made the world a neighborhood where all men belonged in a single category— those who need salvation. The earth became heaven's backyard where ethnic differences and cultural variations fade into nothingness when compared with the overwhelming concern for life eternal. And when those who had discovered the Secret touched the lives of those who had not, hope was restored and terror was banished. And the Way spread throughout the world.

We dare not evade the implications of this for our own generation! How does it happen that, after twenty centuries, the cross-bearers are a shrinking minority? Why can we not repeat the glorious conquests of the long ago? All of us are aware of the replies of the skeptics who would relegate the power to the past, and confine the dynamic to the dead tomes of history. To them it is merely something to read about, but not to repeat.

I deny their thesis! I deny it vehemently! This is not a post-Christian era. There is no such thing. I admit that what has been termed Christianity is now being rejected as helpless and senile. But this is merely the golden calf which was constructed of their jewels by the people of God and before which they have prostrated themselves. It is true that it may be ground into powder by the millstones of destiny and flung into the stream of time. But there is no real relationship between that with which God has endowed us and the image which we have created and projected.

Actually, our task is not so much to defend the Way against its enemies as to rescue it from those who profess to be its friends. Let me suggest a few areas in which I think we need to revise our thinking if we would recover the power of God for our age.

1. We must quit talking about the symbols of our faith and the images of the church, and begin to exemplify the reality of our divine-human relationship. It is not a crucifix on the wall, or a cross on the steeple, which will save the world. The cross is not something to be worn, but something to be borne. It was not meant to rely upon but to die upon.

The things to which we point with such pride and exhibit with such pomp may be mute witnesses of the shallowness of our own hearts and the emptiness of our own souls. There is ever the danger that we shall become so wrapped up in our own concerns and the preservation of our own image that we may feast sumptuously while the world of suffering mankind lies at our gates begging for the crumbs which fall from our table. I have never known a people to be concerned about creating an image who did not end up worshipping it.

2. We must relinquish the vain hope that we can conquer this world for our captain by a well-trained group of professionals who fight in the valley while the great majority languidly watch from the safety of the hills. There is not one command to fight the good fight of faith which applies only to a top echelon of elite troops. Every part of the Christian armor was designed to be worn by every soldier of the Lamb. One man cannot wear the helmet, carry the shield, or wield the sword for the whole company.

We have employed enlistment gimmicks to increase our numbers and swell our ranks until they are now filled with soldiers who have no intention of fighting. We are spending our time pacifying and placating disgruntled troops, devising new means of pampering those who threaten to go “over the hill” when their sensitivities are offended or when they feel neglected. Our preachers are not so much leaders who take men into battle as they are “Bob Hopes” who quip and joke to keep the soldiers happy. It is questionable whether the Devil worries about how many we enroll provided they act like many of those who are already in. And it is obvious that a lot of our brethren are willing to live in a state of peaceful co-existence with Satan.

We promote such unworthy and unhealthful conditions when we talk of certain ones going into “full time Christian service,” thus making it appear that others are obligated to serve as Christians only on a part time basis. Every child of God is a soldier all of the time, at home or abroad, awake or asleep, in daylight or dark. We are not mustered in on Sunday morning and mustered out on Sunday afternoon. And the task of evangelists and bishops is to train and develop every member to become a seasoned veteran in his own right and his own field. Our places of meeting must become arsenals and training grounds. We must convert our structures into ammunition dumps. We are not a peacetime army. We are at war!

3. We must develop a definite strategy for the recapture of those territories from which we have withdrawn and which we have forfeited to the enemy. Time will not permit mention of more than a few of them, but foremost among these is the field of advanced education. This is an intellectual age and young men and women of ambition and acumen are going to be exposed to every form of scholastic research. Whether they are guided by instructors who believe in God, or by humanists and secularists who become their own gods, depends upon our vision and foresight.

We cannot indulge the luxury of withdrawal into our own partisan pillboxes, and sit in sectarian security while the world goes up in flames about our structures. We must recognize that the man who teaches biology, sociology, psychology, history or literature, in the state university, is God's minister, if he is a disciple of Jesus, the same as the man who stands in the pulpit and often speaks to a complacent congregation on Sunday morning.

It is a sign of our weakness that we fear for truth in any encounter and look askance at those who feel called to bring an effective witness for Jesus in the legal profession, or as physicians, athletic coaches, or state university professors. Surely God needs men who can minister in all of these areas and we should be producing commandoes who can drop behind the lines and infiltrate every sector of our culture for Christ. We must either meet the intellectual world on its own level or "fold our tents like the Arabs and as silently steal away." God has not promised to keep enough people ignorant so the restoration movement can survive.

Another surrendered area is that of science. Our own survival may depend upon our recovery of this region by men of Christian commitment. Science itself is neutral, but scientists are not, and if the power to destroy the universe is in the control of those who do not recognize the God of the universe, catastrophe beyond our power to imagine may occur. Science belongs to God and we need more Christian scientists— not the sectarian brand whose mother church is in Boston, but the committed kind whose headquarters are in heaven.

In the field of race relations we need to move into hard core areas to make the voice of the Prince of peace heard amidst the strident clamorings of fanatics and extremists of all kinds. The world will be changed only as men are changed. Power has no color, and the Christian must never allow his judgment to be colored by prejudice, bias or hate. We must meet these problems not with hot heads and cold hearts, but with cool heads and warm hearts. But we must meet them and not ignore them. Jesus died for men of concern who hold their heads up, not for ostriches who bury theirs in the sand.

4. We must recover our faith in the attested truth of God so that it may be built not upon human wisdom but upon the power of God. The man who quotes the Word with tongue-in-cheek or with fingers crossed, is a betrayer of the Christ as certainly as the covetous pretender who sold him for thirty pieces of silver. The one who masquerades as a proclaimer of the Good News while his own heart has been eroded of faith in Jesus by the wisdom of this passing age, is a greater deceiver and more dangerous than the avowed atheist.

When the tattered forces of the American Revolution were surrounded by the enemy, Thomas Paine took a charred stick from the campfire one night and wrote upon the head of his drum, "Put none but Americans on guard tonight." And now, when the sheep of God are challenged by grievous wolves who enter in, not sparing the flock, it is time once more to be careful of those who shepherd them. The character of a mere hireling never changes with the passing centuries. Such a one "when he sees the wolf coming, abandons the sheep and runs away, because he is no shepherd and the sheep are not his. Then the wolf harries the flock and scatters the sheep."

Men who are frightened of their own theological shadow, who are wire-walking, fence-sitting compromisers of the faith, will sell the cause of Christ down the river to maintain their personal popularity. And any man who carries water on both shoulders should have one bucket knocked off or be made to spill them both. The preaching of the cross is a task for one whose eye is single and whose heart is undivided.

Encompassed within the scriptural setting assigned to me is that lustrous gem of imperishable truth which declares, "There can be no other foundation beyond that which is already laid; I mean Jesus Christ himself." Upon this foundation I cheerfully build the house of my hopes and construct the citadel of my cherished dreams.

He is the foundation of my faith and trust for this world and the world to come. I am in Christ Jesus by God's act, for God has made him my wisdom; he is my righteousness, in him I am consecrated and set free. I had to be made a fool to gain true wisdom, but now I know that the wisdom of this world is folly in God's sight. I am content to have it become so in my own sight.

He is the foundation of my fellowship. No longer is that fellowship conditioned upon conformity with a cold legalistic code, manipulated by clever factional leaders who can make partisan puppets perform while keeping themselves concealed behind the curtain of contrived interpretations. I am one with Him and with every other person who has set to his seal that God is true, and who has bowed the knee to His sovereignty.

He is the foundation of authority for my life. I am convinced beyond all doubt that He is enthroned at the right hand of my Father in the heavenly realms, that every thing has been put in subjection beneath His feet, and that He has been appointed supreme head of the body. Wherein I fail to follow His will it will be a sin of the head and not of the heart, it will be due to imbecility and not to intention. He is the center and circumference of my life. That which does not proceed from him has no validity; that which does not lead to him has no value.

He is the foundation of my feeble service. I am no longer concerned with glorifying an institution or projecting pride in an organization. No institution could forgive my grievous sin, purify my iniquitous heart, and transform my wasted life. All that I am or ever hope to be I owe to him and I shall go where my heart prompts me to believe that he would have me go if every institution on this earth seeks to thwart me with threats or discourage me by detraction. I belong to Him!

He is the foundation of my hope for the hour of my departure. When the cool breeze from the shadowy river is wafted through the cypress trees to fan my feverish brow; when the voices of loved ones fade and I stumble on toward the dim unknown, I want to know that he is there to take me by the hand. I want the voice which spoke to the tempestuous waves of Galilee to say to the turbulent Jordan, "Peace, be still!" And I will fear no evil if he is with me!

The power of the cross is not lessened for him who still stands at its base and says in the words of the centurion of old "Truly this man is the Son of God." Let us willingly proclaim that which is foolishness to those who perish, but wisdom to us who are saved. If any man glory, let him glory in the cross of Christ, where heaven stooped low to touch the earth with the magic wand of grace, and the gentle voice of mercy whispered forgiveness to frightened and forlorn man as he stood trembling upon the step of the gallows erected by his own guilt.

Heralds of Hope

Truth fairly presented, and enforced by the good example of its advocates, has ever triumphed, and will continue to triumph until the victory is complete.— Alexander Campbell in Christian Baptist, page 225.

At first the flame was very small as if someone had suddenly struck a single match in the velvet darkness of the whole universe. Then it was applied to the ripened field of humanity and it flickered and flared and burst into light. The wind began to blow with increasing velocity and the flame licked out its fiery tongues in all directions. The flame was the Message. The wind was persecution. And the darkness was the terrifying ignorance of a world which knew Him not!

The torch was lighted from above. The flame came down as it did when it consumed the sacrifices of Abraham and Elijah. No man could light the torch, for the fire is the fire of God. Men could hold the torch and run with it for it was their duty to work the work of God on earth, but they could not kindle the flame. They could not extinguish it either. And that is why it has never gone out.

The first person who really held it up for his people to see was a fisherman. He was not alone upon the occasion. There were eleven others with him and they had just undergone a tremendous experience. A tornadic wind had rushed earthward and enveloped the room where they were sitting. Glowing tongues like flame appeared above the head of each one. Suddenly they found themselves able to converse in languages utterly foreign to them. An excited multitude formed. Eyes were focused on the fisherman.

He was ill-equipped for the role which fell to his lot. By nature impetuous, by occupation inured to hard work, he was ignorant by worldly standards. But he spoke with fluency and with no lack of words, for he was but the mouthpiece of divine power. And the multitude listened and were moved. The flame kindled their hearts.

Then a tentmaker who was also a rabbinical student, became filled with hatred for the fire. Frantically he sought to beat it out with hands whose fingers were blackened and pricked from the needles of his craft. But the light smote him and the intensity of it blinded him. When he was made to see again he picked up the torch which he had sought to destroy and carried it at the peril of his very life.

So it came to pass that the flame leaped over the straits to islands of the sea as a forest fire jumps from one pine-clad crag to another. It swept over mountains and down through the rocky defile called "The Tarsian Gate" and flowed over the miasmatic plains of Asia Minor. From ancient Troy of fabled fame it crossed to Philippi "the deathbed of the Roman Republic," and rippled along the Egnatian Way to sensual Corinth and intellectual Athens. And at last it came to the heart of the Empire, to Rome itself, borne by a captive into the dank Mamertine Prison, and it penetrated the walls of the palace and burned in the hearts of some of Caesar's very household.

The bearing of the flame is a saga of the courage of simple men and women, elevated to heights of daring by an unquenchable trust which caused them to "love not their lives unto death.” Many of them were nameless slaves, their bodies the chattels of earthly masters. They were human ciphers until the Message came and established identity for them in a voluntary surrender which made them free. And this freedom took away the fear of death with its ultimate casting of their bodies on the dunghills and garbage-dumps where tireless worms worked ceaselessly in the aroma of decay. The Message was a message of Beyond!

In this presentation we hope to tell you of the growth and spread of the community of grace-sharers, the grace that came with truth by Jesus of Nazareth. We want to establish that it was not the work of brilliant intellectuals, or trained professionals, or smooth operators. It was not the triumph of organizational planning and direction. It made no use of great combines or crusades. It was unregimented, inept and amateurish— and it succeeded! It was the only war in history won by men who took no lives but freely gave their own.

Consider their calling, their summons to vocation. There were not many earthly philosophers among them. There were not many men of political prominence to wield power. There were not many of noble birth. It was the foolish things, the weak things, the base things, the despised things, which were chosen. Even the things which were not were selected. And they reduced to nothing the things that were. It was as if a stone which had no reality, no weight and no solidity, fell upon the proud structure of the world’s glory and pulverized it. No one could explain it. It defied all scientific data, all human experience. It was the Lord’s doing and it is still marvelous in our eyes until this day!

EXAMINING THE EVIDENCE

Let us stroll through the aisles of recorded history and examine the evidence that has been preserved for our edification. We must gather it from both friend and foe. Often an enemy by his fury of attack, by the very intensity of his effort, will reveal more about the onward sweep of a movement than a proponent. The latter is behind it, the former is in its path and must battle for his life, or for the life of his system.

Such a man, for example, was Celsus, the first of the intellectuals and philosophers to bitterly assail the Way. In the second century he composed a book of ridicule and invective against Christianity, under the title Alethes Logos. He did not realize that his volume would some day become a direct proof of that which he sought to destroy, and be all the more valuable because it was penned by a foe rather than a friend. One of his accusations was that “woolworkers, leather-dressers, the most illiterate and vulgar of mankind are zealous preachers of the gospel.”

Canon Farrar in his volume titled The Early Days of Christianity writes, “The Christians had filled no large space in the eye of the world. Until the days of Domitian we do not hear of a single noble or distinguished person who had joined their ranks.” Celsus declared that the Christians consisted only of “the uninstructed, the servile and the ignorant.”

In spite of their handicap the humble saints kindled the fire of God all over the known world. They were not trained professionals. A. H. Newman in A Manual of Church History writes, “After the time of the apostle Paul most of the spread of the gospel was effected, not by direct missionary efforts, but by the moving hither and thither throughout the empire of artisans and tradesmen, who planted Christianity wherever they went. So also Christianity was frequently spread by persecution, each fugitive forming a new center of Christian influence.” (Page 142).

Professor Fisher in The Beginnings of Christianity says, “It is an interesting, but not a surprising fact, that the circumstances of the first planting of Christianity in places which were later its most powerful seats, including Rome and Carthage, are not known. Visitors to Jerusalem at the great festivals, mechanics who changed their abode from place to place, and commercial travelers, might carry to their homes the faith which they had elsewhere received, and form the nucleus of new Christian communities. The gospel was transported from place to place, as seeds are blown from the trees and wafted abroad.”

L. de Pressense in The Early Years of Christianity writes, “We observe, first that the work was not done through any fixed organization. We shall not find in the church of the second and third centuries, any of those great missionary associations which form so important a part of modern Christian agency, for the simple reason that the whole church was then essentially a missionary society. A stranger and a sojourner rather than a settler in the world, hard pressed on all sides by surrounding paganism, its very life was one long conflict. It must fight in self-defence, and conquer or die. There was no distinction then between home and foreign missions; the Christian had but to cross his own threshold, and walk the public streets of his own city, and he found a pagan people at his own door to be converted.”

Again he says, “Every church was a mission-center, radiating gospel light far and near . . . A new mission generally arose out of some incidental circumstance, and wherever a Christian set his foot, however barren the soil, there he planted the cross, and gathered around him the nucleus of a church.”

Celsus complained, “Many of the Christians without any special calling, watch for all opportunities, and both within and without the temples, boldly proclaim their faith; they find their way into the cities, and the armies, and there having called the people together, harangue them with fanatical gestures.”

That such fervency of spirit was successful is evidenced from the writings which have been preserved for us. In the second century Justin Martyr declared, “There exists not a single race of man, barbarians, Greeks, or by whatever name they may be called, warlike or nomadic, whether they live in tents or wander in wagons, among whom prayers and thanksgivings are not offered in the name of Jesus the crucified, to the Father and Creator of all things.”

Ireneus wrote, “Many tribes of the barbarians, without paper and ink, have the words of salvation written in their hearts through the Holy Spirit.” This referred to the fact that the Good News was taken to men before the sacred scriptures were translated into their languages, and they accepted the message.

In a passage which has become famous, Tertullian wrote to the Roman emperor, “We Christians are but of yesterday and we have filled your cities, your islands, your fortresses, your towns, your market places, the very camp, palace, senate, forum, and have left you nothing but the temples of your gods . . . If we were to make a general secession, and betake ourselves to some remote corner of the world, you would be horror-struck at the solitude.”

BEARERS OF THE TORCH

We shall now prosecute a search to determine the factors contributing to what one historian refers to as “that steady forward march of the church which no obstacle could impede, no danger daunt. Under the leadership of its invisible Head, it went forth without trembling to meet adversaries at once skilful and strong and as numerous as formidable— to encounter, in fact, all the recognized lords of the world, its princes and priests, its philosophers and artists. Every conflict became a victory, and the only effect of persecution was to extend the missionary field of the church, to give greater weight to its testimony, and to command for it a wider hearing.” (De Pressense in The Early Years of Christianity).

1. The transformed life. The Christians were saints, and the word “saint” to them simply meant “one who is different.” They no longer conformed to the world.

They regarded themselves as strangers and pilgrims on the earth, and as such they avoided those lusts which war against the soul. Filled with the same desires as others in the flesh they still lived a disciplined and ordered life.

In a world of luxury, affluence and profligacy, they moved with quiet dignity, their eyes fixed on a far-off goal. In all of my reading I have never come across more poignant language than that used by Canon Farrar in his description of the world into which Christianity was introduced. Although space will not permit of lengthy excerpts, please bear with me as I draw the following from The Early Days of Christianity.

“The epoch which witnessed the early growth of Christianity was an epoch of which the horror and degradation have rarely been equalled, and perhaps never exceeded, in the annals of mankind . . . Even if St. Paul had never paused amid his sacred reasonings to affix his terrible brand upon the pride of Heathenism, there would still have been abundant proofs of the abnormal wickedness which accompanied the decadence of ancient civilization. They are stamped upon its coinage, cut on its gems, painted upon its chamber-walls, sown broadcast over the pages of its poets, satirists, and historians.”

“I need but make a passing allusion to its enormous wealth; its unbounded self-indulgence; its coarse and tasteless luxury; its greedy avarice; its sense of insecurity and terror; its apathy, debauchery and cruelty; its hopeless fatalism; its unspeakable sadness and weariness; its strange extravagance alike of infidelity and superstition.”

“At the summit of the whole decaying system— necessary, yet detested— elevated indefinitely above the very highest, yet living in dread of the very lowest, oppressing a population which he terrified, and terrified by the population which he oppressed — was an Emperor, raised to the divinest pinnacle of autocracy, yet conscious that his life hung upon a thread; an Emperor, who, in the terrible phrase of Gibbon, was at once a priest, an atheist, and a god.”

In such a world, and in such a time, the Christians refused to tarnish their lives by participation in the sports and amusements, the crimes and indecencies of those about them. Athenagoras was an outstanding Athenian Philosopher who began reading the scriptures in order to refute them. He was converted by his own study and in 177 A.D., addressed his Plea for the Christians to the Emperor Marcus Aurelius and his son Commodus. Here are some of his statements.

“Amongst us you will find uneducated persons and artisans and old women, who if they are unable by words to prove our doctrine, yet exhibit by their deeds the good arising from their conviction of the truth. They do not make speeches, but they practice good works; when smitten they do not strike again; when robbed they do not go to law; they give to those who ask of them, and love their neighbors as themselves.”

Origen also wrote, “Those who are despised as ignorant fools and no better than slaves, no sooner commit themselves to God’s direction, by accepting the teaching of Jesus, than, forsaking their sins, many of them, like perfect priests for whom such pleasures have no charm, keep themselves pure in act and thought.”

2. Lack of prejudice. The fact that God loved the world and that Jesus died for all men, gave every reconciled being equal status among the believers. No longer did artificial criteria such as wealth, intellectual attainment, national prominence, or social position have any significance. The cross served to produce a world of a single category. All were in equal need of a savior and beside this fact all else paled into insignificance.

The love feast became a visible demonstration of that inner power which transcended every other consideration. Men loved one another because God loved them all. Thus Minucius Felix has Octavius say, "The reason we love one another is because we do not know how to hate. We call one another brethren, as being born of the same God and parent, and as companions in faith and fellow-heirs of the same hope. As for crosses, we neither worship nor wish for them."

B. H. Cooper in his book The Free Church says of the end of the apostolic age, "The bright prospect which opened upon the day of Pentecost, the rallying of redeemed mankind around the Son of man, and of their awakening to a common consciousness of their brotherly relationship to each other in Him, was realized in the bosom of the two or three hundred apostolic churches (which had then been gathered), in some cases four thousand miles apart, and built up of men of every variety of rank, culture, color, clime, language, and previous religious training, as it has never been since." We pause to remark that those who seek to recapture the apostolic power and purpose should ponder carefully this statement.

3. The raw courage of faith. In his Church History, Milner says of the lack of documents in the sub-apostolic age, that the principal work of the Christians was "to believe, to suffer, to love, and not to write." If this is correct there is ample evidence they walked worthy of their vocation.

A good example is Justin Martyr who, after examination of all the philosophic schools of the day, became a follower of Jesus. Together with six of his companions, one of them a sister in Christ, he was arrested and brought before Rusticus, the city prefect, who had been appointed to office because he had formerly been the instructor of the emperor in the Stoic philosophy.

The account of the trial is interesting. When Rusticus asked, "What kind of doctrines do you profess?" the reply was given, "I have endeavored to learn all doctrines; but I have settled at last in the true doctrine, that of the Christians."

The prefect asked, "Are those the doctrines that please thee, miserable man? Where do you Christians assemble?" Justin said, "Where everyone chooses and is able. Dost thou suppose we all meet in the same place? Not so. The God of the Christians is not circumscribed by place; being invisible He fills heaven and earth, and is everywhere worshiped and glorified by the faithful."

The entire party acknowledged boldly that they were Christians. The prefect threatened them all with death, and turning to Justin asked him if he supposed that if he was beheaded he would go to heaven and receive a reward. The reply was, "I do not suppose it, I know and am fully persuaded of it."

When the Christians refused to burn incense to the gods, Rusticus pronounced the sentence of death. "Let those who have refused to sacrifice to the gods, and to obey the command of the Emperor, be scourged and led away to suffer the punishment of decapitation, pursuant to the laws." At the place of execution the faithful little band died with a hymn of praise upon their lips.

When the community of saints at Carthage was threatened with persecution of the worst kind, Cyprian addressed to the believers his Exhortation to Martyrdom, to persuade them to don joyfully the purple robe, dyed in the blood of the Lamb. Here is his conclusion.

"In such meditations the spirit grows strong, and becomes proof against the terrors of the evil one and the menaces of the world. Earth is shut up against us in times of persecution, but heaven is opened; Antichrist threatens, but Christ sustains; death overtakes us, but immortality follows: the world recedes, but paradise receives us; this life of a day is quenched, eternal life begins. What honor, what peace, what joy, to depart thus gloriously from the midst of persecution and anguish, to shut the eyes on the world of men, to open them on the face of God and of His Christ: O short and blessed voyage.”

4. The message of hope. Canon Farrar says of the Roman Empire at the time of Christ, “Gluttony, caprice, extravagance, ostentation, impurity, rioted in the heart of a society which knew of no other means by which to break the monotony of its weariness, or alleviate the anguish of its despair.”

The historian continues, “And what was the religion of a period which needed the sanctions and consolations of religion more deeply than any age since the world began? It is certain that the old Paganism was— except in country places—practically dead. The very fact that it was necessary to prop it up by the buttress of political interference shows how hollow and ruinous the structure of classic Polytheism had become . . . The upper classes were destitute of faith, yet terrified at skepticism. They had long learnt to treat the current mythology as a mass of worthless fables, scarcely amusing enough even for a schoolboy’s laughter, but they were the ready dupes of every wandering quack who chose to assume the character of a mathematicus or a mage.”

In such an atmosphere Stoicism became the religion of the literary ranks. The historian says, “It made a vice of compassion, which Christianity inculcated as a virtue; it cherished a haughtiness which Christianity discouraged as a sin. It was unfit for the task of ameliorating mankind because it looked on human nature in its normal aspects with contemptuous disgust. Its marked characteristic was a despairing sadness, which became specially prominent in its most sincere adherents. Its favorite theme was the glorification of suicide, which wise moralists severely reprobated, but which many Stoics belauded as the one sure refuge against oppression and outrage.”

The writer concludes his chapter with these words, “St. Paul and St. Peter, on the other hand, were at the very same epoch teaching in the same city, to a few Jewish hucksters and a few Gentile slaves, a doctrine so full of brightness, that letters, written in a prison with torture and death in view, read like idylls of serene happiness and paeans of triumphant joy. The graves of these poor sufferers, hid from the public eye in the catacombs, were decorated with an art, rude indeed, yet so triumphant as to make their subterranean squalor radiant with emblems of all that is brightest and most poetic in the happiness of man. While the glimmering taper of the Stoics was burning pale, as though amid the vapors of a charnel-house, the torch of life upheld by the hands of the Tarsian tentmaker and the Galilean fisherman had flashed from Damascus to Antioch, from Antioch to Athens, from Athens to Corinth, from Corinth to Ephesus, from Ephesus to Rome.”

IMPLICATIONS FOR OUR DAY

We live in a neo-pagan age. It can be proven that the same attitudes which prevailed among men when the Good News was first heralded forth are the very ones which characterize our world today. Unfortunately, many who profess faith in Christ are listless and apathetic, or worldly and sinful. The gospel is still God’s dynamite but there is no one to light the fuse in many areas.

The Message is needed today. Men are hungering and thirsting for righteousness and that is what it has to offer. It is not outgrown or outmoded. It is adapted to meet the needs of men like they are and where they are. But it is obvious that there must be renewal in our time if we are to become effective. We propose to discuss with you what we believe are vital factors which can lead to that renewal.

1. We must recapture the concept that every Christian is a minister of God, and we must provide training for every-member ministry. We must cease to designate one man as “the minister” or “our minister” for this very language places the remainder of the saints in a non-ministering category. Elton Trueblood deserves the commendation of all of us for pointing out in his book The Incendiary Fellowship that “If Dr. Jones is the minister of the First Presbyterian Church of Centerville, it follows logically that the ordinary members are not ministers.”

The strength of the primitive community of believers lay in the fact that they had not been betrayed into thinking of themselves as spectators of a performance. They did not even think of themselves as performers on a world stage. They were not play-acting. The world was a battlefield and they were combat troops. In the rather slang but expressive language of the city streets “this was for real, man!”

We must also recognize that whatever is done by a child of God in an attitude of humility and reverence, constitutes ministry, for ministry simply means service. The “service” is not something held in an ecclesiastical structure, but something that is done outside. The Christian does not attend a service, he renders it! The service does not begin at ten o’clock on Sunday morning. It does not cease and for that reason cannot start. It is as important on Monday morning as on Sunday morning. Actually, what we do on Monday may be more important than what we do on Sunday, and this does not at all argue that what is done on Sunday is not important!

All of the saints must become so involved that they do not have time to gather every night for two weeks to listen to someone tell them over and over what they have already heard and done. Why repeat interminably the terms of enlistment to men in battle fatigues? They have already enlisted and should be out fighting! We have a world to conquer and we will not get the job done by sitting around in the mess-hall listening to an imported sergeant describe the terms of enlistment. It is silly to talk about “holding a revival” for a company of troops unless they are dead. It is interesting to note that the Jehovah’s Witnesses do not hold revivals!

We must turn our meetinghouses into arsenals and training centers. We must make our preachers into coaches and trainers. Their task should be to discover and develop the aptitudes of all who volunteer under the banner of Christ. Not all are adapted to the same task but all should be given some task. There are no non-functioning members in the body of Christ, but the divine instruction is, “having gifts that differ according to the grace given us, let us use them” (Romans 12:6).

This entails several things. One must determine the nature of the gift he has, and must be willing and eager to use it. The community of saints must seek for meaningful ways in which to encourage use of all the gifts. The present system discourages use of gifts. It relegates the mass of the membership to a place where they can only “pay and pray.” Sometimes the last is done for them, although the first never is.

The apostle urged those with the gift of prophecy to exercise it in proportion to faith. He continues, “If service, in our serving; he who teaches, in his teaching; he who exhorts, in his exhortation; he who contributes, in liberality; he who gives aid, with zeal; he who does acts of mercy, with cheerfulness.”

We will need to revise our strategy. The world will simply not be won by an elite group of trained professionals, call them priests, ministers, theologians, or whatever. The idea of creating a congregation for a minister, and then creating a minister for the congregation, or vice versa, is just not a part of God’s program and plan for world conquest. This idea did not originate with the Bible.

An army that spends its time being served or ministered to is helpless and hopeless as a fighting force. We talk nonsense when we equate strength with numbers. We have been deceived by the fallacy of strength in statistics! Innate strength is the ability to accomplish the work or purpose for which a thing is created without additional force or help from the outside or from another source. A group of twenty Christians who are capable of edifying themselves is strong, while four hundred who have to be edified to survive are weak. A man who weighs four hundred pounds but has to be helped to his feet and supported while he walks is not nearly as strong as one who weighs a hundred and fifty pounds and can go out and chop wood all day!

If the primitive saints had adopted our ideas and constituted themselves into “a church” Christianity would have expired in its cradle. And we will never recapture our potential until we cease to be “a church” with its structures, forms, programs, organizations and vested interests, and become a living organism— the body of Christ. Emil Brunner is right when he says, “The community which waits in hope for the return of the Lord and which lives by faith and love in the possession of His Spirit, cannot be an institution, a church.”

Brunner is also correct when he says, “The New Testament Ecclesia, the fellowship of Jesus Christ, is a pure communion of persons and has nothing of the character of an institution about it: it is therefore misleading to identify any single one of the historically developed churches, which are all marked by an institutional character, with the true Christian communion.”

The body of Christ, through its members, brought the pagan world to its knees in humble suppliance to the Lord. But when, in order to secure and hold their gains, they constituted themselves into a “church,” a historical institution, paganism moved in and rendered the institution helpless for effective combat. The difference between a church and the body of Christ is simply stated. A church arranges and uses its adherents, manipulating them as it chooses. Men are made for the “church.” “But as it is, God arranged the organs in the body, each one of them, as he chose” (1 Corinthians 12:18).

2. We must recapture the concept of the transformed life. We no longer feel at ease when we are called saints. We do not like to think of ourselves as sanctified. We shrink from being regarded as holy. But the early Christians were “different” and they knew they were. This was the very thing which lent them power.

Now if we are absolutely honest (and this is difficult to be) we will admit that we have “watered down” our lives a great deal. Keith Miller in The Taste of New Wine points out that the modern institutional church is filled with people who look pure and sound pure but are sick of themselves and that of which they are a part.

One reason that we do not get more people out of the world and into the “church” is that so many who are already in it would like to get out. Remove the fear of hell which the institutional church uses as a weapon trained on the gate, and there would be a general exodus in a lot of places. All one needs to do to find out how unhappy most people are with their associates in the church is to listen to them talk about them for a half hour. We need to change one of our old hymn titles to: “What? A fellowship?” Small wonder that most of the heathen decide to stay out of something which turns so many of its adherents into frustrated grumblers and spiritual schizophrenics.

Yet the reason why the condition exists is very apparent. We have been converting men to an institution rather than to a savior. And sinful man needs a savior! Putting men into an institution who really need a physician will not cure them. It may make them worse! I realize that this will be resented and vociferously denied, but I still affirm that it is so.

To be quite plain we use Christ as another gimmick, an attention-getter, a sales pitch. But in the final analysis, the thing that really counts with us is how many names are listed on our institutional tally sheet, the membership roster. The fact is that when we hold a “crusade” against the modern Turks, if someone really comes to Christ but does not come with us, we think of him as being lost, not saved. And we bemoan the fact that after we got him to land he slipped out of our net.

We contrast the number in our “church” with that in other churches, and we revel in the news reports that we are the “fastest growing church” in America. We clip out such items and carry them in our billfold to show to our unfortunate associates who belong to slower “churches;” we reproduce our favorable figures in bulletins and tack the reports on our bulletin boards!

But there is nothing about affiliating with an institution that automatically revolutionizes one’s life. There is a difference between being transferred to a new status by a creed, and transformed into a new state by the Christ. It could be a serious question how much Satan worries about those we capture. He probably does not care how many we get into the “church” provided they act like many of those who are already there. He doesn’t really lose them, he just puts them into a clump at our expense, where he can readily find them.

It will be argued that what we say is true of sects, or denominations, or cults, but is not true of “the Lord’s church.” But the term “the Lord’s church” is a clever semantic switch in our day which is employed to designate a special historic movement which is institutionalized with all of its supporting and contributing agencies, organizations, business enterprises and vested interests.

“The Lord’s church” is a synonym in the minds of those who use the term for “The Church of Christ,” and this is the outgrowth of a historical restoration movement. All of our pious platitudes will not alter this fact. And as Brunner says it is “marked by an institutional character.” What I have said is true of any institution calling itself “a church” or “the church.” No institutional relationship can mechanically change one’s life. It can serve as a cover or shield, and often does!

The primitive saints enrolled and entered into a vital, absorbing, personal relationship with Jesus Christ. The language employed to describe this state is revelatory of its nature. Those who entered were born again, they constituted a new creation, a new humanity. Their life was hid with Christ in God. To live was Christ. It was a thrilling vocabulary, pulsating and throbbing with the dynamic of a new existence. They had come to know The Joy, and they were blessed in the knowing! They had been touched by the hand of God, their hearts had been sprinkled with blood, their bodies washed with pure water. And they were not the same as before. They would never be the same again. Old things (including the old sameness, the old drabness) had passed away. All things had become new. It was this which gave them such a sense of destiny, of urgency, of inexhaustible power.

Although every indication is that the temptation to conform seems almost overwhelming, we must not overlook the power of the Spirit and the word of God. We have relied upon our own plans and projects, our schemes and systems, but these can never produce a new creation. They can rearrange and readjust, but they have no power to redeem or regenerate. An incubator cannot produce chickens, although ours has been entrusted with that task. Life comes from life! We must throw ourselves upon the Lord and cease to trust in “the horses and chariots of Egypt.” We must preach Christ, and live Christ. We must be content to lead men to Him and let God place them in the body as it pleases Him.

3. We must crucify our prejudice. The entertainment of racial prejudice is a denial of God's revelation and purpose. Regardless of how we seek to rationalize or justify it we will never gloss over the fact that it is unjust, uncharitable and unchristian. It is not enough that we merely tolerate our brethren of other ethnic backgrounds, but we must receive them and welcome them as God has welcomed us for the sake of Jesus Christ.

God has no stepchildren and we can have no half-brothers in the Lord. There are no second-class citizens in the kingdom made possible and created by "the goodness and loving kindness of God our Savior." We must face up to the issue of our own prejudice very honestly for no other question in our day is quite so likely to make hypocrites of us.

This is evident in religiously oriented institutions such as some schools which resisted integration and held the white line until public and political pressure from without forced them to integrate, and which then began to publicize themselves as champions of racial freedom. It is manifest in those organizations which allowed token integration and pointed to the few blacks among them as a sign of charitable fellowship. Such a flagrant attempt to use men to project a false image is quackery and pretension of the worst kind.

Our prejudice against those of another color or race must be washed away by the blood of the Lamb, for that one blood is the same blood from which God made all nations of men. It is not enough to conceal our true feelings, or to go along because it "is the thing to do." We must mortify or put to death our littleness, intolerance and bigotry.

We will never be able to really further the kingdom in our day until we see our partiality as sin and recognize that so long as we make such distinctions among ourselves we become "judges with evil thoughts." So long as we merely hide our human nature, and cloak it with empty profession and outward appearance we are deceivers. We must overcome this grave sin on our knees and in true penitent confession.

The world is shrinking. The man on the other side of the globe is now closer than the next village was a century ago. We simply cannot afford the luxury of racial hatred or animosity. Hungarians are no longer “Bohunks,” Italians are no longer “Wops,” Jews are no longer “Kikes,” French are no longer “Frogs,” Negroes are no longer “Niggers.” The one who still indulges in this kind of national and racial appellation only reveals his ignorance and provincialism. He dates himself by his uncultured and untutored language. If he thinks in these terms but does not utter them he shows that he only has a thin veneer of silence to cover up a heart seething with bias.

That the Christian world is outgrowing its parochial attitude of the past in the matter of racial differences is apparent from many angles. One that deserves special mention relates to a resolution adopted by the World Congress on Evangelism which met in Berlin in the autumn of 1966. The proclamation was entitled, “One Race, One Gospel, One Task.” Of special significance is the following excerpt.

“All who are ‘in Christ’ henceforth can recognize no distinctions based on race or color and no limitations arising out of human pride or prejudice, whether in the fellowship of those who have come to faith in Christ or in the proclamation of the Good News of Jesus Christ to men everywhere. We reject the notion that men are unequal because of distinction of race or color. In the name of Scripture and of Jesus Christ we condemn racialism wherever it appears. We ask forgiveness for our past sins in refusing to recognize the clear command of God to love our fellowmen with a love that transcends every human barrier or prejudice.”

A genuine implementation of this resolution by the concerned ones who drew it up will make a tremendous impact upon our world. These evangelicals came from 100 nations and represented 70 religious groups. They assembled in “a spectacular display of evangelical unity on the basis of biblical theology and evangelism,” as Carl F. H. Henry phrased it. No one of us ought to hesitate to subscribe to this clear statement on the subject of race. All of us ought to engrave it upon the shield of our hearts.

4. We must recapture the raw courage of faith. In our day, at least in the United States of America, men are no longer put to death by torture for faith in God. Our problem is not one of being faithful unto death, but of remaining faithful until death. However, persecution has not ceased in our neo-pagan world, although it has changed its form. It is now generally psychical rather than physical. Sarcasm has been substituted for the stake, and ridicule has replaced the rack. Men are pilloried now by satirists rather than by soldiers.

Because the means employed are not so bloody or blatant there is a danger that we may be deceived into thinking that a less intense faith will suffice. This is not so. It may be much easier to steel oneself to endure physical agony for a season until welcome death brings respite than to face the daily shafts which wound but do not kill. It is probably easier to die for the faith than to live for it.

Let us mention a few situations where bulldog tenacity is needed to hold on to integrity. Take the case of a soldier who is thrown into company with those whose moral standards, or lack of them, allow them to drink, gamble and frequent houses of prostitution. An atmosphere of profanity and rank obscenity prevails and one who does not indulge in vice is made the subject of constant taunt and the butt of ridicule. To maintain one's faith in God, to read the Bible and to pray regularly, is not easy. One whose spiritual valor does not weaken deserves to be decorated with the badge of superior courage. That many do come through such an ordeal unscathed and unscarred is a testimony to the power of God in the committed life.

Or, consider the student on a large university campus where many of those with whom he is thrown into daily contact are experimenting with hallucinogenic or “mind-expanding” drugs, and who brand as “straights” or “squares” all who resist “the madding crowd’s ignoble strife” and “keep the even tenor of their way.” Such a student can hardly escape being thrown into circumstances where sex is exploited and where resistance to its enticement and blandishment causes one to be regarded as a “kook” or “religious nut.” In our own on-campus dialogues and encounters we have met a lot of young men and women who refuse to “sell their faith down the river.”

I must confess that I have often found in college students that quality of courageous faith demonstrated by another brilliant scholastic, Moses, who absorbed all of the wisdom available in the most profligate culture of his day, and through the sheer genius of his leadership became a national hero (Acts 7:22). But when “the chips were down” by an act of irrevocable faith he turned his back on wealth and political honor, “choosing rather to share ill-treatment with the people of God than to enjoy the fleeting pleasures of sin.” I know young people in high school and college who have actually spent sleepless nights praying and wrestling with their inner selves, buffeting their bodies to bring them into subjection. And I know a lot of them who have won the battle!

I have come to admire a great deal the company of committed ones who have penetrated the secular campus to bring a Christian influence to bear upon the teaching of varied disciplines. I am not especially concerned with the agitation to place the Bible as a textbook in such a college, or with teaching Christianity as one of the “world religions.” Nor have I become especially exercised over the Supreme Court decision to proscribe prepared and prescribed prayers in the classroom.

What I am concerned about is that we have Christian teachers in every department, and praying men and women instructing in all areas.

Aesop had a moral which read, "It is easy to be brave from a safe distance." La Rouchefoucauld wrote, "No man can answer for his courage who has never been in danger." Most of us will never know the pressures brought upon the man or woman who pursues the study of philosophy, psychology, or the healing arts, to the highest degree. That many of these maintain a humble faith in God is a tribute to the same spirit which prompted Sir Walter Raleigh to say on the scaffold, "If the heart be right, it matters not which way the head lies." My own faith has been immeasurably strengthened by physicians, engineers and university instructors who keep theirs.

In our world of regimentation and conformity we are liable to be betrayed into glorifying one who abandons the prosaic and humdrum to go to a remote area as a missionary. Certainly such a person deserves credit and respect, but this may actually require less courage than to be God's missionary where one works in a large department store, a huge factory, or an automobile assembly plant. The man who instructs simple savages in the letters of the alphabet may not face nearly as many problems as one who must meet a civilized "savage" public in the asphalt jungle of a great metropolitan center.

One of the best "missionaries" I know runs a Shell service station. Another has a bread delivery route in a suburban area. Still another works for our state in a home economics program. Another is an engineer in a large aerodynamics plant. They have affected my life in a very substantial manner, but they have done no more for me than a cotton farmer whom I know in the southland who never finished the fourth grade in school. Probably he has helped me as much as any person I have ever met.

J. T. Clarke wrote, "This is the way to cultivate courage: first, by standing firm on some conscientious principle, some law of duty. Next, by being faithful to truth and right on small occasions and common events. Third, by trusting God for help and power." Cicero summed it up for us when he wrote, "A man of courage is also full of faith."

5. We must recapture the impact of the message of hope. We live in an age that is filled to satiety with things. Men are drunken and nauseated by the power of money. The world is growing cold, callous and cruel. Sub-cultures of rebellion have formed in protest against the well-groomed look, the scented bath, and the cosmetic complexion. The "man in the grey flannel suit," the Wall Street promoter, the slick operator, has given way to the Beatles as the projected idols of the younger set.

And the disillusionment with the sham and hypocrisy which has developed from pretending to worship God openly, while keeping a shrine to Mammon in the inner heart, has created a revulsion to the emptiness and vacuity which characterizes life today. It is not a mere circumstance that suicide will claim more lives on the university campus this year than any other means of physical extinction.

This presents to the Way the greatest opportunity it has had since the days of the Caesars. We are fast approaching the very kind of world into which Christianity was launched. We stand at the portals of another "fulness of the times." The tired, jaded, saddened men and women all about us are no different than those who made up the Roman Empire. And we now have every facility to enable us to encircle the globe with the Message.

We have no time left, however, to experiment with incidental or peripheral topics or themes. Humanity in crisis is not interested in our little arguments indulged among ourselves in our little partisan playhouses. The man on the operating table suffering from a gangrenous infection will become impatient with those surgeons who debate the various opinions as to techniques.

We must discover again the very core of the Message, that which is vital, innate and intrinsic. And somehow we must find the way for all who trust in that essence to unite in its proclamation. If the time ever arrives that our world ceases to seethe in ferment and again settles down upon its lees we may find time for Christians to argue and dispute over accessory matters, circumstantials and extraneous situations. But we dare not take time out now to argue the merits of our approaches in the face of impending disaster.

To me our course is plain. We must inject hope, transcendent hope, into the quaking, trembling body of a universe frightened by its own shadow. That means a recovery of the message of the resurrection. Nothing else will do. I have personally tried this out with campus groups in Student Union buildings, in fraternity houses, and in sorority lounges. I have a firm and positive faith in the resurrection. When I speak of it I do so without equivocation. The motto of the apostle is my own guideline, "We also believe and therefore speak!" And I have been astounded at what has happened.

It is upon the fact of the resurrection that all else hinges. "Now if the rising of Christ from the dead is the very heart of our message, how can some of you deny that there is any resurrection?" (1 Corinthians 15:12). No person can honestly and intelligently confront the fact of the resurrection and not be changed. "And if Christ was not raised then neither our preaching nor your faith has any meaning at all." Again, "If Christ did not rise your faith is futile and your sins have never been forgiven."

The resurrection must not be proclaimed as "a doctrine of the church." There is nothing more void or empty to modern man than "a doctrine of the church." He is fed up with the controversies, quarrels and wranglings occasioned by such matters. The resurrection of Jesus is a fact of history, not a theological deduction. It is not a timeless something, but it is like any other historical fact, it was timed!

As a historical fact it relates to man caught up in the historical predicament. There is no such thing as an unrelated historical fact. And man can no more escape or evade the implications of the resurrection for his life than he can escape the implications of the industrial revolution, the discovery of the Salk vaccine, or the launching of space capsules.

We must let men in on God's greatest secret. We must show them the transcendent mystery. Being "in the know" on this is the only thing which can transform earthly beings composed outwardly of clay. Man was not made to continue elemental. "This perishable nature of ours must be wrapped in imperishability; these bodies which are mortal must be wrapped in immortality." The sequel to this is the most startling revelation to a dying race. "So when this perishable is lost in the imperishable, the mortal lost in the immortal, this saying will come true, 'Death is swallowed up in victory.'"

This is the very heart of our Message. We have neglected it at our own peril. We close with the words of Abraham Lincoln, "Surely God would not have created such a being as man, with an ability to grasp the infinite, to exist only for a day. No, no, man was made for immortality."

God and Time

A gang of us were sitting in the library lounge killing time the other day and we got to kicking around our ideas about God. Do you think it is necessary to believe that God is a person, or can we settle for Tillich's idea that God is "the ground of our being"? Also, what is time? Do you think it is a force?

I am certain the conversation alluded to by my young friend in this excerpt from his letter was much more elevating than some other of the "bull sessions" held in college lounges these days. And I find myself a little intrigued by the question about God. The phrasing seems to indicate that the fellows thought one has to believe in God, and the only real question has to do with the nature of God. It is a fact that trying to live by bread alone is a pretty difficult and agonizing experience. You're always hungry deep down, and death by starvation of the personality can be harrowing.

What is meant by the expression, "Is it necessary to believe that God is a person?" Necessary for what? Does this mean, is it necessary for happiness? Or security? Or safety? If so, these are unworthy motivations for believing anything. Actually there is only one honest motive for belief and that is to be intellectually consistent with fact or truth. Anything else is secondary and is more likely to be a consequence or result of belief than a motivation toward it.

This being the case, one should believe about God what commends itself to his heart to be true. He is obligated to examine all of the evidence available and formulate his conclusion upon the basis of that evidence. In this instance the field of research spans the entire range of thought from the need of the human heart to the origin of the universe.

I unhesitatingly accept for myself the belief in God as a personal being. I go farther than that. I believe that my own personality as a rational being stems from him. I am made in his image. So I do not find it necessary for me to believe and trust in the living God, for God's sake only, but also for my sake.

I am sure that a dog can get some animal pleasure out of chewing on a rubber bone made in the image of a real one, but I cannot cut my spiritual eyeteeth or attain to any degree of satisfaction by mentally gnawing at an imitation. I am so constructed that my highest and noblest love must be projected to a responsive being rather than to an invention.

One can make an idol out of a concept as well as out of a tree trunk, and anything which comes between one and God is an idol, whether it is a mental block or a wooden block. And I am not cut out to be an idolater. If the late Paul Tillich derived his ground of being theory from Paul's speech in Athens— "in him we live and move and have our being"— he certainly wrested the passage if he posited a non-personal God. I am not sure he meant to do so!

To be quite honest about it, since the matter has been mentioned, I do not know what Tillich really thought about a good many things. When his writings were the current fad I read a lot of them and tried to look wise when his name was mentioned in company, but I was like a boy learning to swim on an inflated inner tube which someone carelessly punctures with a fish spear. I was glad to quit floundering around and get back to my own depth.

One who comes to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of those who diligently seek him. Any real approach to God must be predicated upon belief in his existence, and it must include the idea that he is not impersonal, incapable, unreachable or aloof. He is concerned about man, and he manifests that concern by rewarding those who seek with diligence. He can be sought, he can be found, and he will reward those who make a meaningful divine-human encounter. I know he can be found because I've found him!

As to the question about time, I realize that there are some philosophers who regard it as a dynamic. I disagree with them. As I view it, time, like space, is a dimension. Space is the realm in which things exist, time is the realm in which things change. And this prompts me to say a few words about those of my good brethren who differentiate between "time" and "eternity." There is no such logical distinction that is valid.

Eternity did not end in order for time to begin. Time will not end in order for eternity to begin or resume. What we call time is simply our way of measuring that segment of eternity in which our existence is cast. Eternity has no past, present or future, although man has, so time marks only the scope of existence of humanity in the broader realm of eternity. Time is for man. Neither God nor lower animals would require it!

Conflict with Caesar

Christians pass their life on earth, but they are citizens in heaven. They obey the established laws, but they out-do the laws in their own lives. They love all men, and are persecuted by all. They are not understood, and are condemned. They are put to death, and yet made alive.— The Epistle to Diognetus (2nd century).

It still seems almost impossible. And the more I think about it, the more convinced do I become that its very success is proof that behind it all there was a divine power shaping its destiny. Of course I have never really doubted that, but I am merely saying that the proof of it lies within the fact itself.

In Jerusalem, for example, the community was formed of Jews with their traditional prejudices and animosities. There were Hebrews and Hellenists, Pharisees and proselytes, and they brought with them their disputes and speculations, as well as their virtues and vices.

In Corinth there were some in the number who were formerly adulterers, homosexual perverts, thieves, drunkards, slanderers and swindlers. Some of them still stood in awe of idols and some resorted to heathen courts in legal action against their own brethren.

In Thessalonica they were drawn from the ranks of the lazy, shiftless loungers who hung out on the market square. They were adept at the art of subsisting on food scrounged from others.

In Ephesus they had been pagans with beclouded wits and hardened hearts, living in ignorance so dense that they wandered in a world of intellectual darkness.

And yet, in spite of all this, they were brought into a state of fellowship so powerful that it was described as one body. They composed an army that became unconquerable, a kingdom that was invincible, a stream that overflowed its banks and drove its waters all over the world. And they did this in the face of opposition so fierce that we can only imagine its intensity. They were bounded by political pawns, harassed by priests and hated by philosophers. They were misunderstood, lied about and falsely accused. Wherever they went they were forced to answer ridiculous charges stemming from falsehoods of such wild nature as to be revolting and disgusting.

Perhaps the first charge ever hurled at them was that they were atheists, and enemies of the human race. The Christians denounced idolatry, refused to attend the festivals and celebrations in the pagan temples, and would not even purchase meat in the markets which had been devoted to the gods. To deny the pantheon of idols was to bring down upon one's head the charge of being an atheist. Justin Martyr, who was killed for the faith about A.D. 165, wrote:

Thus we are called atheists. And we admit that in respect of such supposed gods we are atheists: but not in regard to the most true God, the Father of righteousness and moderation and the other virtues, the God who is without a trace of evil. Him we worship and adore, and His Son, who came from him and taught us of these things, and the host of the other good angels who attend on God and are of god-like nature, and the Spirit of prophecy. These we worship with reason and truth.

It was also alleged that the Christians constituted a cult devoted to clandestine practice of unspeakable immoralities. Several factors gave rise to this accusation. In the community of saints the women enjoyed greater freedom than in many other areas. They sat down together with the men at the same table for the “love feasts,” an expression which was given a suggestive meaning by the pagans.

Too, many of the meetings were held before daybreak or after sunset. This was made necessary by virtue of the fact that many Christians were slaves and were forced to spend all of the daylight hours toiling in the fields. However, their detractors circulated the report that the darkness was used as a cover for indulgence in riotous orgies.

One of the widely circulated calumnies was to the effect that the Christians were cannibals, and that in their feast they ate human flesh and drank a libation of human blood. This is an indication of how statements with reference to the Lord’s Supper were twisted and wrested by the enemies of righteousness. In order to show the problems faced by the community of believers in confrontation with the world of its day, let us consider the following from A History of the Christian Church, by the eminent Dr. Charles Hase.

“Against Christianity was urged; its foreign and barbarous origin, to which all that was national must give way, all that was true or good in Christianity belonged still more anciently to philosophy, so that the only novelty which it possessed was a most repulsive outward form, its sacred scriptures were of doubtful origin, and had frequently been altered; Jesus was said to have been the offspring of adultery, instructed by magicians in Egypt, and surrounded only by wretched fishermen and abandoned publicans, to have died in the expression of unmanly sorrows, and finally to have given no proof of his resurrection except what was derived from his own followers. Against Christians it was urged: that they had deified a public malefactor; that they demanded a blind faith; that they invited to their society those who were sinners and criminals, while in the heathen mysteries, none were initiated but those who were pure in heart; that the various Christian sects were intolerant towards each other; that they were remarkably unfortunate; and finally, that if they were not secret criminals, they shunned publicity, and were enemies to the eternal city of Rome.”

How did the community of saints become a force which could not be ignored? They had no structures or edifices to which they could invite the populace. They had no scriptures of their own, no “new testaments” to distribute. They were without newspapers, tracts or other literature. They possessed no printing presses or duplicating devices. There were no loudspeaking systems, no radio or television sets.

They could not communicate with one another at a distance except by courier. Their overland journeys were made slow and laborious by foot travel. Their journeys to other lands depended upon the vagaries of maritime breezes. And they were always in peril, on land and sea. How can we account for the spread of the Way? What can we learn from these primitive believers which might enable us once again to recapture the vitality and virility of their lives. We cannot possibly go behind the curtain which time has drawn and reveal all of the factors, but we would like to suggest a few items of interest for the fellowship of the concerned ones. We do this very humbly in the hope that we may be helpful to those who read.

THE SECRET OF STRENGTH

(1) Their relationship to Jesus was not an organizational one, but personal. They did not join something, but they were joined to the Lord in a union so intimate it was illustrated by the act of consummation in marriage. They became one spirit with him and thus they were transformed by their very closeness to the divine.

It was their complete and unreserved surrender to Jesus, their uninhibited pledge of allegiance unto him, which made them holy. The word “holy” simply means “different.” Their difference was manifest and noticeable in speech, behavior and action.

They never thought of Jesus as coming to start a new religion, but to give life. And they seldom engaged in the comparison of “their religion” with “other religions.” They did not propagate a better religion as opposed to an inferior one; they simply proclaimed life as opposed to death.

Since Jesus was the life, all life grew out of and was related to Jesus. One loved his wife as Jesus loved the church (Ephesians 5:25); slaves loved their earthly masters as slaves of Christ (Ephesians 6:6); all forgave each other as God in Christ forgave them. Life was measured by Christ. He was both the center and the circumference of existence. The saints reacted in every situation as he would have reacted. Thus they were never lonely, for they had no sense of aloneness. They walked in the light of his promise never to leave them or forsake them.

(2) Every saint was a soldier, a runner, a fighter in the arena. There was no need to form a “Christian Athlete’s Association.” The entire community created by Jesus was just that. Every member was salt, every one was light, every one was a living stone.

No one thought of paying another to fight for him, or of hiring someone else to be a light for him. No one sat in the bleachers or grandstand to watch a performance. The Way was not a dramatization to be presented for critical spectators by an actor, for the Way was not a play at all. It was for real! And those who were in it grew tired and sweaty and bloody. And some of them died for it!

There was no missionary society because no one could have attended its meetings. They were all too busy fulfilling their mission to take time out to talk about it. There was no discussion about means or methods, plans or programs. Wherever one who was “in” met one who was “without” he encountered him with faith and love. “As for those who had been scattered, they went through the country telling the Good News.” Here is the way Edwyn Bevan puts it in his book Hellenism and Christianity:

“The track of Paul shines curiously in the mists of primitive Christianity, but it was for the most part by persons whose names were soon forgotten in this world—undistinguished evangelists, or itinerant traders, or slaves—that the Good News was carried from city to city, ‘till the whole world was leavened.’”

This host of the nameless ones, styled by the poet Vachel Lindsay, “an endless line of splendor,” outlived, outloved and outdied the enemies of the cross. They penetrated every avenue of a rotten, corrupt and decaying society, and it was purged and purified by their passing. They were made courageous by the hope of his coming. And they loved not their lives unto death.

(3) Their message was not a recital of decrees or a repetition of dogma. It was not the imposition of a systematic theology, for their theology was not documentary but personal. Jesus was the Word of God, the theos logos, the theology of God.

One cannot confine life and love to a book, not even a divinely authorized one. He can write about life or love, but he cannot capture either in an ink bottle or within a leather cover. The saints of old never thought of a Bible saving the world. A lost world needs a Savior. Those who are sick need a physician.

They did not confuse the physician with his prescription, the captain with his commands, the Father with his chastening rod, or the friend with his letters. To them, Christianity was not Jesus pointing them to a book, but a book pointing them to Jesus. Grace and truth came by Jesus Christ.

Grace was God stooping down, bending low, to become like man; truth is the lifting up of man to be like God. Neither is something to merely read about; both are what life itself is all about. Grace and truth can never be kept in wineskins that are either old or new. They elude every attempt to capture them; they overflow every container created to confine them.

So the early disciples did not seek to become great lawyers like the scribes, but great lovers like the Christ. The Word was not a repository of texts to be searched, scrapped and scrutinized to build a case with which to belabor an opponent. There was no attempt to formulate doctrines of the faith. Not once did they ever use the word in the plural to signify that which was revealed from heaven.

They knew nothing about developing “a theology of the Spirit,” or “a theology of the nature of God,” so they refused to wrangle or dispute about the bones of contention which have been dug up to be strung together to form the skeletons in our sectarian closets.

(4) They knew the value and power of the fellowship created by the Spirit and found comfort and strength in an association composed of those who rejoiced at the great salvation wrought in their behalf. There was no question but what something had happened to them, all of them, something so breathtaking that it is still a thrill to read about it.

They described what they had been when allied with God’s rebel subjects in these words, “We too were of their number: we all lived our lives in sensuality, and obeyed the promptings of our own instincts and notions. In our natural condition we, like the rest, lay under the dreadful judgment of God.”

The very next sentence throbs with hope. “But God, rich in mercy, for the great love he bore us, brought us to life with Christ even when we were dead in our sins; it is by his grace you are saved.” Mercy, love, life, grace, salvation— they shared in them all, and their union was one of life-given and life-giving experience.

They were participants of a supernatural condition. Creation is always a miracle, and the new creation is no exception. In the natural condition they were under dreadful judgment, but there is no condemnation to those who are united with Christ Jesus, because in Christ Jesus the life-giving law of the Spirit has set you free from the law of sin and death!

They were a fellowship of the free, a company of the committed, and a community of the consecrated. They belonged together simply because together they belonged to him. They were one body and thus were of one heart and of one soul. As members of a common body they functioned in unison, prayed in unison, and performed in unison. And the cold, cruel, callous pagan world said in tones filled with awe, “Behold how these love one another.”

IMPLICATIONS FOR OUR DAY

We live in a neo-pagan world. Rival power structures jostle each other for supremacy. Moral integrity is at a low ebb. Thus we have in our generation the greatest opportunity in centuries to test the power of the Christian dynamic to survive and triumph. That dynamic was designed to enter a pagan world and transform it. It is a dynamic of conquest and directed by one who is destined to reign until God has put all enemies under his feet.

The soldiers of the Lamb are a minority group as they were intended to be. It must be made apparent that the power to overcome is of God and not of men. But if we are enlisted under him we are the forces of ultimate victory. True, these forces are misunderstood, falsely accused and even maligned. This is but a part of their discipline. "It gives you a share in Christ's sufferings, and that is cause for joy; and when his glory is revealed, your joy will be triumphant." We should regard insult and innuendo like the soldier does an obstacle course. It is part of the training.

There are some changes we must make if we are to recapture the power to triumph. "It is time for judgment to begin and it must begin with God's own household." I should like to suggest a few steps necessary to recapture the dynamic. These are musts; not might or maybes.

(1) We must cease to equate our sectarian structures and their supporting organizational machinery with the one body filled with and impelled by the Holy Spirit. The one body is composed of individuals joined to Jesus as their head, and every person on earth who has pledged allegiance unto him and been born into the realm of the new humanity is in the one body. They are joined together in him precisely because they are in him and for no other reason. They constitute a divine organism because of the ties of the Spirit and not because of organizational ties devised as party bonds.

(2) We must cease to judge the loyalty of men to the King by their attitude toward secondary matters in the kingdom. Just as citizens of the United States of America may honestly differ over the tariff, public aid to private educational institutions, and the draft law, and still be loyal citizens, so those in the kingdom of heaven may hold varied views about many things without being traitors to Christ. No honest opinion about instrumental music, the millennium, cups, classes or colleges, makes one an apostate. One may be right or wrong about any such matters without forfeiting his family relationship. Those who make tests of fellowship out of such issues do far more harm to God's purpose than these things themselves do.

(3) We must stop trying to deceive and hoodwink men by false claims or weasel words. For example, such signs as “The Church of Christ— God’s Ecumenical Movement,” when taken in the sense meant by those who erect them, project an image that is patently false. They represent a brazen attempt to capitalize on current ecumenical concerns, but in reality they mean simply that a specific group of a particular branch of the noninstrumental segment of a nineteenth century restoration movement contains all of the people of God, and that these are ecumenically minded. That is just not true as those on the inside know all too well.

(4) We must start “leveling” with our generation. Men frequently engage in a great deal of double-talk, leaving the impression that they are more open and receptive to all of God’s children, but when the chips are down they are just as narrow and intolerant as they always were. Journals which are edited as partisan mouthpieces often conceal in clever phraseology their factional bias, but it is there just the same. When they talk of unity they have only one idea in mind and that is complete surrender to their opinions and unwritten creeds. We need to “tell it as it is.”

(5) We must begin practicing congregational autonomy in honest fashion. To profess to believe in such autonomy and then exclude those congregations which do not line up with the party program is rank hypocrisy. If congregational autonomy extends only to those who conform to us in every particular under penalty of exclusion, it is neither congregational nor autonomous. The right to self-government entails the right of choice, and unless one has the possibility of being mistaken, he has no choice. Any congregation that does not recognize another congregation of saints simply because they believe in instrumental music or the premillennial coming of our Lord, does not believe in congregational autonomy, and it is sailing under false colors when it pretends that it does.

(6) We must find a way to implement in meaningful fashion “the priesthood of all believers.” Our vocabulary related to ministry must become scriptural. As it is, we pay lipservice to a divine ideal while we practice a human substitute. The world is no longer ignorant. It can tell when we support a clerical caste even while we condemn the division between clergy and laity. Every man and woman in Christ must be a minister, every one must become a priest of God. And we must create opportunities for them to function effectively.

(7) We must cease to think of what is done in our religious edifices as a service. Our service is not held on Sunday morning, but may be rendered on Monday morning. Service is not carrying out a ritual, but meeting a genuine need. It is entering into the life situation with others in a sharing experience, because God shared with us by entering into our life situation. It is the Word being made our flesh to dwell among men to participate in their sufferings, and thus in his agony.

(8) We must stop dividing life into sacred and secular compartments. In the Christian life nothing which God has made is secular. Unless everything is sacred and spiritual, nothing is. Jesus abolished the artificial lines which men had drawn to separate life into neat little properly-labeled pigeon-holes. What I do in my own home, or in an office or shop, is as important to God as what I do in a temple or synagogue. God is not worshiped in temples made with hands. For instance, it is not partaking of the Lord’s Supper which makes my life acceptable unto God, but it is my life which makes partaking of the Lord’s Supper acceptable unto God.

(9) We must cease talking about holy days, holy places and holy liturgy. Life itself, when consecrated to God, is the only sacred liturgy. Christianity has no special sacred places or sacred days. The human heart is God’s only sanctuary. Those who talk about dedicating a building to God have fallen victims to what Elton Trueblood calls “the heresy of brick and mortar.”

God cannot be captured in the traps we build. He cannot be confined in the boxes we construct. It is silly to see a community with thirty edifices all “dedicated to the one God,” whose members have nothing to do with one another, and who have piled up brick and stone in an endeavor to commandeer God so they may be the sole dispensers of divine grace.

10) We must revive the message of vibrant hope and proclaim anew to a tired, jaded, weary and forlorn world, the resurrection. This is the way out of all that is distressing and the way into every eternal blessing. Men cannot be kept from suicide by well-arranged arguments on doctrinal distinctions. That which has no power to produce life should not be used to promote death.

Our gospel is not null and void whether the coming of Jesus is premillennial or postmillennial; our faith is not in vain whether Bible classes prove to be right or wrong. No one who is mistaken about one cup or individual cups will turn out to be a lying witness for God. But, “if there be no resurrection, then Christ was not raised, then our gospel is null and void, and so is your faith; and we turn out to be lying witnesses for God, because we bore witness that he raised Christ to life.”

Jesus was not raised from the dead to preside over either a class faction or an anti-class faction; nor was he raised to form a one-cup party or a multiple-cups party. Christ was raised to life and for life. He was raised to give life, and “it is only for this life that Christ has given us hope, we of all men are most to be pitied.” How long shall we continue to major in minors, persist in pettifoggery, and fool with the frivolous, while the world goes to hell all around us? Has our course of action saved mankind? Have we populated heaven by propagating division?

CONCLUSION

Today, as in every age, the forces of Christ confront the phalanxes of Caesar. On one side, men are motivated by the idea that “might makes right;” on the other by the principle that “right makes might.” One wields the naked sword of steel, the other the sword of the Spirit which is the word of God. One climbs to greatness over the bodies of men, the other elevates men to greatness in the body of Christ.

Which is greater— the power of selfish lust or the power of unselfish love? We are met on a great battlefield testing for our generation which of them is supreme. The course we take will affect generations yet unborn, as our own conflict is influenced by those long since dead. One thing is certain, the issue is so tremendous that we cannot afford to maintain those systems, methods and structures which will place the outcome in doubt.

Let us free ourselves from every hindering encumbrance, and rid ourselves of every weight that restrains us. Let us fight the good fight of faith regardless of consequences. Abraham Lincoln said, “The probability that we may fail in the struggle ought not to deter us from the support of the cause we believe to be just.” And Lincoln also said, “The occasion is piled high with difficulty, and we must rise high with the occasion.”

The Uncommon Faith

For a long time I have been pondering how limited is our concept of what the Word really accomplished when he took off the robe of divine equality and hung it up in the heavenly vestry, and donned the slave garb which made it possible for him to share with the earthborn ones. The first infant cry in the stable was the signal that God was with us. The great gulf between the divine and the human had been spanned. This whirling sphere became the visited planet, and like any other visited planet it would never be the same.

The power of heaven to reach man where he was, and as he was, became a fact rather than a prophetic dream. And this manifestation transcended and culminated all previous exhibitions for these were but signs pointing to the Great Sharing. So majestic and sublime was the divine breakthrough that it challenges our puny intellects, and some must still seek for reassurance in lesser demonstrations. These are hailed as proof of faith. They are really symptoms of doubt. They betoken the longing of troubled and distraught minds to know that God is still with them.

To the man of unadulterated trust there is no need to ascend into heaven and bring Christ down from above, for faith says that the word is near, even in the mouth and in the heart. From the moment the Son touched the earth with his feet, the earth itself became the sphere of God's influence and everything that God had made bore eloquent testimony to the divine purpose. It was not in vain that the Lord summoned the common things of nature to testify.

Once upon a time God spoke to Moses from a burning bush on the slopes of Horeb, but it is not necessary for me to journey to such a special spot. Every bush and flowering shrub now speaks eloquently of the difference between created and inherent glory and the artificial adornment which is external. "Behold the lilies of the field . . . even Solomon in all of his glory was not arrayed like one of these." The rose blooming in my backyard is God's "burning bush" for me.

Elijah was fed by the ravens which brought him flesh to eat, but my soul is daily nourished by the birds which flutter about my feeder. "Behold the fowls of the air: for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they?" "Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? Yet one of them shall not fall to the ground without your heavenly Father knowing it." The mockingbird, the bluejays and the cardinals are God's ravens sent to feed my spirit with providential manna.

Our real problem is that we are still dull of hearing. We are yet "fools, and slow of heart to believe." We find it easier to walk by sight than by faith. Caught up in the human predicament, sinful and unable to forgive ourselves, haunted by the specters of our past evil deeds, we are afraid to trust the testimony of the ages. The divine outburst of love was so powerful it staggers our guilt-soaked imagination. We want to believe it but we are forlorn, frightened and suspicious.

In this state of mind we eagerly seek for some new proof that He has not withdrawn. The Visit was too long ago. It was then and there. We must have something here and now. Faith, which was intended to span aeons is running out in our generation. We want a discernible tug on the chain reaching into the gloom, to know that the anchor is still there.

Then let this be my personal testimony that I have no desire or inclination to seek additional proof of his love and mercy. My faith would be no stronger if I saw someone raised from the dead. I need not see a withered arm straightened to know that His own arm is not shortened that it cannot save. It is not necessary for me to spend long hours in agonizing prayer for another tongue. I have not yet finished praising him in the language wherein I was born. It is not a divine eloquence I seek, but the ability to share more fully the depth of my human gratitude for his forgiveness. With me, it is not that I speak, and therefore believe; but rather that I believe and therefore speak.

The voice of heaven is all around me, for “to him who, in the love of Nature, holds communion with her visible forms, she speaks a various language.” Once, when He was here as a Servant he came to his frightened followers and said unto them, “Why are you troubled and why do thoughts arise in your hearts?” I shall not forget those words now that He is Lord!

As Shaw Said It

[Abstract]

I confess that I am not especially intrigued by the literary, economical, political, or religious views of George Bernard Shaw. However, I do acknowledge that the “Shavian” wit unleashed some remarks in the last field which are as poignant as they are pungent. Take this one: “The best reformers the world has ever seen are those who commence on themselves.” Or, “The churches must learn humility, as well as teach it.”

But the one I really wanted to mention was this: “Any religion that is going to unite man . . . must have room for mystics, prophets, and for priests, and it must be a religion of such a character as will prevent the priests from stoning the prophets.”

The outstanding thing about the primitive community of grace-sharers was its roominess. It differed from the narrow Jewish sects and Greek cults with their national, racial and cultural distinctions. “Gone is the distinction between Jew and Greek, slave and free man, male and female, you are all one in Christ Jesus.” The Way could unite the world because it ignored the distinctions which kept it divided. And when distinctions are ignored they are gone. Nothing is more useless than a distinction which does not distinguish.

But Satan took advantage of our inner feeling of insecurity and substituted other distinctions— intellectual, psychological and notional. Mystics and pragmatists vied with one another to capture the kingdom for their enthusiasts. The priestly group, always dedicated to the preservation of form even at the cost of human dignity, engaged in the great religious activity of all ages, the stoning of the prophets.

We need to restore the roominess of the ransomed community. We have allowed the space intended for people to become cluttered up with theological tools and unnecessary utensils. Instead of throwing out people to have room for things, we need to throw out things to have room for people— all the people of God. God's house is big enough for all of his family. The Father has begotten no surplus or unwanted children. He loves them all and He wants them with him.

I am resolved that where I am, all of my brethren will be welcome, regardless of how far they may be from me in their ideas about how the children should implement the Father's will. I shall not split, sunder or sever the brethren from one another. I refuse to shiver the family into fragments over my deductions and views. There is room in the kingdom for a multitude of folk who disagree with me and I propose to receive and love them all. I would rather walk in to meet the Father with my brothers at my side, than to march in before Him in the splendor of isolation.

The Stumblingblock

“It is demonstrable that many of the obstacles to change which have been attributed to human nature are in fact due to the inertia of institutions and to the voluntary desire of powerful classes to maintain the existing status.”— John Dewey.

A goodly number of our readers will consider that this issue of our paper represents a sheer waste of time. They are interested in the history of God’s community as we have been tracing it, but they are not greatly concerned with the contemporary struggles of the heirs of our early nineteenth century restoration movement. I happen to be one of those heirs by adoption, having been first rocked in another reformation cradle. I am interested in what is happening to us.

It is our good fortune to be cast into an age of religious ferment and upheaval. Ponderous ancient structures such as the Roman and Anglican Establishments are seething, writhing and struggling within. The Protestant parties are re-aligning themselves all over the world. It would be difficult for any people like ourselves to insulate themselves completely from this stirring of minds, in spite of a century of monasticism brought about through fear and a mistaken sense of how to show loyalty to our Lord.

We began, you know, as “a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects.” We have ended up more divided than those whom we sought to unite, and generally believing that there are no Christians in the sects. Thus we lost our purpose and forgot our goal, and frenziedly attacked one another over our varied deductions, conclusions and interpretations. The very revelation which we heralded to others as a means of unity became the battleground upon which we shivered into factional splinters.

Moved by a false philosophy which we developed in our initial fracture we have continued to fragment ourselves into belligerent parties of “loyal brethren” until many have concluded our state is hopeless and have resigned themselves to slogging along the schismatic path until death brings relief. But this is a mistake. Conditions are going to improve. There are signs apparent that the trend is rapidly developing.

For example, in South America, our brethren of various segments have held amicable meetings. In Texas, representatives of both sides of the unfortunate cleavage over what is dubbed “institutionalism” have held meaningful dialogue sessions. The response to these from brethren everywhere demonstrates that there is a great reservoir of good will among the saints. Thoughtful and perceptive brethren in all of our parties are beginning to evaluate anew the reasons assigned for our factional divisions. They are finding many of them inadequate and unscriptural.

There is one obstacle to even wider recognition of that fellowship which is found only in the person of Jesus. That is the use of instrumental music. In letters which I now receive from all over the United States this issue is raised over and over.

It is very easy for me to see why this particular problem seems so important to many of the brethren. In the first place, this was the issue credited with responsibility for our first division. It is very doubtful that the factors leading to the breakdown of our relationship can be so simplified. Every indication is that personal, cultural and psychological reactions also played their part. However, our traditional and historical position has led to the assignment of instrumental music as the basic cause of our original separation. It has been exalted by both sides to a prominence which it really does not deserve.

Secondly, the means taken to resolve the issue in its inception, have contributed much to its current status. Deep antagonism and bitterness were aroused, ridicule and invective were indulged. Partisan debates filled with acrimony, insinuation, and false accusation, became the order of the day. Suits followed in the civil courts and were carried to higher tribunals on repeated appeals. (You can read this history in my book “The Path of Peace”). No people can engage in such actions without being scarred and left to suffer from deep trauma.

OUR CIVIL WAR

Because of these circumstances, each side in the civil war between brethren, chose their hilltops on either side of “the valley of decision.” Here they dug their trenches, erected their fortresses and established their strongholds. To abandon either position now to move toward the valley to discuss terms of peace or to arrange for a cessation of hostilities is regarded as a traitorous action. By such deception the enemy of souls who has infiltrated both camps with his propaganda, guarantees that we shall continue to war against one another rather than combine our efforts against his evil forces.

Complicating the picture even more is the fact that the problem has shifted from a rational to an emotional plane. The instrument is tangible. It can be seen. But it has become the visible symbol of an intangible set of values. The values are worthy and valid but the instrument is not and never can become an adequate representative of them. To exalt it is but to demonstrate the littleness of our own thoughts and lives.

To those who oppose it, the instrument is viewed as an indication of rebellion against the sovereign authority of Christ. They would as soon see Satan declaiming from the pulpit as to see an organ on it. To them, the instrument is accepted as undeniable proof that the pledge of allegiance to the King has been renounced and the fort surrendered lock, stock and barrel, to the legions of torment.

To those who defend its use, the instrument is regarded as a visible proof of their liberty. They would as soon see Old Glory hauled down from its mast and trampled underfoot in the mud, as to silence the instrument. They have congratulated themselves so long that they are more free from the sectarian spirit than “the antis,” whom some of them fear, and others secretly despise, that they would regard any concession not as an expression of love for brethren, but a wholesale surrender to the enemy.

A little thought will show how easily we have permitted ourselves to be betrayed into allowing a material thing to become our criterion for spiritual qualities. We have all been a little childish. I know some brethren who use instrumental music who are not free men in Christ. They are legalistic, egotistic, and shackled by their own littleness. On the other hand, I know some brethren who are opposed to the use of the instrument who are conscious of the true meaning of grace and are magnanimous in spirit. This proves nothing except that a material instrument can never become a yardstick of liberty or freedom in Christ.

By the same token, I know of God-fearing, Christ-revering, Bible-loving brethren in congregations where the instrument is used, even as I know of some brethren who are worldly, carnal and sensual, in congregations where its use is deplored. The absence of an instrument in the meetinghouse is no guarantee of Christ in the heart.

It is tragic that we have allowed an attitude toward a thing to blindfold and lead us into the party spirit which is condemned as a work of the flesh and a symptom of spiritual immaturity. That we have done so is amply evidenced in the letters that I receive and the forums that I conduct.

Preachers from the non-instrument segment continuously write to ask why I do not attack the shortcomings of “the Christian Church” as I do those in “the Church of Christ.” Almost invariably they will admit that what I say about “us” is justified but they want me to get after “them” also. It is difficult for them to realize that with me there is no longer an us and them, but only a we. I no longer belong to the “us party” as opposed to the “they party.”

The sad thing about the letters is that “they” reveal what is wrong with “us.” Instead of going to work to purge ourselves from evil attitudes which we admittedly have, we want to be sure that others are placed in the same guilt spectrum as our selves. Some of the brethren querulously ask, “Isn’t there anything wrong with them? Why don’t you write about their faults like you do ours?” We forget the priority rating of Jesus, “Take the log out of your own eye first!”

One of the questions, frequently and almost plaintively asked by preachers who defend the use of the instrument, is this: “Brother Ketcherside, which group do you consider more charitable and interested in fellowship, your brethren or ours?” This is very revealing. It shows that even though I do not make the use of the instrument a test of fellowship, these are inclined to make its non-use a test. Indeed, I predict that when the time comes that non-instrument brethren no longer make use of the instrument a test of union or communion, those who use it will sometimes make its non-use a test.

In answer to this question, I always ask, “What do you mean by ‘your brethren or ours,’ since I thought that those who are charitable in fellowship regarded all of us as brethren together, and members of the same family?” These brethren are like the apostle Peter, “After all, the way you speak gives you away” (Matthew 26:73). The fact is that some non-instrument brethren are quite open and charitable, while some instrument brethren are quite Pharisaical and exclusive. The reverse is also true. Both groups have some they would like to swap off. All of us need to be on guard that we do not fall under the same condemnation as the critics of Paul. “They make up their own standards to measure themselves by, and judge themselves by their own standards” (2 Corinthians 10:12).

We must be realistic. We have a problem. We cannot solve it by an idealistic, dream-world approach. We did not create the division, we inherited it. This heritage brought with it all of the overtones of suspicion and distrust engendered in a feud in which our fathers hacked each other to bits before the eyes of a skeptical and amused generation. Nothing pleased the sectarian world more than to see those who set out to save them from their strife and to unite them, end up in a bitter brawl which splintered them into rival clans filled with hatred and envy.

It is apparent to thinking men that we must go back and heal this original fracture, or we will remain a divided movement. It is not enough for each side to bind up its own wounds and sew up its own rents, while we continue to present the spectacle of two factions, each claiming to be the one body. In such a predicament we will not be able to present a valid plea for unity to a world seeking for such a plea. We will always be subjected to the pragmatic question, “If your proposal will work, why don’t you first demonstrate it by uniting the forces in your own movement? Then we will examine it.”

ASSESSING RESPONSIBILITY

We will get nowhere by merely trying to assess the guilt for the original rupture. The fact is that all of us know that civil wars are always created by complex involvements, many of which are not even apparent at the time. We must free ourselves from the childish tendency to point a finger at one another and scream, "You did it!"

The time is past for partisan front-men to swagger back and forth on the forensic platform and yell, "Who split the log?" The real question before the house now is, "Who has the courage to put it back together?" The age of demagoguery is over. The time for constructive action is at hand.

In my own examination of our history I repudiate the attitudes and conclusions of both sides. This does not mean that I censure our fathers for acting as they did. They were sincere men. They did the best they knew. If I had lived in their day and time I would have reacted exactly as they did. Indeed, in a different generation than theirs, for a long time, I followed as meticulously as possible in the factional footsteps of my ancestors. I memorized their arguments, defended their historic attitudes, and valiantly maintained their traditional partisan walls and barbed wire fences. I no longer do so!

I have resolved that no skeletal hand reaching forth from the tomb will shackle my thinking or stifle my speech. I refuse to perpetuate the old fratricidal wars or try to prove my faithfulness to the Father by ruthlessly attacking his other children. My loyalty is not to my dead progenitors but to the living Christ. And just as I cannot be saved by the deeds of my fathers, so I refuse to be damned for adopting and perpetuating their mistakes, when I know better.

I am convinced that those brethren who introduced the instrument over the solemn protests of many brethren did a grave wrong. I am convinced that those who contribute to our contemporary division by maintaining it over continued protest in many areas, do a grave injury to the cause of fellowship in Christ Jesus.

But I am equally convinced that those who made of it a test of fellowship and separated from their brethren over the issue, also made a tragic mistake, a crucial error, from which the cause suffers until this very day.

Let me state again that in the atmosphere then extant the course was almost inevitable. But in the greater light now available and with full knowledge of the fruits of their decision, it can be seen that the creation of two parties, pro and con, was sinful and wrong. If it became necessary to meet in different places the fabric of brotherhood should have been kept inviolate and the fraternal spirit unquenched. No one should have “set at nought his brother” over an instrument.

But it was done, and now we have two parties, both of whom love the Lord and revere his word, but who are cast in the role of enemies rather than as children of the same Father. What shall we do? What can we do? There are several alternatives.

We can continue to attack each other in the pulpit and press, and by means of radio and other communications media. And we can still challenge each other to partisan debate and repeat over and over the same antiquated arguments and threadbare propositions.

There are several things wrong with such a procedure. It has not produced unity in the past but has only widened the chasm between us. It has served to crystallize the party spirit and consolidate the factional attitude. It has been tried a hundred years and has proven to be a failure. Moreover, it has lost any relevance in an age when the very foundations of Christianity and the social structure based upon it are threatened. It has no real appeal to enlightened and perceptive students who recognize it as a destructive and divisive tool.

Or, we can simply ignore each other and build up our partisan establishments in cool disdain for one another. This approach is suspect because it is the easy way, the shallow and superficial way. But it is not the way of brotherly love to which we are undeniably committed by our Lord. It is not the way of Christ! And it offers no real solution for it is the way of evasion. It is dishonest!

Our problem has been intensified because it has been thought that the only mode of settlement was by surrender of one party to the other, a cold-blooded either/or proposition. Either those who use the instrument must give it up and confess that they have sinned, or else those who oppose it must be convinced it is right and adopt it. Until one side or the other gives in or gives up, they are doomed to batter and bruise each other in an attempt to reduce someone to submission.

However, the real hope does not lie in the surrender of one party to the other, but in the surrender of both parties to Christ. Then the Holy Spirit can actively work in both to bring them to the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. It is useless for one side to talk about lack of respect for the authority of Jesus as long as we are in schism. While we are separated from one another none of us is in full subjection to Jesus. We are walking contrary to the divine purpose, plan and peace. We are living in contradiction to the very prayer of Jesus for our oneness.

Nothing can be clearer than that the Holy Spirit condemns all division among the children of God. It is carnal and a work of the flesh. It is sinful and scandalous. It is a projection of Satan. No man who is not a peacemaker can be called a child of God. No man respects the authority of Jesus while he passes judgment upon, or despises his brother (Romans 14:10).

Surrender to Christ does not eliminate the problem of the instrument. It will be there as intensely as before. But such surrender places the instrument in proper perspective. It makes the family relationship more vital and valuable than any peculiarity of those within it. When Paul wrote about eating meat and esteeming days, he did not remove the meat or the days. He simply showed that a brother was worth more than either. “Do not let the food that you eat ruin the man for whom Christ died.” That for which Jesus did not die can never become as important as one for whom he did die. And Jesus did not die for a piano.

THINKING ABOUT ROMANS 14

While we are talking about Romans 14 a few suggestions are in order. Most of the non-instrument brethren refuse to place the instrument in the category of eating meats and observing days. They are perceptive enough to realize that if they do so, this will end their judging of the servants of someone else. They also know that each person must be fully allowed to make up his own mind, and that whatever one does about such things he does to the Lord. However, these same brethren will concoct an argument and resort to Romans 14:23 to sustain it. When Paul says, “Whatsoever is not of faith is sin,” he is talking about the things in this chapter. It seems inconsistent and even unscrupulous to deny that a thing is covered by a chapter and then appeal to that very text to condemn it.

Not too long ago, a fellow-editor who is sincerely questing for union, made a suggestion to those who use the instrument in his area, that if they would forego its employment in the Lord’s Day morning service at least, it would make it possible for non-instrument brethren to meet and break bread with them. He made his appeal on the basis of Romans 14 and even agreed to accept the role of the weak brother. While this sounds very gracious it falls far short of the scriptural approach.

First of all, it reveals that the instrument is not the real problem at all, but a woeful misunderstanding of worship and fellowship. Some of us have long known that this is the root of most of our trouble. The word of God says nothing about “five acts of worship.” That is a term coined in Church of Christ traditionalism. Although a good many Greek words are translated worship, the term is never once applied to anything we do when we gather on the Lord’s Day. And the expression “the worship” of such notoriety on our signboards is not even in the scriptures.

To assume that we must all sing in order to worship corporately is without scriptural warrant. No one can show that the early saints ever engaged in congregational singing. It is simply not in the scriptures. One can show that when the whole community of saints came together in one place, one man had a hymn, another a teaching, another a revelation, another a tongue, another an interpretation. A case can be made for singing a solo but there is no precedent for congregational singing.

To postulate that because brethren do something while they are singing which makes it impossible for me to join in the singing, and therefore, I cannot even participate with them in what they do that is right and commendable, is ridiculous. The brethren could “worship acceptably” if they did not have singing on Lord’s Day, and I could “worship acceptably” without joining in the congregational singing if they did have it.

It borders a little on the absurd for men who profess to be learned in the scriptures to talk about the instrument “corrupting the worship,” and this to such an extent that they cannot even break bread with their brethren. Perhaps no greater demonstration of the sectarian attitude could be imagined.

I do not believe that Romans 14 was intended to provide a spiritual “bargaining issue” or “horse-swapping” position. It is commendable if a brother exercises his right not to do certain things out of deference for my personal conviction. But I have no right to demand that he do so as a condition of union, communion, or brotherly recognition. He is my brother whether he defers in love to my conscience, or does not. And I shall walk in love toward him regardless of how he considers me.

It is high time that we undo the factional error of our fathers by removing instrumental music from the category of a test of fellowship. It never should have been elevated to such a position in the first place. We only prolong error by allowing it to remain there. This says nothing about the right or wrong of the thing. It requires no alteration of one's views about its merits. It simply declares that brotherhood in Christ Jesus is more important than one's view about this matter.

This will free us to combine our efforts and work together in those areas where instrumental music is not a factor. There are many such areas. They require the best of all of us. The instrument will still be a matter for discussion but not for division. We ought to be able to unite at least up to the point where the problem begins. Because of the traumatic effect of my proposal, especially upon those who oppose instrumental music, I suggest the following considerations which may make the task of reconciliation easier for them.

THINGS TO THINK ABOUT

1. The use of the instrument is not a test of one's respect for the authority of Christ. Many of those who use it have a profound regard for the Lordship of Jesus over their lives. If they believed that instrumental music contravened that authority they would abandon it in a minute. They love the Lord. They seek to be guided by his word. Many of them have willingly relinquished sectarian relationships because of their conversion to the restoration ideal. It is not that they trample underfoot the authority of Jesus, but simply that they do not concur in our interpretation of it in one aspect. They do not despise the Constitution, they simply reject our claim to be the Supreme Court to rule upon its meaning for them.

2. Both those who defend and those who oppose instrumental music do so upon the basis of deduction. The new covenant scriptures say nothing about the validity or invalidity of such music. One group deduces that it is justifiable, based upon a philosophy of interpretation; the other deduces that it is wrong, based upon a divergent philosophy of interpretation.

Each philosophy grows out of a presupposition. These presuppositions are formulated by collating and interpreting isolated passages. We are divided, not over what God has said on the subject, for it is admitted by all that he has not specifically spoken upon the issue, but over what we believe is his will based upon our understanding of the nature of God and the general tenor of revelation.

3. Each side, therefore, approaches the scriptures with an interpretative bias, and it is this bias for which there is no specific authority in either case, which holds us apart. It will not do to say we do not interpret the scriptures for this demonstrates ignorance rather than loyalty. Any communication of ideas from one rational mind to another must be interpreted by the recipient. This is as true of the thoughts of God conveyed by divine revelation as of our own thoughts.

Those who indulge in the absurd notion that they do not interpret the scriptures, reveal the fallacy of their words by their own actions. They preach sermons, deliver expository addresses, print journals and write books to explain their position on the scriptures. No one appears more silly than the man who engages in long harangues on the scriptures to prove that he does not interpret the scriptures.

4. We must reject as childish and immature the notion that we cannot be in the fellowship with what we quaintly call "brethren in error." This would make it impossible for God to be in fellowship with any of us. It would destroy all fellowship on earth. We are all brethren in error, although not all in the same error. God does not endorse our error in receiving us, nor do we endorse error when we receive one another. No one ever endorses that which he personally disavows.

It is true that someone is in error regarding instrumental music. Since not one of us is infallible, we may all be in error regarding some aspects of it. But such error does not mean that either of us will be damned merely because we are mistaken about some of God's requirements of His children. If it were otherwise there would be no use for heaven. There is a difference between deliberate rebellion against the Father's will and an honest error about meanings or deductions. And such deductions can never be made conditions of union or communion among saints, for such tests are themselves opposed to his divine authority.

5. The use of instrumental music does not negate our relationship as brothers. If a congregation does not use instrumental music, and some who are members leave to associate with those who do use it, they do not cease to be children of God. They are still my brethren—brethren who do not agree with my personal convictions about the status of instrumental music.

The problem of the instrument will be settled, so far as fellowship is concerned, when we truly implement and duly regard the concept of congregational autonomy. Note that I said, "as far as fellowship is concerned." The right or wrong of using instrumental music will not be settled, but the question as relates to fellowship will have been answered. If a congregation of my brethren reaches a decision to use the instrument, they must be allowed to stand or fall to their own master.

They are not subject to me. I am not a pope, a diocesan bishop, or a brotherhood regulator. I cannot impose my views upon them. I cannot crack the whip of dogmatism over them. I can tell them why I do not condone their decisions or share in their interpretation, but having said this, I have done all that I am obligated to do. I must regard them as brethren and revere them as such even though I cannot respect their decision for myself. It would be wonderful if we could find some simple solution. Someone will say that all that is required is for brethren to give up the instrument and we will be at peace. Only the very naive and provincial believe this. The fact is that the real tension would just begin. The question would still remain as to which of the many non-instrument groups they would join. You see we have more than a score of different “Churches of Christ” all of which are composed of “the loyal brethren” and which have nothing to do with one another. There are more than a dozen diverse kinds in some cities.

Moreover, if both sides maintained their past attitudes they would only divest themselves of the instrument to divide over something else. Men are divided in their hearts before they are divided openly. They must get their hearts right in order to have peace. It may be argued that those who cannot treat each other as brethren in spite of the instrument probably will not do so without it.

A PERSONAL DECLARATION

As an editor, presumptuous enough to point to the alternative of fellowship regardless of differences, I feel I am obligated to make my own position clear beyond any shadow of doubt. I have nothing to hide. I take my stand boldly and unflinchingly.

1. I repudiate all factionalism and partisan division among brethren as being contrary to the will and purpose of my Lord. I think it was a critical error to divide the family of God into warring camps over instrumental music. I reject the validity of that schism. I am no longer a member of an “anti-instrument party.” I will never become a member of a “pro-instrument party.” I am through with all partisan political alliances, once and for all, now and forever.

2. I shall retain and defend my personal convictions about instrumental music and all other controversial issues. I shall not be frightened, cajoled, bullied or bought into surrender of my principles. I am a free man in Christ and I intend to remain free. I shall respect the right of all my brethren to make up their own minds, and have their own faith, on any of our controversial issues. I will commend what I can and refuse to commend what I cannot, but I will not violate their freedom nor allow them to violate mine.

3. I will go among all of my brethren when invited, regardless of our differences, and share insights with them. I will not be directed by some earthly headquarters as to where I can and cannot go, nor will I be subject to the orders of any hierarchy in those areas where I am answerable only unto my Lord. Wherever I go I shall endeavor to be a peacemaker, not a sower of discord. I shall try to strengthen and improve all of my brethren. But I will not go anywhere as the front man for any party, nor will I go upon condition that I reject any of God’s other children. I am not for sale to any faction, sect or splinter group. I belong to Christ.

4. I will not arrogantly demand that my brethren give up what they have, or alter and amend their procedures as a condition of my coming among them. I will allow them to be answerable unto God for what they do and I shall be answerable to God for what I teach while among them.

The way to unite is to unite! The time to unite is now! We never should have become a divided movement. We dare not remain one. Unless someone ignores our artificial walls and barriers they will grow higher and thicker with each passing year. All that is necessary to prove that they are fragile and useless is for someone to go through them all as if they were not there. And to the one who does so they will not be there. They are not there for me! I regard none of them as valid. My brethren are on both sides of all of them.

I offer no propositions, make no bargains, enter into no conditional treaties. If you are in Christ Jesus we are in this together. The only side I am interested in is the spear-wounded, blood-flowing side. That blood made us one. I am resolved that, for my part, it will keep us one.

I do not have time to wait for factional leaders to beat each other into submission and to give the rest of us the all-clear signal to resume fraternization with all of our brothers and sisters. I cannot sit in the bleachers of life and wait for his Holy Spirit to overtake those who are frantically fleeing from Him under the mistaken notion that the exhibition of His fruits will be displeasing unto God and disloyal to Christ.

I am in the brotherhood, the whole brotherhood, the universal brotherhood. I am a part of the new humanity, not merely of a narrow clique within it. I have renounced the code of the clan for the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, which alone can make me free from the law of sin and death. While brethren argue and debate about how they can ever be one while some use an instrument and others do not, while they strive and clamor for advantage, I shall ignore their assaults and love them all. The pitiable and paltry problems which seem so much greater to them than the brotherhood of the cross, have been for me washed down the drain of the ages by the crimson stream that flowed from his crucified body. I am free from their blight.

It little matters to one who loves all of his brethren how any of them regard him. It is only the factionalist whose petty thinking pleads for toleration from those whom he regards as stronger, or seeks a means of persecuting those who are weaker.

It was Thomas Babington Macaulay who wrote in Sir John Macintosh's History of the Revolution (1835), "The doctrine which from the very first origin of religious dissensions has been held by bigots of all sects, when condensed into a few words and stripped of rhetorical disguise, is simply this: I am in the right and you are in the wrong. When you are the stronger you ought to tolerate me; for it is your duty to tolerate truth. But when I am the stronger I shall persecute you, for it is my duty to persecute error."

Transplanted Hearts

Mission Messenger (July 1968)

Volume 30

[Abstract]

For quite some time I have been exchanging occasional letters with a fine young man in one of our northern states. He is not satisfied with trite answers and he keeps probing for that which will adequately explain God and life. For example, here is a brief paragraph from a recent communication which I received.

I think we shall eventually have to come face-to-face with the prime question of whether God really exists, and if so, whether he is personal and individual, that is, whether he has being. If God does exist why, for instance, would he allow George Washkansky to die after the apparently successful heart transplant? Would a benevolent being who had the power to prevent such tragedy, deliberately mock the humble and dedicated surgeons who had worked so long in their laboratories eagerly seeking this one moment of success? How could a merciful being act with such indifference while so many were praying to him?

The problem of pain and human misery will continue to challenge our deepest intellectual powers. No sensitive person can ever fully evade it. And there will be varied reactions as men confront it. Some will be led to a deeper trust, others to denial and rejection.

In his book, The Plague, Albert Camus paints a graphic picture of a little boy dying in agony from the bubonic plague. By his bedside stand a priest, a doctor and a kindly agnostic. The doctor works frantically while the priest, who has difficulty even watching the struggle, places his hands before his face and prays earnestly, "God, please spare this child." But the boy dies. Later, while the three men are sitting in the shade of a tree on the hospital lawn, the priest admits that to him what happened is revolting because unexplainable, but he suggests that perhaps we should learn to love that which is not understandable. At that, the doctor turns on him in a rush of heated anger, and says, "No, Father! I have a very different idea of love and until my dying day I refuse to believe in a God who lets a child die like that!"

I make no claim of special insight which would enable me to eradicate all doubt from the earth and provide an easy solution for every question. Indeed I am also caught up in the human predicament and must struggle with many baffling problems which beset my rational powers. For that reason, I can only witness to that which has been meaningful to me, but I would be derelict in my responsibility if I refused to do this.

I do not deplore the asking of questions by men for it seems to me that the very fact we are men forces us to ask questions. Man is a questioning animal simply because he is a thinking animal. But not all questions which men ask are valid. They are not always the questions which should be asked. And I could be quite mistaken, of course, but it seems to me that my young friend may have asked a wrong question, even though it was right to ask it.

The point is that the query, "Why did God allow Mr. Washkansky to die?" may not prove a great deal regardless of how it is answered. It may not be very elemental after all. I presume that the death of Mr. Washkansky, except for the publicity attending it, was no different than the death of any other person on earth.

Insofar as its effect upon others was concerned it certainly came with much less of a shock than that from one who dies in an automobile crash. Mr. Washkansky had suffered from an aggravated heart condition for many months and this deterioration had affected other organs, including the brain. It was precisely because there was no possibility of the success of any other known therapy that the heart transplant was attempted. So it is not really a question of whether God allowed this patient to die more than any other. This reduces the problem to one which is elemental, "Why do men die?"

By the same token the diligent work done by the surgeons in the laboratories in this particular area, is a secondary issue and has no real relationship to the question posed. This does not undervalue the experimental efforts in which the hearts of many dogs had been transplanted, but we must realize that hundreds of dedicated men have devoted themselves to ardent research in other areas to find a remedy for plagues which have proven to be a scourge to mankind. In the final analysis, their findings may be of far greater importance to mankind, although not all are as spectacular.

The point is that we have no more right to expect God to interfere in the case of a heart transplant than in the case of administration of smallpox vaccine which also required a tremendous amount of dedicated research. God should not be expected to show preference for cases that make headlines in international newspapers. The fact that my friend singles out this one case as a test of God's existence may reveal how little he understands the nature of God, for God would be equally concerned with all of his creatures. In other words "not a sparrow would fall to the ground without a heavenly Father knowing it."

When we reduce the problem to the question, "Why do men die?" we have not answered it, but we have placed it upon a wholly different plane. It may then be no longer a question of God's allowing, permitting or letting individuals die. And since there is no longer the question, then the death (or the circumstances surrounding the death), of any specific individual, cannot be used as the proof of the existence or non-existence of God.

At this juncture I find myself, as usual, tempted to set forth my personal convictions as to why men must die. Yet that is actually an altogether different theme than the problem proposed in the letter, and I shall resist the urge to explore it now, and say a little bit more about heart transplantation. If my friend tends to doubt God's existence because of the failure of a heart transplant it is because of the success of one that I believe in Him.

God declared, "A new heart I will give you, and a new spirit I will put within you; and I shall take out of your flesh the heart of stone and give you a heart of flesh" (Ezekiel 36:26).

When I became conscious that I was suffering from calcification of the spiritual heart and went to the Great Physician and Surgeon, he did exactly what he promised to do. And as soon as the new heart began to function a new life really began.

This does not mean that I do not have occasional symptoms of my former life or that I do not need blood transfusions regularly, but the new heart is there. My vision has been materially helped, my mental processes cleared up, and my speech purified. I have a new interest in living such as I never knew before. It is surprising what deterioration of all the faculties can be caused by an old heart.

There is now no fright, not even fear of death. But the important thing is that one can see others in proper perspective.

He does not seek to use them but to love them. The inner thrill of joy floods the being. It is for this reason my prayer for all who read this is, “May the Lord make you increase and abound in love to one another and to all men, as we do to you, so that he may establish your hearts unblamable in holiness before our God and Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus with all of his saints.”

I think the best way to determine whether God exists or not, is not that he make a certain physical operation successful (for there might be other factors involved of which you know nothing) but by taking him at his word in unreserved obedience. He has promised to give you a new heart if you'll submit your will to him unqualifiedly. So “taste and see that the Lord is good” (Psalm 34:8). Be your own laboratory. Make your own taste test! This is a case where the proof is in the eating!

Dr. William Barclay tells the story of an alcoholic who was transformed by hearing the gospel in simple faith. When he began to talk about Jesus to his fellow workmen some of them ridiculed his belief. “Oh, come now,” they said, “you don't mean to tell us that you believe that Jesus actually turned water to wine, do you?” He replied, “I don't know anything about that, but I do know that he can turn whiskey into clothing and furniture, because he did it in my home.”

The Unsearchable Riches

I find myself more amused than aggravated with those pseudo-intellectuals who think the scriptures are outmoded and should be discarded. Because their rope is so short it will not allow their bucket to hit the water they think they have drawn the well dry. They are like a convention of termites passing a resolution condemning the Empire State Building because they cannot chew its foundations to pieces.

God is the author of two books, creation and revelation. There has not been a single atom added to the material universe since the Creator rested, but man is still laboring to discover new truths which have been there all of the time. It required divine skill to ordain a world of inexhaustible riches so that each succeeding generation would meet challenges which would motivate it to continued research. It would be a dull world if there were nothing left to explore.

As it is in the natural realm, so is it in the spiritual. Not an atom of direct revelation has been added since the sage of Patmos dropped the pen from his weary fingers. But there will be unexplored depths to beckon men on until Jesus comes. The new creation, like the old, releases its secrets gradually and as men can grasp and appreciate them.

Once in awhile someone who flatters himself that he is a chosen vessel sinks his mental shaft and concludes that he has exhausted a vein of ore, but after his puny body mingles with the mould, another comes along with a more penetrating drill and opens up a completely new lead.

For this reason it hardly behoooves us to put up a sign titled “The End” and build a fence to keep others from proceeding to additional discoveries.

It is a primary condition of a book such as the Bible that it be an inexhaustible storehouse, that no man come to the end of it and thus contain it, rather than being contained by it. Those sects which seek to bottle truth and peddle it under their private label generally end up selling thin air.

The Bible was written for all men and for every age. To appeal to all it must offer each generation new fruits which have never before been gathered. There must be a promise for all who search the scriptures, but there would be no use of searching if every truth had long since been discovered. Nothing would discourage study more than a realization that there was nothing to be achieved by it, and that the golden summit of truth had already been attained.

To discard the scriptures as God’s revelation because they have been around so long would be like deciding to abandon the earth because of its antiquity. I do not intend to abandon either the earth or the Bible while I am in the flesh. There really isn’t anywhere else to go, so I’m staying with both!

The fact is that I have not learned nearly as much about God’s Word as I want to know, and I expect to continue drinking at this wonderful spring of pure water flowing from the Throne as long as I live. And I want to share what I find in its depths.

The Question Box

Mission Messenger (August 1968)

Volume 30

[Abstract]

“Only one thing can give unity in the church on the human level: the love which allows another to be different even when it does not understand him.”— Karl Rahner.

I might have known it would happen! In the July issue of this journal I made the proposal that we remove the use of instrumental music from the category of tests of union and communion, and restore a degree of sanity to a schizophrenic restoration movement whose members have been tomahawking one another in a senseless feud for more than a hundred years.

It is now apparent that many of the brethren are more adept at making pieces of the body, than of making peace within it. They want the war to continue. They like to judge brethren and engage in the great American pastime of confessing other men’s sins. And now I am the target!

This is not an entirely new experience for me, nor is it the first time that I have been regarded as a Benedict Arnold, or a traitor. In fact, I never recall having given up any narrow factional attitude without being so accused, and since I have given up quite a few of them, it is beginning to sound like a cracked record.

I am going to share with you some of the questions and my reactions to them, although I do so a little reluctantly. This necessitates a change of plan with reference to the series of articles for this year, but in this fast-moving age an editor ought not to be harnessed to one field when another, which is more fertile, deserves cultivation.

My chief concern is for our many readers who are not even a part of our restoration movement and heritage. Perhaps they will regard us with a more charitable eye than we have sometimes turned upon one another.

It is important, I think, that you know exactly what I am suggesting, and just as important that you understand what I am not suggesting. Let me deal with the latter first on the principle that “the first shall be last, and the last shall be first.”

I am not proposing that any person change his mind or alter his views about the right or wrong of instrumental music in the congregational praise service dedicated to God.

I am not suggesting that anyone must amend his interpretation of any scriptural passage which he thinks is related to this issue. I am not recommending a cessation of discussion about the status of instrumental music. I believe that continued discussion will be wholesome and helpful.

I am not proposing that any congregation adopt instrumental music. I am not suggesting that any congregation change sides, or swap horses. Instead, I recommend that, at least for the present, where conditions are not wholly intolerable, that we stay where we are and allow the Holy Spirit to work in our lives. Any wholesale milling around will only confuse the scene and upset a lot of unstable souls, of which all our factions have more than a fair share.

Then what do I propose? It is very simple. I suggest a recapture of that spirit of brotherly love which transcends divergent views about the instrument, and which will impel us to associate with each other as children of the same Father.

I urge only that we change our categorization of the problem. Every faction, without exception, has two boxes filled with traditional issues. One bears the label, "Differences Which Do Not Divide;" the other, "Differences Which Divide." These boxes are our own. God did not create them. He filled neither of them. I propose that we transfer instrumental music from the last-named to the first. That's where it was originally. We did not divide for many years after the instrument was introduced. It was only after we irritated, agitated, aggravated, and rubbed each other raw, that we took the issue from the hope chest and threw it in the war chest.

The transfer will make it no less a difference. It will be as big one place as another. But it will create a tremendous difference in our attitudes. It will free us from a species of intolerance which has plagued us for many decades. It will create a sharing situation which will release the pent-up energy of the Spirit and actually sweep some mission fields for Christ. It will eradicate the inner trauma which some brethren feel in the presence of others and make for free and genuine recognition of that fellowship which we have in Christ.

Why do I make this proposal just now? I do so for a lot of reasons which I do not have either the time or inclination to discuss. I am sick and tired of our wrangling around over issues which are glorified and magnified out of all proportion to their value by our fanatical and inordinate attention. With a world threatened by holocaust of such magnitude as to cause strong men to tremble at the thought, we can no longer indulge in the folly of partisan squabbles such as entertained our fathers in the halcyon days of sectarian bitterness.

I want to get to the gut-issues of our generation and see if Christianity has the potential to face them down and bring them to heel. I want to be where the action is! I want to be in on the happening! The most important thing in this frightened universe does not seem to me to be whether some of my brethren want to blow, beat, saw or pound upon something while the others are singing.

Obviously the suggestion had to come from someone who is conscientiously opposed to the use of the instrument in the public praise service. And since no one else seemed anxious to push toward the front and offer the suggestion I decided to stand up in our little journal and make the proposition.

There was nothing brave about it because bravery is courage in the face of fear. I just do not have any fear. Perfect love cast it all out. When I faced up to Jesus and surrendered to him unreservedly, he came in, flooded my soul with light, poured out love in my heart, and gave me a peace that even I do not understand.

Perhaps we had better get on with the reactions to my little proposal. I've sorted some of them out so you'll be able to get the gist of the questions and my replies. In a case or two, I've combined them from several sources. It really is not important that you know who asked what, nor is it particularly important that I do the answering. What is important is that we all strive for truth. I am still optimistic that truth will separate itself from error and rise to the top like cream on the milk, in spite of the observation of Mark Twain that: "The man who is a pessimist before forty-eight knows too much; the man who is an optimist after forty-eight knows too little."

DEBATING THE QUESTION

1. You were quite a debater on this subject, affirming the use of instrumental music was a sin. Do you still regard it as a sin? Would you still debate it?

True, I was once a rather forward partisan champion, defending the tenets and tests of the faction with which I was allied. It would be a sin for me to introduce or engage in the playing of an instrument in the public praise of the saints. Whether God will regard it as such upon the part of those of his children who have no scruples against it, I shall not presume to judge, in the absence of any specific directive from him on the matter.

I have renounced all public partisan debate with any of my brethren as having any real hope of promoting understanding or eliminating strife. I think, as generally carried out in our day, debate is a divisive tool which serves only to intensify the party spirit. I have debated the questions of instrumental music, support of orphan homes, theological schools, the clergy system, classes, cups, the status of elders, and a host of other things, but I will not again publicly debate any of my brethren.

This was not an easy decision for me. I rather liked debating. I grew up to regard my brethren in other factions as rivals and enemies and I was glad to lead the tribe in war against them, under the guise that we were opposing Satan. It was a thrill to jump on my theological steed, ride hard and “head them off at the pass.” Since I’ve been able to distinguish between the devil and my brethren, I would prefer to concentrate my efforts against him and love them.

Can I say a word about G. C. Brewer, in tribute to his memory? After our first skirmish he suggested that we make a sort of “Lincoln-Douglas” tour of all of the college campuses, and we held our second debate at Freed-Hardeman College. It was a good one. He was very gentlemanly. But we had no further debates. I suspect both of us thought we were “Lincoln.”

One reason I will not debate with my brethren is that I no longer represent any party, group or school of thought. I’m not a front man for any faction nor the champion of any clique. I represent only Jesus and he is not debatable among brethren. I do not want anyone else to represent my views. I do not want to represent the views of anyone else. I shall allow no other man to do my thinking. I will not impose my own thinking on any other man.

2. Would you make the same arguments against the instrument now as you did in the past?

I would certainly not make some of them, because they would sound as silly now as they must have then. In looking back over my more ancient debate notes in my file marked “Digressives,” I find, for example, that once I belabored those “that chant to the sound of the viol, and invent to themselves instruments of music, like David” (Amos 6:5). At the time I did not know enough to realize that the context when so applied, would equally condemn eating Grade-A veal chops, stretching out on a couch, or using pine-scented after shave lotion.

The truth is that both sides in the controversy ought to examine anew their debate notes and sermon outlines and set fire to most of them and start over. The years have produced a lot of chaff and little real wheat in either partisan granary. And this has made for a lot of sawdust and cornflake sermons. No wonder Spurgeon said, “Some ministers would make good martyrs: they are so dry they would burn well.”

CONGREGATIONAL SINGING

3. You assert positively that no one can establish congregational singing in the public worship, by the scriptures, but does not Ephesians 5:19 do so, when it says, “Speaking to yourselves in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs”?

No. It lacks the very element you need to make it say what you want it to say. The sentence begins with, “And be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess; but be filled with the Spirit; speaking to yourselves in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, etc.” This is not an apostolic command regulating public praise. It simply tells Christians how to behave when they are not drunk.

Ephesus was the site of the temple of Diana which was the scene of Bacchanalian revelry. This included drinking, lewd songs and filthy talk. It also included such sexual excesses it was a shame to speak of them (See verses 11, 12). In contrast with such daily conduct, the grace-sharers were to be filled with the Holy Spirit instead of unholy fermented spirits, and they were to exhibit it in the kind of songs which they sang to each other.

Careful examination will show that the whole context is set in a framework of daily living, consisting of the circumspect walk, and the proper use of time, because the days were evil. It is a context of the submission of wives, love of husbands, obedience of children, respect for slaves and masters. Our problem is that we postulated congregational singing as God’s pattern and looked for scriptures to justify our presupposition. The ones we discovered had to be twisted to fit the shape we wanted. It is likely that we are more indebted to Moody and Sankey than we are to Paul and Peter for our pattern.

Please understand that I do not condemn congregational singing. On the contrary, I think it is a good thing. I suspect that God likes for his children to get together and sing, just as Nell and I like for our family to do so. I am not sure that the Father gets too much of a thrill out of it when we think we are forced to do it to keep him from being mad at us. The “sing or be damned” attitude may affect him as it would me if the parents of our grandchildren would say, “You straighten up and sing now or we’ll whip the daylights out of you.” My Book says, “Is any one merry? Let him sing psalms.” It’s a little hard to be bubbling over with joy when the threat of hell is hanging over your head if you are not!

4. If Colossians 3:16 does not prove congregational singing, please tell me what it does prove?

I am not sure it was written to prove anything in the sense in which you use the word “prove.” We do not want to fall into the trap which has grabbed some scientists, described by Samuel Butler thus, “The tendency of modern science is to reduce proof to absurdity by continually reducing absurdity to proof.” Generally when we turn a text into a prooftext we have already decided what we want it to prove. By a little effort with our mental hammer and intellectual crowbar we can make it fit almost as well as if it had been made for the place.

Of course, some texts require a little more battering than others, but almost any text can be made to do in a pinch. It helps some if you have gone to school and taken courses in how to warp the scriptures and force them into place. This is one of the advantages of a theological education. The average unskilled bumbler may be inclined to leave a passage in the setting where God placed it, never even realizing that he can lift it out and beat the stuffing out of it and fit it in somewhere else.

The passage reads, “Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom; teaching and admonishing one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord.”

We could not possibly fulfill this requirement the way we sing, because we are all singing at once. If you are going to teach another, he ought to listen to you. Moreover, teaching is conveying information or instruction. You cannot teach another if he already knows as much about the subject as you do. In our singing, if you don’t know the song you cannot teach another, but if you do know it another cannot teach you. Either way you take it, someone is violating the command.

What would you say if all of the members in an assembly sought to teach one another a lesson by all standing up and shouting the same thing at the same time? Do you think that putting a tune to the words would make a difference? Where we attend, sometimes the bass singers are saying one thing, and the soprano singers another at the same time. I can understand how you might teach if “whenever you meet let everyone be ready to contribute a psalm, a piece of teaching, a spiritual truth, or a ‘tongue’ with an interpreter,” as Paul instructed Corinth.

But I think we ought to quit trying to fool the public into thinking that we teach and admonish one another, when we put a man up front to wave his arms while we all stand and belt out the words. We all enjoy it I suppose, and I don’t want to see it stopped, but we need to quit trying to find scriptural justification for it. There isn’t any. If Paul walked in and heard us in high gear and in four-part harmony it would probably shake him. It wouldn’t shake him nearly as much as it would if we told him we were doing it because it was what he commanded. He might not get over that shock!

If you really want to teach in song, I suggest that next Lord’s Day, just before you have the Supper, you have some brother with a good voice “contribute a psalm” while you sit reverently and allow the words to seep into the very fiber of your inner being. But to answer your question. Colossians 3:16 is set in a framework of everyday living. It does not prove congregational singing the way we do it. Nothing does. I do not think anything really has to do so! I believe that we may be hung up on the idea that God intended to provide us with a meticulous blueprint, a sort of “pray by pray account” of everything we are to do when we gather, thus leaving no room for spontaneous expression and spiritual freshness. But I am not so sure that the new covenant scriptures were meant to be a printed program handed out by the apostles. I respect these scriptures but I do not think it is an act of reverence to press them into a role which God may not have intended for them to occupy.

I do not think congregational singing is to be condemned or abandoned just because there is no clear precedent for it. On the contrary, it is a very unifying group exercise and no doubt it is pleasing to the Father. If we were to get rid of all for which we did not have a clear precedent we'd not have a lot left.

5. Will not your proposition encourage congregations to adopt instrumental music?

Why should it? The status of instrumental music will not be altered. All I propose is that we regard and treat our brethren who use it as brethren. Is there anything about showing brotherly love that would make brethren adopt instrumental music? Must we keep God's family divided and rent, and treat some of his children with cold disdain, in order to keep some congregations from using instrumental music?

It is obvious that no congregation will adopt it whose members oppose it, and those congregations whose members see no violation of scripture in its use, and who want it, will probably have it regardless of what I say. My contention is simply that instrumental music has no relationship to our fellowship in Christ Jesus, and it should not keep us from recognition of that fellowship. I am not trying to regulate and control the procedure of any congregation.

6. If this compromising crackpot idea you have dreamed up is right, why are there not more brethren who are pushing it? Are you the only one who is right?

I really think that a goodly number of informed brethren have been uneasy about our factional position for a long time. Many of them realize that it was a mistake to make an honest opinion about instrumental music a test of fellowship. Some are not as free as I am, and not as vocal about it, but I think they will be glad that someone has brought the suggestion into the open at last.

However, I never test sentiment in advance, or determine the way the wind blows, before I state my convictions. I am not concerned with lining up with a majority. I am only concerned with being right. I think it is sinful to perpetuate a division which ought never to have happened in the first place. I am resigned to standing alone if need be. I am not worried about the ultimate.

My study of history convinces me that every constructive idea was branded as a crackpot idea when first enunciated, but after it has been duly considered it is adopted and all are better for it. No traditionalist ever improved upon the status quo. That must be done by nonconformists. Sometimes they are rather lonely at first. However, many more brethren share my present convictions than some of you have even dreamed. We will be able to work together some day!

7. Where will this thing stop if your views are accepted?

Hopefully, it will continue to leaven every faction until all of us may exhibit our oneness in Christ Jesus. Perhaps some brother who has led in the fight to make the support of Herald of Truth and orphan homes a test of fellowship will recommend that the issue be completely removed from this category and that local congregations which have divided over this issue start working together across the barrier.

I should like to see Baxter Loe, for example, make an editorial recommendation in Gospel Tidings that we close the breach in fellowship on the "Sunday School issue" with a genuine implementation of local autonomy on the congregational level. I should like to see Ervin Waters do the same in Outreach with reference to the question of individual cups. Both of these men are good writers and good thinkers. They might be able to help brethren see how foolish and immature we act when we maintain our senseless partisan bitterness.

I suspect that many brethren in every faction are deterred by fear of being branded as “liberals,” but if Jesus could endure being called “gluttonous and a winebibber” by those whom he sought to help, we ought not to worry too much. “The servant is not greater than his Lord.” I have to confess that it does not bother me one bit what men may do unto me. So I pray that we shall not stop until we build bridges across all of our divisions and can cross freely back and forth without fear of reprisal.

THE POSSIBLE EFFECT

8. Here in Texas it seems to me that many brethren in Abilene and Austin have been influenced by your writings, although they would probably deny it. Will your suggestion about music widen the gap between them and you again, after it seemed to be closing?

I do not really think so. There are some very perceptive and outstanding brethren in Texas, and I love them a great deal for their work’s sake, although some of them have been quite bitter about my emphasis on fellowship. I have been made the object of attack upon several occasions where I could not hope to gain permission to reply, but I understand the motivation for this and it does not disturb me a great deal.

Letters coming to me indicate that many of the brethren are seeing the question of fellowship in a wholly new light, and it is true that my writings have recently been looked upon with much more charity in some areas. Some of the brethren in the places mentioned are in agreement with my position that we should not make a test of fellowship out of an honest opinion about instrumental music, although they are quite opposed to its use in the corporate worship.

I pray that what I have written will not “widen the gap” for all of us need to find common ground upon which to stand regardless of the state in which we live. But whatever happens to me personally I must be honest with God and myself for I would not want to create a chasm between myself and God in order to lessen one between my self and brethren in Texas. Heaven must take precedence over Texas!

9. Why don't you go on and join the Christian Church and let us alone?

I know the brother who asked this question. He has been involved in three divisions and is now meeting with a small group of unhappy souls whose outlook is very negative and pessimistic. The strange thing is that these good brethren do not count me as one of them, but I "bug" them simply because I love them and continue to write to them and offer to help them serve our Lord.

I am sure that most of us are made uncomfortable by those who force us to examine anew our traditional thinking. And it isn't very pleasant, when we have all of our positions, arguments, and deductions, packed down nicely in our box of playthings, to have someone come along and kick the box over. We would like to rid ourselves of such a person.

But I am not going to "go on and join" anything. I belong to my Lord and that is enough for me. I hold that there is only one church on earth and that it contains all of the saved. I am one of them. I am not the least bit interested in the old religious "shell game" of switching parties. I am afraid our good brother is stuck with me. I refuse to leave and I will not be frightened or driven off. If my brethren cannot stand to remain with one who loves them all, they will have to pack their debate books and "go over the hill." I like it here and I am staying for the duration.

10. Suppose we agreed to remove instrumental music from being a test of fellowship, where do you think the greatest impact would first be felt?

On the foreign mission field. We have confused many simple native peoples by transporting our American feuds to their lands, for which they are not temperamentally, historically or traditionally prepared. You have to grow up in the very midst of our mixed-up mess for it to make any sense to you at all.

In some distant lands, two “Churches of Christ” have been planted, neither of which uses instrumental music. But, because one group is supported by those in the United States who use it, the other group would have nothing to do with them in a Jungle on the other side of the globe. This kind of childish procedure on the part of grown men would be as laughable as it is ridiculous, if it were not for the fact that it helps to fragment a world already bursting at its ideological seams.

I suggest that we free our missionaries in all factions from party domination and let them work freely with every Christian brother in their section of the world. Let them exchange speaking appointments, hold conferences and lectureships together, share in youth camps, and produce jointly-published reading material and literature in native tongues. In short, let them manifest the unity we have in Christ Jesus in spite of differences.

Let’s have an end to our stupid and infantile attitude, which will eventually make us the laughingstock of the intelligent people all over the earth. We have instrumental, non-instrumental, pre-millennial, post-millennial, one-cup, multiple cups, institutional, anti-institutional, Sunday School, and anti-Sunday School parties (to name a few) in such places as Africa, Japan and South America. In some locations we have taken those who always lived in unity as pagans and separated them into warring tribes as Christians. But our inconsistencies will catch up with us. Our partisan chickens will come home to roost!

If a man does not have good judgment he should not be sent to the mission field, and if he does have he should be allowed the freedom to use it. Let’s stop making puppets out of these self-sacrificing brethren, and cut the sectarian apron strings. It is time to quit regulating their endeavors by our mechanical remote control devices. Instead of calling men home because they work and fraternize with other Christians, we should call them home if they will not do so. The mission field is no place to practice sectarian littleness and exclusiveness. We have shivered God's family to bits in the United States and that should suffice without peddling our factional wares abroad.

CONCLUSION

It was difficult for me to gain consent of my mind to devote this issue of the paper to the above material. I am chafing at the bits to get on with the real task at hand in a world aflame. Still, I am conscious of the fact that we are coming out of a divisive state which has troubled us for more than a century, so we will extricate ourselves slowly and with some hardship. I am not so mystical as to think that God will send the Spirit in the form of a dove to snatch us out of our state in one swoop. I am not so pessimistic as to believe that we will never overcome our factional barriers. We will overcome but it will be by disciplined thinking. Brethren who pioneer for real unity must be content to suffer under unjust accusation and to have their motives impugned. But someone has to break ground if we are to build more solidly for the future.

With a deep conviction that our divisions are all displeasing to God, and that a brother is worth much more to me than my own opinions and views, I am committed unreservedly to the task of pleading for unity among all segments of the brotherhood until my pen drops from my hand in death. I shall seek to remember always the adage of Louis Brandeis, the eminent jurist, "Behind every argument is someone's ignorance."

Moral Philosophy

Mission Messenger (August 1968)

Volume 30

[Abstract]

One of the most articulate graduate students among those whom I know is a regular reader of MISSION MESSENGER. I think he sometimes feels that I belong to a bygone age, and yet he envies my simple faith. Recently he wrote me thus about his own.

I came to the university with my faith intact, clothed in it as an armor. But it was shot full of holes and now hangs in shreds. Christianity no longer appears unique to me. My study of philosophy has convinced me that every moral or ethical precept enunciated by Jesus was borrowed from a prior source, and was not a divine declaration as I have always been taught to believe. You will probably say I should not have studied philosophy, yet it seems to me that an honest man should not subject himself to a mental straitjacket in order to find security at the cost of truth.

There is a grave possibility that our young brother, brilliant as he undoubtedly is, may have begun his university work on a borrowed faith. It is very easy for us to grow up in a religious atmosphere in which we simply accept what is being taught or said without engaging in the agonizing struggle to reach a personal meaningful conviction. Thus we may confuse our father's overcoat with armor. And, like an overcoat, what we call faith may be merely an external form or pattern of thought into which we slipped quite easily.

The shooting full of holes of such a cloak represents no real attack upon the faith once delivered. It need not cripple the wearer for life if he sees it in proper perspective. One can recover from a hole in his cloak, but he will need to change garments.

Certainly I do not argue that one should not study philosophy, even though Frederick the Great did say, "If I wished to punish a province, I would have it governed by philosophers." Philosophy is actually the history of the thought processes of men through the ages. When I read after Plato, Aristotle, or Marcus Aurelius, I am able to understand the forces which helped to shape human destiny in every avenue of life. The problem with our brother is not that he understands too much about philosophy, but he understands too little about the nature of Christianity.

First of all, the Way was never intended to be a compendium of epigrams, a collation of ethical proverbs, or a code of laws and rules. Obviously our Lord did not intend to load us up with a collection of new or original moral precepts. One does not become a moral being merely by observing statutes, but he observes the rules because he is a moral being.

A moral law is not right simply because God commands it, but God commands it because it was right. That is why no moral law can ever become a test of one's faith in God. Moral obligations are inherent in the nature of man as a social and rational being, and while laws may define and clarify them they can never create them.

Actually, it is a little silly to talk about "a new morality." There is no such thing and there cannot be. Morality is not a creation of lawmakers nor a product of creed-makers. External laws may be modified, amended, or even abrogated in the interest of morality, but the moral obligation existed before such regulations and will still inhere regardless of what may happen to the rules.

Men existed as moral beings a long time before Jesus entered the earth through the flesh curtain, and since there were brilliant thinkers who knew how to define human relationships and to record their observations, we should not be surprised to find a wealth of wisdom literature in the philosophic works of many ancient peoples. There were ethics before there were Christian ethics. And whatever was true would certainly be acknowledged by One who was the very embodiment of Truth.

As a philosophic student our brother should recognize that he has joined a rather inglorious company of skeptics, some of whom have become discredited long since. Celsus, who lived in the second century, wrote about the admonition of Jesus to forgive our enemies, and declared that he had found the same injunction in the writings of Plato, and more eloquently stated by the Greek philosopher. But Celsus hated Christianity with a prejudice so deep it became a passion.

Many philosophers have not been too accurate in their citations either. A good example is Edward Gibbon who referred to what is called “the golden rule” and then remarked, “A rule which I read in a moral treatise of Isocrates, four hundred years before the publication of the Gospel.” The historian was presuming upon the ignorance of his readers, because Isocrates gave a negative precept which was a far cry from the positive action required by our Lord.

Our brother was carried away in his desire to justify himself and impress me. His statement that “every moral or ethical precept enunciated by Jesus was borrowed from a prior source,” is not according to fact. A good example is the teaching related to love— agape— that active and benevolent good will which stops at nothing to accomplish the good of its object. So superior was this teaching that the word can hardly be found in the Greek classics.

The reason is quite clear. It required the cross to demonstrate its depth and give it meaning. Jesus could truthfully say, "A new commandment I give unto you, that you love one another, as I have loved you." The natural concept until this time was that love responded to that which was lovable in the object, that is, that the lovable quality created the love. But agape is exactly the opposite. It is the ability to love the unlovable. It is the love that creates the worth in the object, and not the worth in the object that creates the love.

This is a height of moral value to which human philosophy had never attained, nor could it do so, for it grew out of divine philanthropy and not out of the social relationship as rational beings. And it is the love ethic which gives the lie to Voltaire's thesis that Christianity drew its light from the Far East, and to some of our more recent theorists who speculate that Jesus was educated and initiated in the lore of the Essenes.

I have no hesitancy in acknowledging the truth of any statement that is true, regardless of who discovered the truth or issued the statement. If a pagan discovered the truth about a matter of moral consequence before our Lord came to earth I would expect the latter to affirm it rather than to deny it. I happen to hold that since all nations had a common ancestry, and since our primeval fathers walked and talked with God originally we should not be at all surprised that many who were shut off from later direct oracles should rise above the corruption of their times.

The uniqueness of Christianity does not lie in the code of morals which it predicates, superior though they may be in their statement. If we regard God's supreme revelation of Himself in Jesus as merely a declaration of ethical truths there may not be anything to challenge our lives. But when we see it as the manifestation of eternal life, that life which was with the Father from the beginning, we can at once recognize that Christianity is not merely a way of life, but the life of the Way! “He that hath the Son hath life.”

Heathen philosophers could discover moral truths and frame them into precepts, but they could not find power to implement them in their own lives. Christianity is not an ethical code trying to make us good from without, but an inner transformation, a transfiguration, which purifies from within. It is the residence of Deity, through the Holy Spirit in our fleshly frames by which we crucify the deeds of the body.

I do not recommend that our brother stop his study of philosophy, but I do suggest most humbly that He begin a genuine acquaintance with Jesus through the indwelling Spirit. He will never really be happy until he does. When the Spirit comes in He can straighten out a philosopher. My God can do anything but fail!

More Questions

Mission Messenger (September 1968)

Volume 30

[Abstract]

For the third straight month I must apologize to our readers for dealing with a subject which probably proves boring to many of them. In the midst of world ferment they wish that I would get on with the real task. I wish I could too, but I am committed to the program of promoting peace among those of us who are a part of the noble experiment launched in 1809 as “a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects.”

In July I made the proposal that we remove the question of the use of instrumental music from the category of a test of fellowship, and receive as brethren those children of God on either side of this long-standing issue which has been so controversial. I came under attack immediately in some circles as a liberal and traitor, a thing not wholly unexpected. In the August issue I answered some of the questions raised in letters. I cannot drop the matter at this juncture, so I plead for your patience and understanding.

By far the greater number of letters received contain words of commendation and encouragement, but I am not asking for popular acclaim. I simply want truth and I shall remain free to express what I believe is true, unmoved by criticism on the one hand, or by flattery on the other. I trust I shall not be forced to continue dealing with this matter interminably but I do want to face it without fear or flinching.

Herewith we present additional questions, in the meantime urging that you read the July and August issues which are preliminary.

1. How can we overcome the problem of division on a local level? The non-instrument preacher and I are on very friendly terms as individuals, but when I attend a meeting at his place, he seems like a different person, very cool and almost abrupt.

Of course, he is a different person. Most of us are far better than our narrow unwritten creeds. When you meet privately you are just brethren, both human and frail, both needing each other. But in a public meeting the preacher is the defender of orthodoxy, the partisan front-man, and involved in this are many things—the factional image, salary, sectarian prestige and pride. The legalistic attitude always makes for dishonesty on the part of any of us. We become Pharisaical, haughty and supercilious.

I suggest that you pray very eagerly for the Holy Spirit to open up real doors of contact. Invite the preacher and his wife to visit in your home, and you and your wife call upon his family. Make your love for them real! Attend the meetings conducted by these brethren, and always be loving and lovable. Do not be disturbed if you are not given recognition, or if you are not called “brother.” This is not the important thing. We must establish and maintain association regardless of difficulty. We must hold the door open. If we do the Holy Spirit will lessen the chasm.

2. In our little town there is a Christian Church and a Church of Christ. Most of the members know one another and several are relatives. However, because of the division and bitterness created during special meetings conducted by outside evangelists brought in by both sides, we have had little contact with one another. How would you approach this problem?

In a small town people often have very deep feelings about local issues. I think you should not try to exchange speaking engagements on Lord's Day, but I suggest that you begin with joint Bible studies on Wednesday nights. Choose a book such as the epistle of James, and alternate in the use of your meetinghouses. Forget about singing since this creates a problem. God has no law that we must sing a half hour before we start studying the Bible. When you meet, get down upon your knees and let one brother from each place lead in prayer to God, and then begin your mutual sharing of thought in the lesson.

When you meet at the Christian Church building let one of the elders of the non-instrument congregation lead the study; when you meet at the Church of Christ building let one of the elders of the instrument congregation do the teaching. It will be better for the preachers to stay in the background as much as possible, contributing to the discussion from their seats. Surely no one can object to people gathering to study the word of God. And it follows that both sides need to be careful about importing preachers "who sow discord among brethren." The work of promoting peace is not accomplished by rabble-rousers.

3. What can a group of concerned students in a non-instrument oriented Christian college do to further unity as you see it?

They can do a great deal. We have some of the most brilliant, perceptive young men and women in our day that have ever graced the restoration movement. They are tired of our sectarian bigotry, sham and pretence. They are sick of the stereotyping, pigeon-holing, categorizing tactics which have been our disgrace.

I suggest to the concerned ones that they first meet as a cell group to wrestle with God in prayer about their role in our day. In the seclusion of a living-room or dormitory wing they can implore God upon their knees to help them make their lives meaningful and rich with service. They must revolt against our dishonesty and camouflage, and do so in at least two ways.

They must challenge the deductions and conclusions which are unwarranted by the scriptures, and which have grown out of the text-scraping tactics we have employed as the glib “easy-answer people” of the religious world. In class, they must do this respectfully, but firmly, as becometh brethren who are free in the Lord. And they must be prepared to suffer the consequences accruing to anyone of staunch conviction who challenges or bucks the Establishment.

They must not switch parties or change factions, but work from the base in which they have grown up. All reformation must be achieved from within, never from without. And they must stay within the restoration frame of reference for if they flake off or flack out they will cease to be of any real help. But they must work out from this base or else it will be a prison.

I suggest to every concerned student in a Christian college that he continue to attend services on the Lord’s Day morning where he has been accustomed to break bread with the saints, and to love all of these brethren dearly. But on Sunday night, and at other times, I urge brethren who are rising above their previous factional littleness to break out of the shell. Let them visit every congregation in the area— instrumental, premillennial, anti-institutional, one-cup, anticlass— all of them! Especially visit the little ones, not neglecting store-front types, or any other.

Make contact with the young people in all of these, and when possible set up informal discussion groups with them. This will not be easy, but nothing that is worthwhile ever is. You will be branded as radicals, which may not be too bad, seeing that the word means to get to the root of things. No faction wants to be jarred. Many brethren think that “the whole law is summed up in one word, even in this, thou shalt not rock the boat!”

But we need a revolution of thought, attitude and approach. Most of us think of daring and courage as exhibited only by missionaries who go to snake-infested jungles, but we need to live just as daringly in the adventure for unity. It is as important that one be ready to risk his standing for the cause for which Jesus prayed, as for the cause which he commissioned.

I am quite thoroughly convinced that tomorrow will be better than today for the very reason that energetic, eager, Spirit-filled young men and women are not satisfied with our divisive status quo. They have the desire, the ability, and the know-how to change it. And they will do so. Those in every party who educated their children to think for themselves sounded the death knell of our factionalism. Those who “see visions and dream dreams” of unity and fellowship are our greatest hope and our best asset.

The plea for oneness of all who believe in Christ through the apostolic testimony is our thing. Where men cut across factional lines and artificial barriers is where the action is. The happening in our age is where there is proclamation of renewal through recovery of the apostolic purpose and power. This is it, man! And, it is for real! Tune in, crank up, and get going on the most challenging cause that heaven has ever flung into our laps.

4. It seems to me that you have sold out, and that you’ve adopted the policy that if you can’t lick ‘em you’ll join ‘em. What do you say?

I say you are dead wrong, my brother, and wrong on all counts. I am not for sale to any party, faction, fragment, or segment. I have not joined anyone but our precious Lord. And he joined me to all of God’s other children as my brothers. We should never have been fighting brethren in the first place. What business is it of any person to “lick” some of God’s other children? The devil never did a more clever selling job than when he convinced us we should take the sword of the Spirit and hack the body of God's Son into bloody chunks over instrumental music or any other of our "issues." God's house is not a butcher shop. His children are not cannibals.

What would you think of a father who commissioned some of his children to take a switchblade knife and cut and stab his other children? I do not believe that God is guilty of that kind of insanity. The problem with you is that you have Christianity confused with tribal warfare. You and I grew up in different factions and you never did recognize me as your brother. It is not only since I am pleading for unity of all believers in Christ that you think I am in error. You thought that when our factions were clawing each other to pieces "in the name of Jesus Christ."

If I had left my faction and joined yours, and urged all others to do the same, you would have hailed me as the greatest hero of the restoration movement in our generation. But since the Holy Spirit really came into my heart I can see how miserably both of us were missing the mark. Now, with a deep concern for your wellbeing, I can love you sincerely and pray for you fervently.

I am no longer a factional leader and I shall never again allow any clique to dictate to me whom I shall love and whom I shall not love. I know now that I am joined to all of God's children by the blood tie. If you will open up your heart and let the Spirit in you will be happy also.

5. Suppose half of the members of a congregation want to put in an instrument, and the other half oppose it. What should they do?

Quite obviously none of us should ever push what we want in the realm of deduction, upon brethren who deplore it. I do not think many places will be faced with this problem in our generation, although an occasional ambitious preacher possessed of more lust for power than common sense, may create such a situation. Practically all divisions are caused by preachers and always have been. Brethren who have always sung praises without an instrument are not likely to get so filled with rancor and hate that they will thrust something in which will fragment the body, unless they are fired up by an emotional or intemperate zealot. All of our brethren, with few exceptions, want peace in our time.

However, if a group of brethren are so deeply concerned that they divide, they should not do so in hate, for regardless of the status of the instrument, he that hateth his brother is a murderer. In spite of my views on the instrument, I would rather meet with a group which had a piano and dearly loved all of the brethren, than to meet with a group that did not have an instrument and sincerely hated most of the brethren. One doesn't know whether he really loves his brethren or not until he is tested.

We do not all need to meet under the same roof but we do need to be members of the same family. If we simply cannot do things alike, let us not undo the work of the Spirit in our lives. I think that we have come to the time when the instrument does not mean more to the brethren than the family relationship, and I doubt that any sober or serious thinker will sever the body over his preference for it. To form an "organ party" in a congregation opposed to it would be a sin, and so would the reverse position.

6. If those of us who have the instrument silence it out of deference when brethren come to share a service with us, shouldn't they put in a piano out of respect for our views when we worship with them?

No. This is what I call an elephant fallacy, big enough that anyone ought to see it. I think I am the proper person to answer this because I never ask my brethren to change their procedures out of deference to my position. I do not agree to come and teach on a contingent basis. I just go and let them all stand or fall to their own master. I do not play God or try to dictate to them.

Brethren who have the attitude expressed in this question ought not to silence the instrument because their motivation in doing so is not right. They want to use their action as a kind of partisan horse-swapping technique, and it is not done as a real expression of brotherly love.

If eating meat is offensive to my brother I will forego serving it when he comes to my house, but I will not expect or require him to serve that which is offensive to him when I go to his house. If a brother is grieved with my meat I do not walk charitably when I force it upon him. I shall not destroy with my meat one for whom Christ died, and I refuse to let my good be evil spoken of when I can avoid it. "If eating meat offends my brother, I will eat no more meat while the world stands."

I am probably wrong, as I often am, but it seems to me when we see-saw back and forth to gain some kind of partisan advantage we are acting childish and immature. Please forgive me if I say that I want to be free from this whole sectarian attitude on both sides. I am tired of playing tag while the world burns down around our ears. Those who prefer such games will please leave me out when they choose up sides.

7. I have been ministering in this congregation where the instrument is not used for three years, and I am convinced that your position is the only sane one I have heard expressed. I have a good relationship with the minister of the Christian Church and we talk over our problems privately. I would like to call upon him to pray or speak when he comes to our services, but if I did I would divide the congregation. I feel like I am leading a double life since my inner thinking is so far removed from the congregational practice. What shall I do?

It will help you to realize that you are not alone. Literally scores of noninstrument brethren caught up in the web of legalistic exclusiveness, write me every year about “the practice gap” into which they are forced. I am sure that you feel much closer to the Spirit-filled brother who does not see any harm in using the instrument than you do to many of those who help pay your salary. The indwelling Spirit always brings us closer to others in whom he dwells. This divine tension on the heart is a tremendous magnetic force.

Never having met you, I cannot advise you what to do. I can suggest some of my personal feelings about an approach to the situation. You should explain fairly and honestly your predicament to our Christian Church brother. If he truly loves the Lord, he will understand the need of proceeding so as not to augment strife and division. All of us are inhibited by circumstances. Jesus had many things he wanted to say to the apostles but they were not able to bear them.

Do not leave the congregation, but begin a careful and painstaking process of education to enable them to properly adjust their sense of values. Use your messages to point out that all division in God’s family is a sin, and that we are called upon to be peacemakers. Urge the brethren to pray about the matter of strife and to have open minds on all issues, and to remember that with God no issue is ever settled as long as we are divided.

I am thoroughly convinced that if we can influence our brethren to “think unity” instead of thinking division, the Churches of Christ are in a strategic position right now to help lead a genuine attempt to unite the Christians in all of the sects. In an intellectual age they possess the scholastic ability, world vision, dynamism, and financial means to move into the whole evangelical realm, and with faith, hope and love, lead all of God’s reconciled ones to a deeper sense of commitment to the unity of the Spirit.

There are many obstacles to this and they may prove insuperable, although they need not do so. We have created an image of sectarian bigotry unrivalled by any other group except the Roman Catholic communion. We have maintained an attitude that is arrogant, stand-offish and Pharisaical. This has produced a trauma of fear and insecurity which causes us to lash out at other children of the Father. Often times, as little tin-gods we have assumed a stance of infallibility in interpretation and this has caused us to become dogmatic and authoritarian. This may appear to have produced a hopeless situation. I do not think so!

Our greatest hope lies in that fact that we are everywhere awakening to the indwelling power of the eternal Spirit. If we try to use Him to further our traditional factional concerns we will be smitten down of God in our boastful partisan pride. But if we allow him to use us as a peacemaking force we can become effective witnesses in our generation. So I urge you not to become discouraged. Do not wash out or go down the drain. I think God may be preparing us for a mighty work and a wonder. Stay in! He knows and understands!

8. For the life of me I cannot see how we can demonstrate any unity to the world while we meet in separate places, with some using the instrument and others refusing to do so.

Your problem is an old one. "Thou savorest not the things which be of God, but those that be of men." You are "hooked" on organizational unity which is as far from God's plan as is the Roman papal system. The very thing the world needs is a demonstration of the unity in diversity. Everybody expects people to work and fraternize together who see every little thing alike. This exhibits no real dynamic of the Spirit. It can be done by exercise of human nature. But when people differ and yet work together out of sheer love for God, this is the potent exhibition of a transcendent and transforming power.

Let us demonstrate our unity by joining our efforts in areas where we agree. There are desperate needs which can better be served by cooperation than by isolated efforts. We can join together in proclaiming Christ in great metropolitan areas. We all agree that Jesus is Lord and Savior and the only hope of the world. We do not have a Christian Church Christ and a Church of Christ Christ. Then let us join in telling the world that “there is one Lord, one faith, and one baptism.”

It is downright silly and sectarian for brethren to plan a “city-wide crusade” and limit participation and consultation only to the congregations in their one faction. All such “crusades” are sectarian, partisan and factional, in spite of the noble and high-sounding statements handed out to the press by their front-men and promoters. Thinking people can see through this facade and detect the sham. They know that such “crusades” are not advancing the cause of Christ and are only ripples on the ocean of humanity intended to build up another sect.

We can share youth camp facilities, inner city ghetto work, and a multitude of other things where a spirit of rivalry would only weaken our plea. I am exactly opposite to our questioner in my thinking. I have to demonstrate my unity with all of God’s children “for the life of me!” “He that loveth not his brother abideth in death.” While you are sitting at home wondering how it can ever work, I propose, with God as my help, to be out working it. If you ever come to realize that the only real unity is “the unity of the Spirit” and not agreement upon modes, means, methods and things, you will see what I mean. And when you see it, it will really be “for the life of you.”

About Authority

Mission Messenger (September 1968)

Volume 30

[Abstract]

In recent encounters with brethren outside of their own factions, certain orthodox spokesmen have been pitching their tents upon ground which they have staked out and are pleased to call “the authority of Jesus.” They now agree that there is room in the kingdom for diversity in understanding, opinion, and method of operation, so long as the authority of Jesus is respected as absolute.

At first this sounds as if these brethren are nobly allowing a greater degree of latitude in approach to fellowship, but closer investigation shows that this is not the case. The fact is that they still insist that respect for the authority of Jesus is equivalent to acceptance of their dictum upon every controversial issue. For example, to disagree with them on the question of the millennium or instrumental music is to trample underfoot the Lordship of the Son of God. One must not only affirm the authenticity of the scriptures but the infallibility of their partisan deductions upon every matter.

Such an attitude offers nothing constructive in dealing with the dilemma of division. It is precisely the spirit which prompted our schisms at the outset and has promoted them for a century. To accuse sincere brethren of denying the authority of Jesus simply because they have honestly reached different conclusions on matters of discussion within the family circle is unfair, unjust and unscriptural.

There are many brethren who respect the authority of Jesus Christ who do not to the same degree respect the authority of a human editor. Brethren are becoming tired of the impositions of self-elected supreme court justices within the spiritual realm. They know the difference between the Lord of glory and the defenders of the party spirit, and they refuse to bow the knee to the latter under the guise that only in this way can they worship the former.

Actually the greatest contribution that some editors could make the cause of Christ in our day is to cease playing God with their brethren. If such men want to enforce respect for the authority of Jesus, let them first read what the Lord has said about the sin of division, and the crime of “setting at naught a brother” for whom Jesus died. It is not becoming of them to insist upon respect for the authority of Jesus in areas where he has said nothing, while they coldly disregard what he has repeatedly said in another area of such importance.

Our real problem lies in the fact that while every faction and sect among us overlooks a great many differences within their own ranks, they all insist upon unanimity of opinion in the one issue which they have exalted because it gives them their partisan status. Such inconsistency is beginning to work its own rebuke and some day brethren will throw off these authoritarian yokes!

Rivers of Living Water

Mission Messenger (October 1968)

[Abstract]

Is it ever possible to fully understand or appreciate something that is said or done, apart from the circumstances which gave birth to it? Does a picture reveal its full beauty when ripped from the frame which was designed for it, or a diamond reflect the glow of its inner fire as brilliantly when it is pried from its setting?

The address of Abraham Lincoln at Gettysburg causes the heart to pulsate a little faster when the details of its preparation and delivery are known. The invention of the incandescent light bulb becomes more interesting when one knows of the relentless search by Thomas Edison for a filament which would withstand the heat generated.

And thus it is with the words of Jesus, and with his deeds also. They were not isolated from life or divorced from daily happenings. Instead, they grew out of the constant struggle of those caught up in the human predicament. They were sparked by incidents and involvements, and lighted by encounters with persons and places. And the historical context lends richer value to the content.

This is illustrated in one case which is vibrant with meaning. John records it in these words: "In the last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, saying. If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink. He that believeth on me, as the scripture has said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water. (But this spake he of the Spirit, which they that believe on him should receive: for the Holy Spirit was not yet given; because that Jesus was not yet glorified).”

There is no problem in identifying the feast. John tells us it was the feast of Succoth, or tabernacles. This was the third of the three annual pilgrimage festivals, and an account of its origin is given in Leviticus 23:33-43. It was a harvest celebration which lasted for eight days. During this time the people lived in outdoor shelters or booths which were constructed of boughs and branches cut from various kinds of trees. This rugged experience, which was always a picnic for the children, was to memorialize the wilderness wanderings when the families of Israel had been freed from the bondage of Egypt.

In the days when Jesus was upon earth the feast was celebrated for seven days with great pageantry, and the octave, or eighth day was a day of strict sabbath rest. During the week all of the priestly families were serving, and the offerings required the services of 446 priests, with an equal number of Levites as assistants.

On the last day of the feast the worshipers arose before daybreak and dressed in their best garments. They left their booths when the sound of the trumpets announced the dawn. Each carried in his right hand three branches of myrtle, willow and palm tied together. This was called the Lulabha and was intended to fulfill Leviticus 23:40.

The huge crowd was divided into three segments. One remained at the temple in preparation for the morning sacrifice. Another went outside of Jerusalem to gather branches of willow which they carried into the temple area to erect a huge canopy, or tabernacle, enclosing the sacred altar. The third company formed a procession which marched from the temple behind a priest bearing a golden pitcher of about one quart capacity.

To the accompaniment of music they went to the Pool of Siloam where the priest solemnly filled the pitcher, and the crowd marched back, timing their arrival at the temple at the time when the sacrifice was being placed upon the altar. A triple blast upon the trumpets signalled the arrival of the priest at the Water-gate on the south side of the Temple terrace. Immediately another priest carrying wine for the drink-offering fell into step with him.

The two of them ascended the slope to the altar, turned left and halted before two silver funnels with narrow openings leading down to the base of the altar. At a signal the wine was poured into the one on the east and the water into the one on the west. This was a meticulous ceremony, in which not a drop of either liquid was to be spilled upon the ground. Upon one occasion when the high priest Alexander poured the water upon the ground, the multitude became enraged and attacked and beat him with the branches they were carrying. In the riot which ensued six thousand persons were killed in the temple precincts. (See Josephus' Antiquities, 13.13.5).

As soon as the water was poured out the great Hallel began. This was a chant of Psalm 113 to Psalm 118, to the accompaniment of the flute. The Levites chanted a line at a time and after each line the multitude responded with "Hallelujah," waving or shaking the Lulabha toward the altar. It was probably at the close of this great demonstration that the voice of Jesus rang out loud and clear, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink. He that believeth on me, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water."

Many who were present may have resented what seemed to them a fanatical outburst and interruption. They may have regarded the one who cried out as an opportunist seeking for notoriety. Few understood what he was saying. Twenty centuries have passed and few yet understand.

THIRST AND BELIEF

At the very outset we must become aware of a great transformation to be wrought. One who is thirsty and dry may come to Christ and drink and through faith become a source of overflowing blessing to others. One whose heart is parched and sere will not only find relief but a fountain will burst out and satisfy those who come in contact with him.

Throughout the old covenant scriptures the deepest longings and yearnings of the human spirit are referred to as thirst. Just as the outer man becomes dehydrated, so the inner man, when deprived of the refreshing draught of God's presence, languishes and dries up. "I am weary of my crying: my throat is dried: mine eyes fail while I wait for my God" (Psalm 69:3).

Man can no more live spiritually without the fellowship of God than he can exist physically without water. "O God, thou art my God; early will I seek for thee: my soul thirsteth for thee: my flesh longeth for thee in a dry and thirsty land, where no water is" (Psalm 63:1). "My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God: when shall I come and appear before God?" (Psalm 42:2). The invitation of God to the weary and heartsick is, "Ho, everyone who thirsts, come to the waters" (Isaiah 55:1).

Jesus said, "If any one thirst, let him come to me and drink." All of the craving and the desire to be what one was destined to be without the blight and tragedy of sin is realized in Jesus. The need for forgiveness, the passion for identity, the eagerness to recapture the oneness fragmented by selfishness, can be satisfied only in him. He is the fullness of Him that filleth all in all, and all who would find fulfillment must find it in Him.

The invitation is not limited by race, nationality, sex, status, or previous condition of servitude. The only condition is that one realize that he is parched and tarnished and that there is no other fountain, no other place to which he can turn for hope. "If any one thirst!" "Let him come to me!"

To drink is to partake, to imbibe, to share in. And to drink of Christ is to partake of his life which is eternal life. Almost the final plea of Jesus is, "Let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely" (Revelation 22:17). God has provided for our need. There is no need for soul-thirst to go unassuaged. He is a fountain open for all.

This is but part of the story and if it ended here it would all be quite selfish. We would come and drink and go our way rejoicing in the personal refreshment and re-vitalization. But it does not work that way for eternal life cannot be contained. We become fountains. "He that believeth on me, as the scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water."

The believer is to be the channel through which the Holy Spirit abundantly flows to accomplish all that rivers were intended to accomplish in the universe. There is to be cleansing, purification and refreshment. There is to be power and motivation, and this is to well up within the innermost being, the secret chambers, the subterranean caverns of the heart. Just as a river gushes forth from a cave in the hillside, fed by an unseen spring in the bowels of the earth, so the indwelling Spirit sends forth the rushing stream of love, peace, and all of the other elements of purity.

The key which unlocks this power is faith, or belief. It is not faith in a system, an institution or an organization, but in a person. "He that believeth on me." But this is an unfortunate translation for the word translated "on" is the Greek eis, and this signifies action from without to within. It is literally, "He that believeth into me."

This is a great deal different than believing on one. To believe on one requires only intellectual assent to historical facts related to his existence, life and work. It involves an acceptance of the testimony that what is alleged actually happened and the person is who he claimed to be. But to believe in one, or into one, is to become identified with him, to enter into a relationship so intimate that the two become a unit.

One does not become a fountain to bless humanity merely by believing on Jesus. He must believe in him and this requires the loss of selfness, the crucifixion of human nature and the embracing of the divine nature. So long as one insists that he is going to be himself regardless of what happens the Holy Spirit can never send rivers gushing from his inner depths.

The stream of holiness produced by the Spirit of holiness was not a last minute arrangement of God. He revealed it long before the Lord died. “As the scripture hath said.” So we have Isaiah declaring, “And the Lord shall guide thee continually, and satisfy thy soul in drought . . . and thou shalt be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water, whose waters fail not” (58:11). The rabbis had a saying, “When a man turns himself to the Lord, he shall be as a fountain filled with living water, and his streams shall flow to all the nations and tribes of men.”

OF THE SPIRIT

The fountain of living waters is the result of the indwelling Spirit. This is explained by John in a statement which is rightly shown as parenthetical. John wrote his record many years after Jesus had returned to glory, and after believers had received the Spirit. He could explain what seemed so mystifying on that last day of the feast of the tabernacles. So he said:

But this spake he of the Spirit, which they that believe on him should receive: for the Holy Spirit was not yet given; because that Jesus was not yet glorified.

From this we learn several things about the Holy Spirit. Let us mention some of them. (1) The Spirit was to be a gift. (2) He could be received only by those who believe in Jesus, that is, who are identified with him. (3) The Spirit, in this sense, could only come after Jesus was glorified. (4) We can only become channels of blessing by receiving the Spirit. Without the Spirit we are dry, dusty and despondent in heart. We are like cisterns without water and clouds without rain. We promise much but deliver nothing. We have a form of godliness but are devoid of power. We are like an automobile without battery or sparkplugs, or like a boiler without steam. Our lives are sterile, routine and stagnant.

Those who seek to reach us in the hope that they will find an oasis are disappointed to see only a dry stream bed, cracked and arid. There is no substitute for the Spirit. Nothing else can cause the river to flow from within. Nothing else can produce living water. Regardless of what else one may have, if he does not have the Spirit, he can never truly bless others.

Because of the transformation which the Spirit works a great many people would like to explain away John's explanation. They want to limit it, circumscribe it, fence it in and control it. We must face up to the fact that there are those who want to eat their cake and have it too. They want to surrender only partially to Jesus, holding in reserve those desires and inclinations which they would gratify in the flesh. Others are caught up in the grip of legalism and seek a righteousness which is by law rather than through faith. So we are told that Jesus was here speaking only of the apostles. This we cannot accept. Jesus stood up publicly and proclaimed to thousands of pilgrims, "If any man thirst, let him come to me . . . He that believeth on me" The promise of the Spirit was to every believer, and it has never been revoked. It is the boon to believers now as it was when the gift was first given. The rivers of living waters will flow as freely as they ever have.

Again we are told that the Spirit is identical with the word of God, but it never was, and it is not now. The word of Christ was given and could be received before Jesus was glorified. In the case under consideration what he spoke about the Spirit was the word of Christ, but the Holy Spirit had not yet been given. When he did come he was to bring to the remembrance of the envoys the words which Jesus had spoken.

Before Christ could be glorified he had to leave the earth. If he had not gone he could not have sent the Holy Spirit. "It is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you" (John 16:7). The Spirit is the divine presence in believers while Jesus is absent for the earth.

He said, "And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever." The term for ever is from eis aiona, to the age. The Holy Spirit as a Comforter could not be given while Jesus was resident among men, but having been given, He will continue to abide with believers throughout the age. This is the era of the abiding Spirit. "Even the Spirit of truth; whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him: but ye know him: for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you."

Jesus said, "I will not leave you comfortless: I will come to you." The word "comfortless" is orphanos. It is used only one other time, in James 1:27, "to visit the fatherless and the widows." Now a child is still fatherless regardless of how many letters or books he receives. Moreover, Jesus uses the expression "another Comforter." There are two words for "another" in Greek. One is heteros, which means another of a different kind. The other is allos, which means another of the same kind. It is this last word which is here used.

The Holy Spirit is a personal comforter abiding with us, as Jesus abode with men while he was on earth. The Spirit has been given to believers so that they may become God's channels from within, sharing the water of life with others in a weary and sinful world.

But what about the objection that the promises contained in John, chapters 14 through 16, were made to the apostles. This is true because they were present as listeners, but it must be remembered that theirs was a dual role. They were both disciples and apostles. Whatever applied to them specifically as apostles and in view of their official function, belonged only to them. But whatever applied to them as disciples is equally applicable to all disciples of our Lord.

It will be noted that those who seek to restrict what Jesus said to the apostles, have no hesitancy about quoting profusely from the same speech and applying it to all believers in our day. For example, there are the words spoken directly to Thomas, "I am the way, the truth and the life: no man cometh unto the Father but by me." Again, there are the words addressed to Judas, "If a man love me, he will keep my words: and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him."

The life of the believer is the life of the Spirit. And the Spirit is not a sanctimonious impulse, a righteous motivation, or an influence of one's own converted will. The Spirit is not a glorified "it" or a disposition to do good. He is personal. Jesus said, "If I depart I will send him unto you." The body of the believer is the tabernacle of the Spirit. It is the Spirit within who certifies that we are God's children, the sons of God. "Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of his" (Romans 8:9).

THE SPIRITUAL FRATERNITY

The community of God is a fraternity of the Spirit-filled ones who were once thirsty and who came to Christ to quench their desperate need for fulfillment. They are a commonwealth of the called out ones, sinners who have been washed and sanctified and justified “in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God.” They are in the world, but not of it; they use this world, though not abusing it, “for the fashion of this world passeth away.”

These are the true circumcision and they have three distinctive qualifications. They “worship by the Spirit of God, and glory in Christ Jesus, and put no confidence in the flesh” (Philippians 3:3). Ponder these items carefully. They identify those who have no righteousness of their own, based on law, but that which is through faith in Christ, the righteousness from God that depends on faith.

Worship by the Spirit is not confined to ritualistic acts performed at certain times upon certain days. It knows no shrine except the contrite heart. It has no special holy days for every day and hour is holy. It has no special holy places, no dimly lighted piles of brick and stone. It is not confined by a program, regulated by a code, or captured in an agenda. All of these are wineskins which must explode when the wine of the Spirit ferments and expands and seeks room for expression of praise and glory.

Glory in Christ Jesus is bathed in denial of self and in recognition that in the flesh dwelleth no good thing. It is the response of the heart stricken with a sense of the futility and frustration of trying to achieve righteousness by law when an unseen hand reaches down to snatch one from the yawning jaws of death and despair. It is the relaxation of the frightened child in his father’s arms, the choking sob of the slave set free, the trembling frame of the prodigal stumbling into his father’s embrace. It is the glad cry of one who has groped in blindness all of his life and whose outstretched hands touch the cross only to have the scales drop from his eyes and the dawn break upon his vision.

No confidence in the flesh! None! The Spirit lifts one out of the shame and scandal, the dishonor and disgrace which always attend the life that revels and glories in the flesh. All of those things which were regarded as imposing, superior and splendid, are seen for what they are— the icing on a cake that is poison in the center, the skin graft over a putrid wound, the paint over a rotten post. The things of which we boasted belong in the garbage can of life. They are flung on the dunghill, never to be picked up again.

Those who have a partnership in the gospel have the Spirit within as another Comforter since Jesus went away. The word parakletos is so rich and full of power that, as Albert Barnes writes, “No single word in our language expresses fully the sense of the original.” The verb form means to call one to us, then, to summon one to aid us.

It was used of an attorney who stood beside one in court to present his petition, make a plea, or offer a defence. It was used of a teacher who stands beside a pupil to point out the true meaning of a lesson. It was used of a helper who suddenly appears by the side of one to help him shoulder a load with which he was struggling. It is also used of a friend who comes to sit beside one to comfort or console by suggesting reasons for hope in the midst of grief.

We now know what Jesus meant when he said that he would not leave his followers orphans. The Comforter would abide with them to help and strengthen and to supply their needs. As an advocate he would present their petitions before the throne of God in the language of heaven (Romans 8:26). As a teacher he would stand beside the earnest student in the school of Christ, to provide insights into the text which seemed so puzzling and difficult.

When burdens seem intolerable and one is ready to faint by the way, the Spirit comes to help lift the load and to walk beside the bearer to keep him from stumbling. In times of grief, when a pall of sadness hangs like a thick gray fog over the soul, and the heart is numb, and the hands are cold, it is the voice of the Spirit which gives hope and enables us to see the stars shimmering through our tears.

One simply cannot make it by trusting in the flesh. The arm of flesh will fail. While we are living in the flesh, our sinful passions, aroused by the law, are at work in our members to bear fruit for death. To set the mind on the flesh is death. The mind that is set on the flesh is hostile to God. Those who are in the flesh cannot please God. “But you are not in the flesh, you are in the Spirit, if the Spirit of God really dwells in you” (Romans 8:9). This is my story, this is my song. It is my hope, my only hope. There is no other!

LAW AND SPIRIT

The community of God is a spiritual community because it is the community of the Spirit. The grace-sharers are also the Spirit-sharers. It is the Spirit who makes them one. Their fellowship is a koinonia of the Spirit (Philippians 2:1). Their unity is a unity of the Spirit (Ephesians 4:3). There is no true unity except as created and motivated by the Spirit. Unity can never be secured by law, or by fleshly agreements, or by signed statements. Such agreements are only truces.

The flesh is selfish, jealous and ambitious. And “where jealousy and selfish ambition exist, there will be disorder and every evil practice” (James 3:16). “For you are still of the flesh. For while there is jealousy and strife among you, are you not of the flesh, and behaving like ordinary men?” (1 Corinthians 3:3). To try to settle differences merely by conference, debate, or purely human dialogue, is to attempt the impossible. It is like putting a patch on a rotten inner tube only to have it puncture elsewhere.

A community of saints whose lives are permeated with the Spirit can never remain hidden. The rivers of living water will touch every thirsty person who comes among them. Their boast will be this, the testimony of their conscience, that they have behaved in the world with holiness and godly sincerity, not by earthly wisdom, but by the grace of God (2 Corinthians 1:12).

Now it is evident that those who walk after the flesh will disparage the Spirit. They will seek to cram, crush and contract him into law. Laws can always be manipulated by men. They can be interpreted to bind heavy burdens and free the interpreter from lifting a finger to remove them. They can be made to draw keen distinctions so that if one swears by the temple, it is nothing, but if he swears by the gold of the temple, you can tighten the screws on him and make him come through to the uttermost farthing.

Laws can be loosened to let camels slip by without touching a hair, and then tightened up until a gnat cannot find a hole to go through. Every legalist becomes a camel gulper and a gnat gagger. It is imperative that carnal men stifle the Spirit for the Spirit makes men free— free from bigotry, sectarianism and that species of littleness that only religion can produce. The Spirit enters in and expands, enlarges and dilates the personality which was shrunken by selfishness and egotism. It sets the captive free.

The Spirit pulls back the curtains and throws open the windows of the heart. And the creatures of the night who have burrowed into the sub-conscious squeak and scurry for the darkness. Men simply cannot always keep the Spirit stifled or quenched. The very symbolism employed demonstrates that this is so. The Spirit is like wind and one might as well try to capture a tornado in a toy balloon as to attempt to capture the Spirit in his sectarian shopping bag.

The Spirit is like rivers of living water. No denominational dam can stand against the pressure. It is true that until the fulness of time comes, the dam may stand, but when the time of fulness comes it must give way. All of the frantic efforts of editors, professors and preachers to patch and plaster the leaks will prove unavailing. They will have as much luck as a colony of beavers trying to control Grand Coulee. The Spirit just does not belong to sect or segment, splinter or fragment. He will burst the bends and sweep all before Him.

It is axiomatic in the scripture that “where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty” (2 Corinthians 3:17). The sanctuary of the human heart is sacred ground upon which no other has a right to intrude. Here no outside force can come. No mailed fist can crash down upon the conscience. This is the domain of the Spirit.

But what is liberty? It is necessary that we define it anew in our day, and I know of no better statement than that of Judge Learned Hand, which follows:

What then is the spirit of liberty? I cannot define it; I can only tell you my own faith. The spirit of liberty is the spirit which is not too sure it is right; the spirit of liberty is the spirit which seeks to understand the minds of other men and women; the spirit which weighs their interests against his own without bias; the spirit of liberty remembers that not even a sparrow falls to earth unheeded; the spirit of liberty is the spirit of him who, near two thousand years ago, taught mankind that lesson it has never learned, but has never quite forgotten; that there may be a kingdom where the least shall be heard and considered side by side with the greatest.

The community of the reconciled is composed of those who were once separated from Christ as aliens and strangers, having no hope and without God in the world. They have been brought near in the blood of Christ. They have gained access in the one Spirit to the Father. Now they are no longer strangers and sojourners. They are fellow citizens. They are members of the household of God. They are a unit, cemented together as a holy temple in the Lord, built into it for a dwelling place of God in the Spirit.

The community is a divine creation. It is not a human organization composed of elite thinkers who have discovered the golden key of doctrinal knowledge hidden from the eyes of the rest of humanity. It is not a club composed of men of superior goodness, an aristocracy of the sinless, or a confraternity of the perfect. Instead, it is a gathering together of sinners who have nothing of their own of which to boast, and are forced to glory in the person and presence of Another.

Their very cohesiveness must be given. The love which holds them together in spite of errors, frailties, weaknesses and differences, is not produced by their own power. God's love is poured into their hearts through the Holy Spirit which has been given unto them (Romans 5:5). It is the love of the Spirit by which they strive together in prayers to God for one another (Romans 15:30). The first fruit of the Spirit is love (Galatians 5:22).

Those who deny the Spirit cannot truly love. They have cut themselves off from the source. "It is these who set up divisions, worldly people, devoid of the Spirit" (Jude 19). "No man has ever seen God; if we love one another, God abides in us and his love is perfected in us. By this we know that we abide in him and he in us, because he has given us of his own Spirit" (1 John 4:12, 13).

If our God wills, we shall present in our next issue a treatise on "Body and Spirit." It will not deal with the human body and spirit, but with the one body and one Spirit, and the mutual relationship which they share. We trust that you will read it with interest and concern.

The Big Mistake

Mission Messenger (October 1968)

Volume 30

[Abstract]

The latter part of a wise man's life is taken up in curing the follies, prejudices, and false opinions he had contracted in the former.— Jonathan Swift.

Suppose you were asked to state your opinion as to the gravest error contributing to the division in the religious world. What would be your reply? Would you mention the assumed infallibility of the pope of Rome? Or the doctrine of inherent total depravity? Or the dogma of transubstantiation? It is not one of these great items of controversy. Actually, there is almost universal agreement in the error and few Christians have ever given it a minute's thought.

To lessen suspense let me say that I think the most fertile source of difficulty is the mistaken view that the new testament is composed of twenty-seven books or letters. The truth is that not one word of the new testament has ever been written with ink or put on paper, and the Bible clearly teaches that this is so.

You must remember that the word "testament" means "a covenant." The two words are used interchangeably in your Authorized Version. The new testament is God's new covenant, the old testament was God's previous covenant.

The old covenant was given to the Israelites at Mount Sinai. It was written on two tablets of stone. It consisted of ten commandments. Those to whom it was given broke it repeatedly. The result was that God, the party of the first part, predicted that the day would come when he would make a new covenant. It would not be like the one he made when he freed his people from the bondage of Egypt.

The distinctive difference was clearly stated. "For this is the covenant I will make with them after those days . . . I will put my laws into their mind, and on their heart also will I write them." The result of this new covenant is defined, "And I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people."

Careless students have always assumed that this meant that God would give his followers a series of apostolic letters, and through study they would absorb them into their minds and hearts. If this were the case there would be no real difference between the old and new testaments. The first one could also be written on hearts and minds in the same fashion, for what was written down could be studied.

But the first testament was definitely said to be written in tangible fashion on a material medium. The second was to be different. It was not to be inscribed on a secondary substance. It was to be written directly on minds and hearts.

The word from which we derive "covenant" or "testament" can probably best be translated agreement. It is interesting that J. B. Phillips so renders it. "But Christ has been given a far higher ministry for he mediates a higher agreement, which in turn rests upon higher promises. If the first agreement had proved satisfactory there would have been no need for the second."

What is this agreement, this new testament? It is eternal reconciliation with God, won for us by Jesus Christ, when his own blood acted as the key for his entrance into the Holy of holies. Upon the basis of that redemption, purchased while we were yet sinners, God proposes to receive us as his own. He accepted Jesus in our stead because we had nothing to offer, and now if we accept Jesus in our stead as all we have to offer, the agreement is ratified by blood.

This is not as easy as it sounds. From one standpoint it appears that we are merely on the receiving end and this is true. But from another standpoint, to accept Jesus in our stead actually means the death of all we have held dear. Our dreams of personal greatness, our ambitions, our intellectual attainments, our social prestige, and in short, all of the things in which we have trusted and exulted, are found to be useless, fit only to be buried into the garbage can.

It is a little like bringing an armload of currency out of your private safe only to have a numismatic expert tell you it is counterfeit. All of your dream castles are shattered. At first you cannot believe it. You frantically try to salvage something good out of the worthless heap. You say that this bill or that one looks real. It is all a fake, you are told. And precisely at the moment when you are willing to admit to God that you have nothing with which to purchase salvation, he tells you it was never for sale anyhow.

All of these years you have just been deluding yourself, promising that somehow, some day, some way, you would be good enough that you could step up to the window and say to the recording angel, "I'd like to speak to the manager, please!" You've lived over a hundred times the imaginary encounter when you piled your treasured thoughts, your wisest words and golden deeds, on the divine desk, and said, "Count them!" And now you have to give all of it up and admit that you are penniless, bankrupt, homeless, and naked, and that you always have been and did not know it.

It isn't easy for one who has been so wise to acknowledge abject ignorance, or for one who basked in imaginary affluence to admit that he has actually wallowed in penury. But when we arrive at that place where we fling out everything, every minute fragment of self-esteem, and we are down to the bare walls, we are ready to start living. Up to that moment we have been dying!

Please forgive me for saying that one reason we have been so far off is because of the Big Error. We've always thought of the new testament, the agreement, as being a collection of letters and short documents written by the apostles or their contemporaries, and so we have regarded the covenant as being a law, the new law of God. If we could understand every statement and implication correctly, and keep it meticulously, we would be saved. If we missed any point or overlooked anything, we would be damned.

The basic problem in our thinking was that with our philosophy we were hopelessly damned before we started. No one can keep a law perfectly, and unless you do, you die. The very minute we convert God's dealing with us into a code, and predicate salvation upon it, we are gone, for no law can give life. And we need life, because we are dead in trespasses and sins!

A little clear thinking should have shown us the fallacies in our thinking, for they are as big as balloons. I cannot take time to detail them all, but allow me to mention one or two. If salvation is predicated upon law-keeping the law must be enunciated fully before any one is inducted into the relationship created by that law, else those under it will be committed to that of which they are wholly ignorant.

The first covenant was legalistic and God led the people to Mount Sinai where he spelled out the law and had it written in a book, after which Moses sprinkled the book and all of the people. In the case of the new covenant many had died for the faith before a single apostolic letter was written, and it would not have been written then if the brethren in a remote province had not developed warped ideas about the second coming of the Lord.

Moreover, if the apostolic epistles constitute the new testament, or covenant, only one of the apostles could have possibly understood all of its requirements, and that only because he outlived all of the others. But it is certain that eleven of the apostles did not see all of the epistles, and doubtful that the twelfth did, since they had been written to widely scattered areas.

Again, the primitive saints could never have known whether they were fulfilling the terms of the covenant or not, since only a few localities had apostolic letters, and these were not collected and compiled as we now have them for several centuries. There were even questions at first about whether some deserved to be in the canon, and these questions had to be resolved.

The new testament is not a book. It is not a compilation of writings. Letters and books are written with pen and ink and paper, as John plainly says (2 John 12; 3 John 13). Paul says just as plainly that the new testament is not written with pen and ink (2 Corinthians 3:3). Thus, what Paul wrote, and what John wrote, was never referred to as the new testament, or agreement. The Bible does not say there are twenty-seven books in the new testament. It plainly says that the new testament, of which the apostles were made able ministers, is not written in ink.

The new covenant is a person and the relationship created by the new testament is a personal relationship. God said, concerning Jesus, as the context clearly shows, "I will give thee for a covenant of the people, for a light of the Gentiles" (Isaiah 42:6). Again, "I will preserve thee and give thee for a covenant of the people" (Isaiah 49:8). Jesus is God's new testament. To receive him is to embrace reconciliation. "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself."

This is the real difference between the old and new agreements. The first was written on tablets of stone, the second on fleshy tablets of the heart. The second is written with the Spirit of the living God, and not with ink. The first was of the letter, the second is of the spirit. The letter kills but the spirit produces life. No law, no written code could ever produce life.

Men and women were under the new testament and were a part of it, who never saw or read a single one of the letters which the apostles wrote. The new covenant was complete on Pentecost. It was perfect that day. Nothing was ever added to it. Those who embraced the testament on that day, embraced it in all of its life-giving fulness. They were born again. They were children of God. They shared in the indwelling Spirit and he brought to their whole being new strength and new vitality.

Our relationship is a covenantal one. There is no other divine-human relationship. God is our God and we are his people on the basis of a covenant. That covenant is proclaimed by the gospel. We enter into it by proper response to the gospel. The gospel is not a system of doctrines, a collection of letters, a code of laws, or a compilation of apostolic principles.

It is good news about the person of Jesus, the covenant personality. It consists of seven facts, established by creditable witnesses. These relate to his life, death, burial, resurrection, ascension, coronation and glorification. The assent to these facts, accompanied by the reformation of life demanded by them and the initiation into the divine sharing of life eternal, validates the agreement through the Spirit. God offers Jesus as the basis of reconciliation. Man accepts him as that basis. This is the agreement, the new testament ratified in blood.

Every individual on the face of this whole earth who has personally shared in the death of Jesus Christ and has thus broken the tyranny of sin over his life, is in Christ, and Christ is in him. Such persons are themselves “a letter that has come from Christ . . . a letter written not with ink but with the Spirit of the living God, written not on stone tablets but on the pages of the human heart.” If “you have been adopted into the very family circle of God” you are a new testament letter, the only kind there is, for it is specifically said that the new covenant is “a covenant expressed not in a written document, but in a spiritual bond” (2 Corinthians 3:6). Nothing can be plainer than this. The new testament is not expressed in a written document!

Then, what are the apostolic epistles? The answer is quite simple. They are letters written to a covenant people. Not one of them has anything to do with bringing people into the covenant. They are no part of the new testament. They were all written to people who were already in the testamental kinship, and precisely because they were in it. They are doctrinal, intended for the instruction of the children of God.

The gospel is for the world, the apostolic doctrine for the saints. The gospel introduces into the testamental association, the doctrine teaches us how to live in it. There is as much difference between the gospel and doctrine as there is between a daily newspaper and a marriage guide or a mechanic’s handbook.

There is the same difference as there is between a seed and plant food. The gospel is the sperm from which we are begotten, the doctrine is the bread upon which we feed after we are born.

Why is the mistaken identity of the new testament so tragic? The answer is obvious. If our relationship to God is a covenantal one, contingent upon our grasp of the new testament, and if we conceive of the new testament as the collection of twenty-seven letters, we must conclude that no one can be a child of God who does not fully grasp every point of those letters.

Most of those who postulate that this is the case have never calmly thought about the absurdity of such a position. This would mean that those who were initiated into Christ in the morning would have to be excommunicated in the afternoon, unless in the meantime they had come to a perfect understanding of every apostolic statement. If they were permitted to stay until they had time to learn, some infallible soul would have to determine the time required, or they would have to be allowed to continue so long as they were learning. If this latter situation prevailed it would be an admission that the apostolic doctrine was not the basis of fellowship or covenantal acceptance.

If it be admitted that God accepts one at baptism with certain mistaken views and erroneous ideas, then those views and ideas can never afterwards be urged as a basis for rejection of the one who holds them, else God will be placed in the position of discarding a child for a birthmark even though he accepted him into the divine family with that disfiguration at first.

In the physical realm no one expects a person at birth to eat all of the food he will require through his life, and if he lives for eighty years he is required to eat daily. By the same token a child of God cannot be expected to eat at the time of the new birth all of the truth he will ever digest or assimilate. Just as one's digestive ability has nothing to do with his acceptance into the physical family, so one's knowledge of apostolic doctrine has nothing to do with his being God's child.

All of this simply means that it is the gospel, not the apostolic doctrine, which brings us into the fellowship, and thus it is the gospel which is the basis for our given unity, the unity of the Spirit. One should not use the apostolic doctrine in such a manner as to destroy the work of the gospel, for the kingdom of God must not be divided against itself. There are some fairly ignorant children in God's family, as is demonstrated by the fact that some cannot distinguish between seed and bread, but we cannot start driving out those who do not know it all, else we will utterly divest the divine commonwealth of all of its citizenry.

I shall regard every person who has obeyed the gospel as a letter of God, the new testament written with the Spirit upon human hearts. I shall remain one in heart with all such persons on earth regardless of where I find them for the new testament has also been inscribed upon the fleshy tablet of my heart. I know that the Spirit of God has written upon my heart. I know that I am redeemed, reconciled and justified. I am in the covenant and the covenant is in me. Because I am in the new covenant I shall read the letters addressed to a new covenant people. But I will not confuse my birth certificate with a cookbook or a text on mathematics. It is one thing to be born, a wholly different thing to learn how to solve problems as you grow up.

(Editor's Note, Those who desire to pursue this subject further may do so by reading the author's book, "Covenants of God," a 384 page volume which examines at length the nature of God as a covenantal being. The price has recently been reduced to $2.95 per copy).

An Open Proposition

Mission Messenger (October 1968)

Volume 30

[Abstract]

“My brethren, I beseech you, in the bowels of Christ, think it possible that you may be mistaken.”

These were the words of Oliver Cromwell, in a letter addressed to the General Assembly, Church of Scotland, before the battle of Dunbar, August 3, 1650. I have borrowed them to head this appeal addressed to those brethren within the religious movement designated in the United States Census Bureau records as “Churches of Christ.” Because this movement is fragmented, I shall specifically concern myself with those brethren who support the general philosophy and policies as projected at Abilene Christian College, and in the journal Firm Foundation.

I shall be plain but will write in deepest love. The position of my brethren on fellowship is untenable to those students of God’s word who refuse to be carnal and sectarian. That position is a flat denial of the principles of the restoration movement, as set forth in “The Declaration and Address,” which gave us historic entree and existence. It is contrary to the fundamental teaching of the apostolic epistles, and is both unscriptural and anti-scriptural.

It is carnal, spiritually immature, and divisive in its very nature. It has splintered the movement of which we are a part and has nothing to offer a distraught world seeking for unity, except more division. It will be increasingly rejected by thoughtful and perceptive men and women, and will be dashed to pieces upon the rocky shores of its own factionalism.

I unhesitatingly charge that the approach it takes toward unity is dishonest. It professes to lift the whole discussion to the high plane of respect for the authority of Jesus, but cloaks the fact that it substitutes the partisan interpretation and system as the real authority. In the final analysis the hope of oneness lies not in a surrender of the will to Christ but in submission of the conscience to the authoritarian structure.

Suffer me to be even more specific. The exaltation of personal or congregational views relative to such things as the millennium or employment of instrumental music, to the realm of tests of union or communion among the saints, is sectarian and schismatic. Such tests of fellowship negate the divine dynamic of brotherly love, and cause those who project them to forfeit the respect of those who love Jesus and the one body more than their own views and deductions.

We are charged with the responsibility of being peacemakers. In this regard we must be activists. In view of the fact that my brother and fellow-editor, Reuel Lemmons, is highly respected as a defender of the tests of fellowship we have mentioned, I make this sincere proposal. I will meet our brother publicly in Abilene, or any other city of his choosing in Texas, at a time convenient to the two of us, for the purpose of discussing the scriptural grounds of fellowship. Since neither of us favors the use of instrumental music in corporate worship or the pre-millennial position, we can discuss objectively how we may heal the breach between ourselves and the brethren who espouse either or both.

I propose that we hold at least three two-hour sessions. In the first, let each of us speak for one hour on our personal position, making it as clear as possible. In the second session, let us question each other for two hours in order to clarify further our views. In the third session, let us sit down together as brothers in Christ, and submit to questions addressed to us from the audience. Let our aim not be personal victory or vindication but an earnest striving together to bridge chasms in the restoration movement. Let us not meet as rivals but as mutual researchists. Obviously, the principles we enunciate with reference to these major issues will apply to all of our other problems as well.

I respectfully petition the brethren in the Administration at Abilene Christian College to consider providing facilities for such a dialogue and issuing an invitation to all segments of the restoration movement to attend. I suggest that they appoint a member of the faculty to act as moderator, and any such member who is acceptable to Brother Lemmons will be so to me. If the college administration does not see fit to invite such a dialogue, I will meet with Brother Lemmons in any city of his choosing. However, I do believe that Abilene will provide the best site for such a meaningful dialogue. We must not hold up a confrontation by haggling over places and details.

Such a dialogue session should be announced in news media accessible to the Disciples of Christ, Independent Christian Churches, and various parties within the Churches of Christ. All should feel free to attend and to question. I pledge that I will conduct myself with politeness and decorum, and will act in kindness and love toward Brother Lemmons and all others who attend.

I am taking this means of issuing a proposal because I know of no other that will be so effective. This public invitation to dialogue may be taken as your own invitation to write to Brother Lemmons and the administration at Abilene Christian College, and urge upon them the necessity of taking active measures to solve our problems and adjust our attitudes. It is tragic for us to continue divided and dividing while the rest of the world thinks in terms of unity and uniting.

If my position on fellowship, which has now been before the reading public for more than ten years, is incorrect, let its failings be revealed openly and positively for all to see. If we must maintain our divided status in order to honor the authority of Jesus, then let us labor to make the gaps wider so that there will be no danger of anyone closing them, and thus make the memory of the crucified Lord inglorious by our unity.

But let us do something, for Christ's sake. We can no longer dwell in our ivory towers when a world writhing in agony extends a hand asking for help. I may be called an opportunist, or worse, for the suggestion in this article, but this is a part of the price we must pay. Let us never retreat from reality.

Body and Spirit

Mission Messenger (November 1968)

Volume 30

[Abstract]

Sectarians are those who would make fellowship with Christ their exclusive privilege. They are not satisfied with belonging to Jesus, they would make Jesus belong to them. (Kokichi Kurosaki in “One Body in Christ,” page 42).

Once upon a time all the world had become guilty before God. Men were dead in their sins and wickedness. They obeyed the commander of the spiritual powers of the air, the spirit now at work among God’s rebel subjects. One who was freed from this dire state wrote about it in these words, “In our natural condition we, like the rest, lay under the dreadful judgment of God.”

When the condition seemed hopeless because of the ignorance, alienation and enmity of man, God intervened. This represented no change or alteration of character upon the part of God. He did not suddenly realize that he must do something to correct an intolerable situation. It was just that “the fulness of the times” had arrived and grace reacted as it had to do in order to display in the ages to come how immense are its resources.

God’s direct involvement with mankind occurred through the Word becoming flesh. Although the divine nature belonged to the Word from the first, he assumed the nature of a slave, and bearing the human likeness, was revealed in human shape. This culminated the divine program of sacrifices for sin which previously had required the death of lower animals. Even though sacrifices, offerings and sin-offerings had been prescribed by law, God did not desire or delight in them, but used them as object-lessons until a body was prepared for the Son who declared, "Here I am, as it is written of me in the scroll, I have come, O God, to do thy will."

The divine encounter with man since the incarnation of the word has always been through the body of Christ. At first it was the body of flesh which was prepared, but now it is the spiritual body. The same word— soma— is used for both. Jesus entered the physical body of man to do God's will; man must enter the spiritual body of Christ to do God's will.

The body embraces all who are in covenant relationship with God, but it is not enough to say that such believers alone constitute the body. Inseparably connected with it also are Jesus and the Holy Spirit. One who is not in Christ is not in the body, and one in whom the Spirit does not dwell is not in the body. It is believers who are incorporated in Christ by the Spirit who are in the body. The body is more than just members, it is a unit.

The divine community is made up of the new humanity, those who have been born again and who share in the life of the Spirit. These died to sin but were quickened by the Spirit. They received the divine nature by the indwelling Spirit, and they are not in the flesh but in the Spirit.

These are the ekklesia, the body of the called out ones. The call is by proclamation, and it is an invitation to reconciliation. The message is designated the good news, the gospel. One responds to it by faith and obedience. The belief of one fact and the obedience of one act is all that is necessary to induct one into covenant relationship. That relationship is the result of the call and those who are in it are the called ones. It is a living and vital relationship, throbbing and pulsating with the divine life.

The community of saints is not a human organization. It did not originate with men, it is not perpetuated by men, and it cannot be maintained by human wisdom, ingenuity or power. No man can add another to it, no man can remove another from it. The citizenship of those within it is inscribed in heaven.

Fifty days after the resurrection of Jesus from the dead, the Holy Spirit was poured out upon the previously prepared disciples of the Lord and the body became a living reality. Just as the body of Adam was inanimate until God breathed into his nostrils, so the company of believers was powerless until invested with the Spirit of God. And it is only as the Spirit operates in and through the members of the body that the new man can accomplish God's design now. The motivating power of the body is the Spirit. The body without the Spirit is dead.

We are asked if the Spirit was not given before the new covenant was validated. The answer is that the Spirit was bestowed upon certain select individuals under the old covenant, but not upon the community as a whole. Upon the day of Pentecost the apostles were all in one place, constituting a unit. It was in this sense the Spirit was shed forth, and upon that day all who had acknowledged that God had raised up Jesus and made him Lord and Christ were promised the Spirit as a gift and were added unto them.

The body of Christ is a fellowship of the Spirit, and it was created as a historical community, a holy temple in which God could dwell through the Spirit. It is true that each stone in this temple is a living stone, and a recipient of the Spirit, but they do not receive the gift in isolation. The purpose of the Spirit in each one is to bind all together in a holy structure for an habitation of God.

To view our life in the Spirit from the standpoint of purely individual gifts is to return to the old covenant view. It is simply to extend the old covenant system to more people while it ignores that God raised Jesus Christ from the dead to make him head over the called-out community, which is his body, the fulness of Him that filleth all in all.

THE SPIRIT AND LIFE

It will be worth our time to investigate the written word and from it to ascertain what is involved in the Spirit as the life of the body. We use the word life not merely as existence in the world, but as the activity and functioning of God in the world. The life is the atmosphere breathed by the body, permeating every cell and organ as oxygen does in the human body. There is no part of the body of Christ divorced from contact with the Spirit.

It is important to remember that the body is a creation of the Spirit. It is the action of the Spirit in and through baptism which brings us into our corporate relationship with one another and with Christ. “For Christ is like a single body with its many limbs and organs, which, many as they are, together make up one body. For indeed we were all brought together into one body by baptism, in the Spirit, whether we be Jews or Greeks, whether slaves or free men, and that one Holy Spirit was poured out for all of us to drink” (1 Corinthians 12:12, 13).

This passage says a great deal about the soma, the body in which the Spirit dwells. We propose to mention a few things which we believe to be important for those who love the Lord Jesus Christ.

1. The body of Christ is not composed of sects, denominations or parties. No combination or federation of these into any kind of council or alliance can ever produce the one body. It is possible for man to create a religious organization by a merger of sects but this will not be the body of Christ. “Now you are the body of Christ, and individually members of it” (1 Corinthians 12:27). The limbs or organs of the body are individuals who are joined to Christ as the head.

2. The Holy Spirit never created a sect or faction. Every sect is a work of the flesh, and results from a refusal to be led by the Spirit (Galatians 5:20). The Spirit baptizes only into one body, never into a fragment, splinter or party created by men. Men may try to capture baptism and use it as a portal to a party, but no man can baptize a sincere penitent believer in the Lord into a party. The Spirit will defeat all attempts to restrict, restrain and confine him, and will bring the humble trusting soul into relationship with Jesus.

Men may define baptism in terms of a sectarian sacrament, they may hedge it about with intellectual requirements and impose their own criteria by which to judge its validity, but the Spirit will ignore all such attempts to dictate to God. They mean nothing in the standing of one who “dies with Christ and passes beyond reach of the elemental spirits of the world.” Every person on this earth who surrenders himself unreservedly to Christ and is baptized on the basis of his trust in Jesus as God’s Son and the Messiah, is in the one body. He may be ignorant of many things, and even of some things related to baptism, but his incorporation with Christ is not based upon knowledge, but upon faith.

3. “Christ is like a single body.” “We were all brought together into one body by baptism.” The body of Christ is a historical entity, a community of grace— sharers, a fellowship of the hopeful, which was vitalized by the coming of the Spirit upon Pentecost. That body has never died. The Spirit has never been withdrawn. Indeed it was the promise of Jesus that the Spirit would abide with his disciples throughout the age in which he is absent from the earth.

It is a constantly recurring symptom of human pride that men create movements which they then identify with the one body. The motivations for these vary and many of the ideals are commendatory. Some are attempts to recapture personal holiness and sanctification, some a reemphasis upon the supernatural, some stem from a desire to restore the original faith and order.

The sectarian spirit is very strong and very alluring since it pampers egotism and produces assurance based on the belief that the party is favored by God above all others and is composed of the elect. There have been many restoration movements which crystallized when reformers were driven out of the existing religious framework, and regardless of the special emphasis, almost every one of these has been designated “the Lord’s church,” and has arrogantly disdained association with any of the others.

In every case, as the unity of the Spirit receded from view, and conformity to creedal interpretations came into ascendancy, the tests of loyalty devised would exclude even those who launched the movement and gave their lives in its defense in an earlier day. Of course, none of the debates or arguments engaged in by proponents of such movements have any real relationship to the one body.

The vital principle of each party is the thing which it was created to propose or oppose. It lives, eats, breathes and proclaims this thing. It is this thing which gives the party being and a sense of destiny. It searches the scriptures, prints journals, writes books, and purchases radio time to advance this thing. The party owes its life to this issue. But the vital principle of the one body is the Holy Spirit. Thus God’s word says, “If the Spirit is the source of our life, let the Spirit also direct our course” (Galatians 5:25).

4. The party spirit is always working to divide. It is a manifestation of our lower nature and this nature “sets its desires against the Spirit.” One who is a victim of his lower nature is happy only in an atmosphere of strife and dissension.

He is arrogant, rude, dogmatic and implacable. Because he dethrones God and enthrones self he feels most loyal when he is attacking those who will not bow to his authority. "These are they which set up divisions, sensual men, having not the Spirit" (Jude 19).

The party spirit always seeks to perpetuate divisions which exist. It finds excuses for evading every honest attempt to narrow chasms made wider by the erosion of time. It creates barriers of suspicion, throws up roadblocks of hate, and monotonously repeats the old clichés and slogans which have been used as sedatives for years.

But the Holy Spirit is actively at work always promoting unity, and the Holy Spirit is more powerful than the party spirit. The Holy Spirit is of God and possesses the dynamic of God; the party spirit is of the flesh and possesses the weaknesses of the flesh. The party spirit with its doctrinal fences and creedal iron curtains can contain men only so long, and then the Spirit bursts its bonds and seeks freedom.

As deep calls to deep, so the Spirit in one heart cries out to the Spirit in another heart, and an invisible cord draws their possessors closer to one another. The Spirit transcends all sectarian alliances, for these are based upon artificial or secondary considerations. All of the clay vessels may remain in their own environment but those which contain the Spirit may feel closer together than each does to others on his own shelf.

The community which results from the undeserved kindness of God is not composed of mechanical men or human robots. Its citizens were not stamped out by a cookie cutter like so many gingerbread men. There is a healthy divergency of views, attitudes and insights. They can never be united on the basis of attainment to a certain level of knowledge. The fact is that their oneness stems from the Spirit which dwells within them all. And "there is one Spirit."

5. The unity of the Spirit is absolutely unaffected by racial or social differences. “We were all brought together into one body by baptism, in the Spirit, whether we be Jews or Greeks, whether slaves or free men.” The apostle Paul says “there is no distinction.” Those who make such distinctions do not walk in love. “They are inconsistent and judge by false standards” (James 2:4).

There is no “color problem” among men who are led by the Spirit. Where such a problem does exist it is because men walk after the flesh. To talk about “white churches” and “colored churches” as if Jesus drew a color line at the Lord’s table, is a clear indication that one is not being led of the Spirit. In the body of Christ there is no such thing as black power or white power. There is only the dynamic of the Spirit. Power has no color but the ambition to exercise it may color our whole approach to life.

6. We must not forget that the work of the Spirit does not cease with our introduction into the one body. “That one Holy Spirit was poured out for all of us to drink.” We are refreshed and invigorated by the Spirit and thus sustained in our relationship as a family. Perhaps it is lack of recognition of this which causes so many to become spiritually de-hydrated and to languish by the way.

FELLOWSHIP OF THE SPIRIT

In the wonderful treatise on the body as given in 1 Corinthians 12, there are important lessons for all of us. Of course the subject is spiritual gifts (verse 1) and it is introduced because there were some things of which the apostle did not want them to remain ignorant. Almost the first thing that is affirmed is unity in diversity. There are varieties of gifts, services and forms of work. But these have a common origin and a common purpose. “All these gifts are the work of one and the same Spirit, distributing them separately to each individual at will.”

The members of the body are those in whom the Spirit dwells. They are members in the sense of being limbs and organs, that is, they sustain a vital organic and functional relationship to the body. There is no word in the Greek for member in the sense of belonging to a society or institution. And the word “member” always occurs in conjunction with the word body. The Bible never speaks, for instance, of a “member of the church.” Because we are organs in a body we are all dependent upon each other.

One organ cannot tell another it is not needed. Nor can an individual conclude that because he does not possess the same ability as another he is not of the body. All are in their respective positions by divine appointment. All are to feel the same concern for one another.

We are liable to think of the body in a purely local sense and may conceive of our obligation to the body as limited only to those whom we see at meetings or who have their names on a congregational roster. But God is not so limited in his vision. He views the one body as containing every saved person on earth. If the Spirit dwells in me I am a unit with every other person in the universe in whom the Spirit dwells.

I dare not limit fellowship to the adherents of any one historical movement, or consider that such a movement embraces the ekklesia of God to the exclusion of all others on earth. The brotherhood which I am to love must involve every child of God in the universe, else I am sectarian in heart and mind. I must not treat any of the saints as second-class citizens of the kingdom, for to do so is to flout the work of God. “And if you and we belong to Christ, guaranteed as his and anointed, it is all God’s doing; it is God also who has set his seal upon us, and as a pledge of what is to come has given us the Spirit to dwell in our hearts” (2 Corinthians 1:21, 22).

Two Letters

Mission Messenger (November 1968)

Volume 30

[Abstract]

An ever increasing load of mail brings some interesting letters to our desk. Here is part of one received several months ago from a young brother in a large state university:

I cannot adequately express my joy at having discovered your publication, Mission Messenger. I was so disillusioned with “Church of Christism” that I was thinking seriously of investigating an Episcopal or Presbyterian Church in the hope that I could find some people somewhere who were really interested in solving the problems of today and not in just reiterating the same old line I had heard for years. I feel very similar to the biology student whose words your publication quoted in the January issue. I am a candidate for the Ph.D. degree in history here at _____, and I really have a hard time getting anything out of a church service. I think that now, however, I can see the way a considerable amount clearer than before, thanks to you.

In the very same delivery we found another letter from an older brother who is one of the bishops in an Oklahoma congregation. Here is the introduction to his letter:

Someone sent me your paper and I’ve been reading about these young college people who think they know more than the old faithful gospel preachers who planted the church at a great sacrifice. Well, I’ve been an elder for years and I've got some questions to ask too. If these people are tired of the Lord's church, why don't they get out and go to the denominations? We'd be better off if we got rid of all these critics. Why isn't the word of God good enough to guide us like it always has in the past? Can you tell me just what this college-educated bunch of complainers don't like? I want everyone to know I am satisfied with things just like they are and we ought to be working together to build more churches like we have.

These letters point up an interesting fact. A few years ago I sought to list the areas of tension which present problems in any movement, religious or otherwise. I finally boiled them down to five, one of which is the ever present struggle between youth and age. Without realizing it both are seeking the same ultimate goal, but one believes it can be attained by cutting loose from the past, the other believes it can only come through inflexible defence of the status quo. Both are partly right, and both partly wrong.

Although I am not young I'd like to be a humble instrument in the hand of God to help bridge this and other gaps, because all of us need each other. I know I need the tremendous insights of the brilliant young intellectuals of our day, but I need no less the steadying influence of those who have borne the heat of the day. And since I have so often answered the questions of the collegiate segment I'd like now to answer the questions of my respected elderly brother.

In many respects our younger brethren do know more than those of us who are older proclaimers of the word. They have access to many tools of learning which we did not have. New discoveries in the linguistic field, coupled with new versions and translations of the sacred scriptures, have given them a greater knowledge. Too, we live in an intellectual age which provides a powerful incentive to learning. Some of us grew up in factions where advanced formal education was feared and where it was believed that ignorance was a guardian of the faith.

I am thrilled that we have left the swamps of credulity and crawled out to higher ground and I learn a great deal indeed from earnest and sincere young men and women. Granted that some of their views are impractical and unrealistic, but I've had some peculiar ideas of my own from time to time.

Our younger brethren are not tired of the Lord's church. I think they love it a great deal and that is why they become incensed when we take that noble organism and squeeze and shape it into a narrow partisan mould. Our beloved brother is the victim of our past sectarian thinking which has equated the Lord's church with a particular fragment of a specific restoration movement. The Lord's church is the one body. It is composed of all the saved of all the earth. Every born again person in the world is in it.

Unfortunately, because of our divided and strife-torn condition, many of the Lord's people are scattered over the sectarian world. No one of our factions has gathered them all into its own corral as yet. I do not regard myself as separated from a child of God in "one of the denominations." The brand of love which fills my heart can penetrate any wall, batter down any gate, or soar over any barrier to reach and touch the heart of any of God's children or my brothers. I challenge any sectarian to plant a thicket which my faith cannot pierce.

I'm sure we would not be better off if we drove out those members of the family who are dissenters. God loves all of his children like I do mine and my love does not operate for my loved ones only when they agree with me. Actually, we need critics more than we need yes-men and sycophants. I would not want to see any of my brethren leave, although I will not hate those who do.

The word of God is good enough to guide us, but it is too good to guide us as we have been guided in the past. Actually we have not been guided by it. For example, nothing is clearer in God's word than that division in God's family is a sin, a work of the flesh, and a badge of carnality and immaturity. Yet we could not be more divided if God's word had commanded it. We have not really been guided by God's word but by a system we have devised and contrived by scrapping the Bible for prooftexts for what we already believe and do. Brethren are beginning to see this and revolt against the deceit in it.

I am not sure that I can tell our aged brother all of the things that "the college educated bunch of complainers" do not like, but I have talked with many of our younger brethren and have some idea of the things which cause them deep concern. Probably a lot of them are like the rest of us, they can tell what's wrong a lot easier than they can tell how to correct it. I think there is a general revolt against the following attitudes.

1. The pre-occupation with matters of secondary importance and the exaltation of partisan issues above the welfare of human beings for whom Jesus died. There is a feeling that man is not only worth more than a sheep, or many sparrows, as Jesus plainly taught, but that he is also worth more than any idea about the millennium, cups, classes or colleges.

2. The arrogance of clericalism which projects one man as the official spokesman for the congregation while silencing others who have proven themselves capable in the educational and professional world but who are never invited to share their convictions publicly before the saints. There is growing contempt for that kind of hypocrisy which pretends that we do not have a professional clergy when actually we are more clergy-dominated than almost any other group in our contemporary society.

3. The assumption of our infallibility in the interpretation of the holy scriptures, resulting in dogmatic and authoritarian unwritten creeds which may never be questioned.

4. The studied refusal to take a positive stand upon those important problems which threaten the world of mankind, such as the population explosion, birth control, racial inequity, hunger and famine, under the guise that human concern is a God-denying social gospel.

5. The hypocrisy involved in making it appear that we have no partisan power structures to restrict or restrain brethren, but all are free under God to serve him without fear of journalistic attack or reprisal.

6. The unwarranted equation of the historic restoration movement with the one body and the conclusion that no one can be saved outside of one of our factions or splinters and that all of God's sheep are found securely hiding behind our barbed wire fences.

7. The scrapping of scriptural texts and the picking through the Word, selecting isolated passages, to create a system, with the consequent quoting of the same texts to validate and defend that system so devised as the will of God. It is this to which many refer as Church of Christism.

8. The closed door policy toward meaningful dialogue with other sincere students of God's Word, and even with brethren in other segments of the restoration movement. This attitude promoted under the banner of loyalty to Christ is recognized for what it is— a conceited view of our own place in God's world program and a fear of what direct encounter on all theological fronts will do to some of our cherished traditions.

9. The intrusion of censorship groups into the personal lives and even into the reading habits of the individual saints and the judging of their fidelity to Christ by the brotherhood journals or literature to which they subscribe. The utter abrogation of freedom in Christ by a clerical caste or a presbytery which regards itself as a divine bureaucratic police force over God's other children is deplored.

10. The vanity which exhibits itself in some who have majored in Bible and who conclude that this makes them experts in all other fields, including science, psychology and behavioral patterns, and which betrays them into making authoritative pronouncements in those areas where they are utterly lacking in both research and training.

Whether we are justly criticized in all of these areas we must allow each reader to form his own conclusion. In this article I am seeking only to list the complaints as requested. I suspect our aged brother reacted too strongly and I doubt that any of us are "satisfied with things just like they are." But whether we are or not, we are going to see great changes. The lines we have drawn in the past are losing their relevance in a new day and in a different world.

The gentle rays of the Sun of righteousness are thawing the icy hearts of bitter partisans, the healing of his wings will act as balm to the rents and wounds we have made in his body through our misguided zeal. If our good brother cannot stand to see fellowship transcend our sectarian attitude he will be sad indeed, for such a time is fast approaching. Already the partisan categories of yesterday grate upon the ears of the saints and the Spirit is purging our hearts and purifying our speech.

And I urge our young brother who is majoring in history not to defect. He will not better himself in this age of thought ferment and he may surrender a great many values for which he and his newly-found associates will some day be reaching. I am here to stay, an imperfect person among an imperfect people. My consolation in my own weakness is that my hope does not rest on one's perfect knowledge but upon knowledge of the Perfect One. Don't count me out as long as he counts me in!

The Moral Being

Mission Messenger (November 1968)

Volume 30

[Abstract]

A moral act is not an act in obedience to an external law, human or divine, it is the inner law of our true being, of our essential or created nature, which demands that we actualize what follows from it.— Paul Tillich in “Morality and Beyond,” page 20.

That man, by his very nature, is a moral being, seems to be a proposition which will evoke little dispute. His nature endows him with rational powers, and the exercise of these powers leads to the development of an idea concept that there is a law, or rule of action, a principle within the human self, to which he is obligated. The function of the intellect in that realm which we call conscience “endorses the existence of such a law, for there is something which condemns or excuses their actions,” as the apostle Paul states it.

It is this innate principle which produces a sense of moral obligation, or oughtness as it is sometimes called. The Greeks had a word for it— dei— and they applied it especially to the constraint which arose from relationship to the divine. But since it involves the nature of man as a rational being it is a concept as universal as mankind. There is no nation or tribe without its ideas of right and wrong. All men have some sense of the fitness of certain actions and of the obligation to perform those actions.

This idea of moral obligation is not subject to definition because it is an initial idea arising from the simple exercise of the rational powers, and being primary, there are no simpler terms into which one can break it down, and define it. The universal idea of oughtness exists even in the minds of the most primitive peoples and we cannot go back beyond it to employ simpler word images to explain it.

Obviously, in cultures which we refer to as uncivilized, although this is a relative term, the sense of oughtness often gives rise to superstitions and taboos, but this is no argument against the validity of moral obligation. It rather enforces the fact that this obligation is powerful, even in the untutored mind and produces a corresponding sense of responsibility to a force superior to the person, and even to the community of persons.

Since man is a moral agent, and thus under moral obligation, it is essential to his development of true selfhood that he understand the conditions imposed upon him by virtue of the rationality of his being. Moral agency grows out of the fact that man cannot only conceive of the fitness or impropriety of certain actions, but that he can choose to perform what his conscience endorses as right. He possesses will and through it he can act voluntarily.

I do not like to employ the term “free will,” which is so current in the language of systematic theology. It appears to me that the word “free” is redundant. The very power to will implies, and I think, even necessitates freedom to choose or elect, and freedom to act in accordance or conformity with that choice.

Moral obligation, then, is first the obligation to choose an ultimate end of life as the highest good in the universe. To aim below this potential, or to fall beneath it by voluntary action, is immoral. Mediocrity by choice or neglect (which is actually choice), is immorality, because it consists of taking the powers provided for the achievement of the highest good, the divine plan for one's life, and wasting them upon that which provides only momentary pleasure or ease.

We have no trouble in seeing that the expenditure of sexual potency in prostitution falls within this category, but we forget that there can be also a prostitution of talents or abilities. One can "waste his substance in riotous living" without spending it on harlots. Immorality is not limited to sexual exploitation.

The obligation to choose the ultimate end which will work for the highest good is always accompanied by a correlative obligation which is just as imperative, that is, the choice of the necessary means by which to obtain that end. The means by which the ultimate purpose can be achieved is holiness, or sanctification. It is the deliberate choice of the disciplined life.

It will at once be ascertained that man cannot be made a moral being by law or statute. He cannot become such by imposition of authority from without. It is true that such authority can enact, and if powerful enough, can enforce, guidelines for social conduct, that is, rules to govern man in his relationship to and dealings with his fellowbeings. But neither the rules nor the subservience to the authority which imposes them can make one a moral being.

Man possesses intellect and sensibility, the power of knowing and feeling. As a conscious being he knows that he knows, and he knows that he feels. Consciousness is the mind in the act of knowing itself. But man is also conscious that he is free. He knows that as a moral agent he has the right, and also possesses the freedom to choose. He may deny this, or speculate that it is not so, but this will not alter the fact of his own consciousness.

Man may seek to convince himself and to influence others to think that he is not free because of environmental or other factors. These do not abrogate his moral freedom. They only produce consequences from which he shrinks if he makes a certain choice. It is not that he does not have the choice but that he does not want to pay the price which its exercise will require.

One knows that he is free exactly as he knows that he is, and it is this nature of which he is conscious that makes him a moral agent. Thus no man, who is not deranged, can ever be wholly unaccountable. Moral agency produces responsibility and responsibility demands accountability. Degrees of responsibility exist and these determine the extent of accountability but they do not deny the fact of it.

Any religion which attempts to make man be good, according to its definition of good, by authoritarian pronouncement, is doomed to failure. In making man conform by such a method it destroys him as a man. If you could inject a serum which would deprive a person of all knowledge of evil and all desire or inclination for it, you would make him good, but he would be a good machine, and not a good man. It is precisely because tension exists and we feel the tug of it that we are moral beings.

When Karl Marx wrote in his "Critique of the Hegelian Philosophy of Right," in 1844, that, "religion is the opium of the people," there was a great deal of truth in the statement. No one with a knowledge of history can deny that religion has often been used to stupefy the masses so they could be used and manipulated for unworthy ends. Cruel and senseless wars have often been fought in the name of religion which were in reality attempts of political factions to gain supremacy. Russia furnishes a good example.

But the freedom for which Christ set us free is not an opiate. It is a stimulant to the best that lies within. It is an eye-opener. Under its influence I can see clearly and it is in the full beam of this light I reject the dialectical materialism of Karl Marx, and choose the "spiritual dialectic" of Jesus of Nazareth as the basis of my hope here and hereafter!

“He that hath this hope purifieth himself even as he is pure.” When I make my decision for Jesus I include in that decision all that goes with it, and that includes striving for his likeness.

The Spirit and Liberty

Mission Messenger (December 1968)

Volume 30

[Abstract]

Perhaps no other journalistic ability should be coveted quite so much as that which would enable one to portray the relation of the Spirit of God to the community of saints when the believers were first welded into one body by this divine Agent. More than nineteen receding centuries have subjected the majestic dream of heaven to the abrasive action of human stubbornness and the corrosive attitude of human reasoning, and now the vital pulsating faith which drove men on to almost incredible conquests seems but a faint whisper from a faraway yesterday. But it was real!

The company of the reconciled ones lived in the Spirit, walked in the Spirit and rejoiced in the Spirit. Apart from the Spirit they would have been helpless, a mere coalition of men set free to wallow in a sea of indecision and insecurity. But in the Spirit they were fearless and powerful and “more than conquerors.” Once they had not been a people. Now they were the people of God. And to be “the people” is the most important thing in the universe when they are the people of God.

The people of God are more than a mere group of individuals who believe in God, or who acknowledge that he is the creator and benefactor of the world. They are God at work in his world, actively affecting it according to his ultimate design. They are the salt which preserves, the light which penetrates, and the heaven which permeates. They are the temple of God, not as a shrine to be venerated by men who come to it, but as a living vehicle to take God to men. God dwells in them through the Spirit.

One of their number prayed in their behalf in these words, "As you live this new life, we pray that you will be strengthened from God's boundless resources, so that you will find yourselves able to pass through any experience and endure it with joy." They experienced persecution of every kind. Their houses were entered, their possessions stolen, and their property destroyed. They were arrested, humiliated, imprisoned and beaten. But they drew upon the boundless resources and their joy was undimmed.

They had come to know "how tremendous is the power available to us who believe in God. That power is the same divine energy which was demonstrated in Christ when he raised him from the dead." Seldom indeed do we think of tremendous power as available unto us. We are occupied in printing programs, preparing brochures, and designing advertisements which we hope will catch jaded eyes and entice tired hearts. In a world of clever propaganda we have been seduced into believing that if we can just get the right set of words and phrases, they will act as a magnet and reluctant souls will inevitably be drawn into our systems.

And we must work constantly to keep our dynamos in repair, oiled and running smoothly. For when there is no power from above we must generate our own. And this means that we must have our plants clean and sanitary, meeting the requirements of the city inspection. We must give attention to the liturgy and ritual for the timing must be perfect. The hand of the clock rather than the hand of God must determine when the "Amen" is pronounced.

The workmen who man the machinery must be trained.

There must be no sabotage through ignorance or inefficiency. The co-ordinator must check everything in the weekly movement of the body, for a body which functions but once per week may be rheumatic, stolid, and dull of senses. A body which has no power within itself must create a power structure which is of it and yet outside of it, and which can supply the power lacking in the organism. It is like a man who carries a battery in his coat pocket with wires running into his heart to keep it palpitating in rhythm.

It would help us, I think if we could bring ourselves to be absolutely frank and honest, and admit that the structure which we have created is dead. Of course this is very difficult to do and probably we will never arrive at the point where we are that objective. We have so long equated our own creation with the creation of God which cannot die, that to admit our own structure is dead would seem almost like accusing God of failure. And this is unthinkable, for God could not accomplish his purpose without us.

Too, we like to deceive ourselves. It is easier to live in a realm of dreams and fantasy. None of us want to be jerked rudely back into a world of reality. We point to our spasmodic muscle twitches and to our blinking eyelids and urge that the body is alive. But the truth is that the lungs expand and contract by artificial respiration. The system provides for one who has taken a course in lifesaving to breathe down our throats, but the life really is not that of the body at all. It is the life of the system. When the system cannot supply "a breather" the body expires.

In such a state we must develop projects, crusades and movements. There must be rally days and spiritual emphasis weeks. Because we mistake mass enthusiasm for the dynamic of God we mill around and congratulate one another on our success and assure ourselves that God is with us. In our frustration we know that we cannot overcome the world so we create a little universe of our own to attack. In this lilliputian world every anthill becomes a mountain and we go on a binge of attacking first one and then another as if it were the last great stronghold of Satan.

The congregation is whipped into a fever pitch. Tracts are distributed, fears are aroused, and whatever the hated thing may be it can be seen leering from behind the most innocent-looking objects. A few weeks of high pressure campaigning and the fervor subsides. The gallant knights hang up their armor and start nodding in the pews again. The leaders of the host start reading Time magazine and the third class mail to determine from what direction the next dragon is approaching. And the devil smirks in glee that the energies have been expended upon a phantom. The world makes no record of the skirmish in its annals.

LEAVING OUR NETS

Is there no hope? A great many who are disillusioned and pessimistic answer in the negative. But to say there is no hope is to say that there is no true child of God left upon earth. Wherever there is such a person there is hope, because hope is there. Hope dwells in sons of God. There is no such thing as a son of God without hope. This is the real difference between the children of light and the children of darkness. The latter are hopeless! "We were saved by this hope, but in our moments of impatience, let us remember that hope always means waiting for something that we do not yet possess."

In spite of all the horror and despair which exists upon many parts of our globe I must confess that I know no sense of despondency. I have come to appreciate the words of the apostle, "We are handicapped on all sides, but we are never frustrated; we are puzzled, but never in despair. We are persecuted, but we never have to stand it alone; we may be knocked down, but we are never knocked out!" And I can also acknowledge the validity of the statement, “Every day we experience something of the death of Jesus, so that we may also know the power of the life of Jesus in these bodies of ours.”

But what can we do? The answer is quite simple. We must leave our nets and follow Jesus. This is what he said. What are our nets? Obviously they are the things with which we have been fishing. They are the things in which we have trusted for our security, our support, our success and our welfare. But have we not heard the call of Jesus? Of course we have, but we brought our nets along. We were not ready to trust in his power so we have lugged along the schemes and methods that we used in the world to build up powerful organizations and corporations. And we have reasoned that by employing these same means we could build a strong organization to “sell Jesus” to the world. Jesus was our product! We were to promote him!

We succeeded in building up the structure. We constructed the plant. We organized it, installed the machinery, and created the auxiliary institutions to supply material and manpower, including the trained personnel. We now have sprawling institutions and trust funds to sustain them. But we overlooked one thing. You cannot “sell Jesus” to the world. Jesus is not for sale. So here we are caught in our own trap. We have the latest scientific nets, the most powerful propulsion machinery to eject them into the teeming sea of humanity, and the most elaborate winches to draw them back into our shores.

But where is Jesus? He is still passing by and saying, “Leave your nets and follow me!” There is every indication that his voice is being heard. The clanking and the clanging of our machinery cannot drown it out. The roar of the breakers cannot stifle it. It is not lost amidst the raucous calls of the peddlers nor amidst the cries for power tinged by color or tainted by creed.

Men and women who are weary of pouring time and money and effort into machines which isolate them from Jesus even while making the claim that they exist to lead others to him, are leaving their nets. They have heard the call anew. They want to be close to Him. It is easier to carry a cross if you are going somewhere— even to Calvary— than to turn the crank of a merry-go-round day after day until you drop in the same track where you started.

Our task is to recover for our generation the sense of closeness to God which results from a recognition of the power and purpose of the Holy Spirit. There must come again the feeling of urgency and destiny. The expectancy of the coming of our Lord must give meaning to what transpires in our world and in our lives. We must stop tinkering with gadgets and gimmicks to allure and entice, so that we may say as did one of yesterday, “Our only object was to help you to live lives worthy of the God who has called you to share the splendor of his own kingdom.”

POWER OF THE SPIRIT

Let us consider what the Spirit did for that host of believers who first set out to take possession of the world in the name of Jesus Christ. If we knew what their secret was perhaps we could lay hold upon it and claim its blessings and benefits in our own lives.

1. The believers who were incorporate in Christ Jesus were granted strength and power through the Spirit in their inner being, out of the treasures of God’s glory (Ephesians 3:16). The vast resources of heaven constituted a depository upon which they could draw in order to face any emergency and do so unflinchingly. They were scourged, stoned and subjected to imprisonment. Death stalked their steps by day and by night, but they faced it without fear.

We are afraid of dying because we do not know how to die. And the reason we do not know how to die is because we do not know how to live. When we have something worth living for, we will have something worth dying for. If we live dangerously we can die dramatically. Both life and death will be an adventure in which we can glorify Christ. The design of the Spirit makes every act of life a curtain call, and the final one is the key which gives meaning to all of the rest.

2. It was through the Spirit that the saints overpowered and overcame the temptations of the flesh. There are some habits and inclinations which render men powerless in their grip. They are prisoners under the law that is in their members, slaves to the law of sin. Their very struggles to overcome add to the pain of their predicament as one in handcuffs cuts his wrists to the bone by straining and tugging at his fetters.

In such an emergency the Spirit can provide freedom by killing or destroying the frightful desires and urges which drive men onward to the brink of despair and destruction. “It follows, my friends, that our lower nature has no claim upon us; we are not obliged to live on that level. If you do so, you must die. But if by the Spirit you put to death all the base pursuits of the body, then you will live” (Romans 12:13). The Spirit is the deliverer who slays the great red dragon which holds us captive inside the castle of our own body.

3. The Spirit makes possible a life on an altogether different level for those in the flesh. It lifts men from the cave to the penthouse. Those who flounder through the swamps of sin, exposed to every moral malady bred in such a miasma, are elevated to the peaks of the mountains of faith. Here they can breathe the life-giving oxygen of the higher realms.

“Those who live on the level of our lower nature have their outlook formed by it, and that spells death; but those who live on the level of the Spirit have the spiritual outlook, and that is life and peace. For the outlook of the lower nature is enmity with God . . . those who live on such a level cannot possibly please God. But that is not how you live. You are on the spiritual level, if only God's Spirit dwells within you" (Romans 8:5-9).

4. The believer who is declared guiltless before God upon the basis of his trust in Jesus Christ is allowed to enter the sphere of God's grace. Here he is introduced to a whole new set of values created by this transcendent spiritual relationship. By reconciliation he achieved a state of harmony with God where his being is attuned to the vibrations of the divine, so there is no discord. This is designated "peace with God." The apostle puts it thus, "Through him we have confidently entered into this new relationship of grace, and here we take our stand, in happy certainty of the glorious things he has for us in the future" (Romans 5:1, 2).

The thing that sets the Christian apart is his confidence, his happy certainty. He knows what the ultimate future holds, because he knows Him who holds the future. And because he knows this he can meet his current condition without wrath and doubting. He endures present sufferings, because suffering trains in endurance, and endurance develops a mature character, which produces a steady hope. "Such a hope is no mockery because God's love has flooded our inmost heart through the Holy Spirit he has given us."

The Holy Spirit breaks up the dams and barriers, and overflows the heart with the love which is God's essence or nature. This enables us to love all men without regard to color, creed, ethnic or cultural background. We can love our enemies. We can pray for our persecutors. In short, we can love like God loves. "Though God has never been seen by any man, God himself dwells in us if we love one another; his love is brought to perfection within us" (1 John 4:12).

5. The Spirit articulates our deepest yearnings, translating them into the language of heaven. In spite of the tremendous advancements made in the realm of communications and of the multiplied thousands of words appearing in our dictionaries, we realize that the sound combinations which we verbalize are always too limited. We are continually adopting and adapting new words to convey our sentiments in interpersonal relationships.

Hidden within our spirits are longings which struggle to rise to the surface and clothe themselves in expression. But we are weak and helpless as we confront our own frustrations. We want to be free to soar toward the infinite but we are held back by the skeins of habit and environment which hold us imprisoned in a backlash of the flesh. The indwelling Spirit cuts the red tape and breaks the sound barrier for us. He decodes our groans and translates them into words which appear on the news-tickers of glory where all is made plain.

This service is available only to the saints. Only these have their directional finders beamed toward heaven. The Spirit does not force the longing upon those who have no feeling for God. "In the same way the Spirit comes to the aid of our weakness. We do not even know how we ought to pray, but through our inarticulate groans the Spirit himself is pleading for us, and God who searches our inmost being knows what the Spirit means, because he pleads for God's own people in God's own way."

We conclude by saying that our life in Christ is dependent upon our relationship with the Spirit through faith. If we have not the Spirit we are none of His. Power is available to us, power that will make us more than conquerors. We can rise above the bigotry and sterility of the sect and party only as we are led of the Spirit. We pray for all of our readers that you will be spiritually vital. May your lives be real!

Throwing Down Error

Mission Messenger (December 1968)

Volume 30

[Abstract]

Recently a fellow-editor in Texas wrote an editorial entitled, “Undenominational Christianity,” in which he demonstrated a different spirit than he sometimes manifests. People who are sick of the narrow image of the ekklesia as frequently projected by orthodox journalists hail such declarations with delight. I join them in commending the general attitude expressed by our brother.

However, I confess to being a bit wary at predicting any tremendous result, knowing as I do that future articles may express a complete reversal of policy, and realizing how often hopes have been dashed in the past. It is evident that a growing number of our brethren would like to have the world believe that they are more open and charitable than they have been in years gone by, but “when the chips are down,” they reveal the same sectarian spirit as always.

Even in the most encouraging statements there is frequently concealed a barbed hook, so that what appears to be a noble and forthright declaration may be interpreted so as to reassure the establishment if some of the old guard of the party express undue concern over the liberality shown. The real hard fact is that these brethren equate the particular segment of the restoration movement with which they are identified as the one holy, apostolic and catholic church of God upon earth, and no one is a part of the ekklesia who is not affiliated with this party. They are exclusively “the Lord’s church,” and everyone else is on the outside looking in.

The article to which I allude concludes with this paragraph. “The one common denominator of all groups is Jesus Christ. Upon him they can unite. On no other basis is unity possible. When we turn down Jesus, there is no other to whom we can go. He alone has the words of life. Upon him, and upon his teachings we can unite. When each has thrown down what error he may have possessed and embraced the truth his brother has been able to show him, we will have pulled down all the strongholds of sectarianism that exalts itself against the knowledge of God, and will have undenominational Christianity.”

Before our brethren accept such statements as the precursor of a brighter day we urge them to ask a few questions. In this instance there is a concealed “booby-trap” and when it is uncovered it will be seen that our brother is offering absolutely nothing new or relevant in the current unity dialogue. Instead he is advancing once more the same divisive principle which fragmented us originally and has perpetuated our shameful and sinful schisms for a century.

In new language, dressed up for the occasion, he is simply predicating unity upon conformity. The statement, “When each has thrown down what error he may have possessed and embraced the truth his brother has been able to show him,” is as loaded as a Gatling gun.

Does our brother affirm that he has proper understanding and is absolutely free from error? If not, is he in the fellowship with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ? If he is in that fellowship in his ignorance and error, does God endorse his ignorance and condone his error by receiving him into his fellowship? Is there any person on this earth in the fellowship of God who is not possessed of some error? If one does not need to “throw down what error he may have possessed” as a condition of entering the fellowship of God, on what ground does one assert he must throw it down to be received into the fellowship of men?

God is free from all error, and if he can in such an exalted state, receive an editor who is possessed of error, why can that editor not receive others in the same condition? I deny that freedom from error is a condition of fellowship among fallible and finite men. I have never been in the fellowship with any man on earth who was free from error. All the brethren I know are brethren in error. If one thinks he is not, he is the worst mistaken of the lot.

Of course our brother would not deny that he is in the fellowship with brethren in error, but he would point out that they are not in error where it really counts, that is, on those items which have been selected from the error heap, and given primacy by the party, being elevated to tests of union and communion. This is what promotes division. Every faction and sect exercises selectivity in the field of errors, but whatever is made a test of partisanship thereupon becomes a matter of life and death. If you are wrong about that thing you “turn down Jesus.”

Let us be specific. We need to get away from glittering generalities and get right down to the nitty-gritty of our problems. Does our brother hold that a child of God who sincerely loves Jesus but can see no harm in using instrumental music has turned down Jesus? Does he believe that a saint who honestly interprets the scriptures to teach the pre-millennial coming of our Lord has turned down Jesus? Or, would he hold that all pre-millennial brethren were dishonest? Will he make an honest opinion about music or the millennium a test of fellowship and divide the body of Christ over either view?

How much error can one hold and still be in the fellowship? Has our brother changed his mind about anything in the past ten years? If not, he has not learned anything. If he has then he was in error ten years ago. Were the brethren with whom he was affiliated guilty of sin by receiving him before he threw down “what error he may have possessed?” Who determines the degree of error at which one ceases to be received of God? Who is the official interpreter and the infallible arbiter who decides what is error on every point?

Any person who makes freedom from error the basis of unity can never make Jesus the common denominator for oneness. Freedom from error is the result of the rational faculties exercising themselves in research in an attempt to arrive at the truth. Belief in Jesus is the response of the heart to testimony related to historical facts. When you substitute knowledge of propositions for faith in a person, as the basis of unity you become a schismatic, and you are divisive and disruptive. If a person is right about Jesus, he can be wrong about a lot of things and still be saved; if he is wrong about Jesus he can be right about everything else and still be lost.

Let us be fair with struggling mankind. Let us renounce all guile. Let us tell it as it is! Our brother talks about the “desire to translate into reality all of the talk we engage in about unity.” That is a laudable ambition. The place to start is with a firm resolution to quit playing God with the consciences of other men. We will be a long way on the road to unity when we make nothing a test of fellowship which God has not made a condition of salvation.

In one respect the problem is quite simple. All we need to do to exhibit our unity is simply to welcome and receive all whom God has received, and on the same basis that He has received them. If God receives people before they “throw down what error they may have possessed,” let us not judge God, but let us follow His example. Freedom from error is not a condition of entering heaven or none of us would ever make it. It is your attitude toward truth, and not how much of this precious commodity you have at any given time which determines your worth.

When one is in Jesus he is in the truth, for Jesus is the way, the truth and the life. It is not that such a person has the truth on every matter, but the truth has him, caught up in a divine-human relationship because of grace. One who trusts in Jesus obligates himself to accept all truth as it becomes known to him. He will not deny any truth for he loves truth for truth's sake. But it is being in Christ that makes fellowship possible and not being in "the know" on every point of theological doctrine or deduction. Until we admit this we will continue to be the advance agents of schism and strife.

We have now reached the close of another year, and we shall make use of that fact to lean upon this milestone and chat informally with the beloved friends who make up our family of readers. The family circle is larger than it has ever been before, and we have been privileged to welcome a number of new names this year. For this we are grateful to the Father of us all.

Our expenses have climbed ever higher, and it costs much more than a dollar per year to send out each paper. Some of the brethren, good businessmen, have urged us to raise the price to two dollars. They tell us that we would not lose a single subscriber who really reads the paper. Perhaps they are right, but we shall keep it at one dollar. I cannot keep from thinking of the young men and women in college who can use that extra dollar for a meal in the cafeteria.

We are again ending the season with all of our bills paid. This is made possible because each month, our brothers and sisters who act as volunteer rope-holders send in what they can spare to help us. Many of them are sick and tired of turning their money over to the institutional church to build up a sectarian image, while damning all other honest believers. And whether the amount they send is large or small, Nell and I put it all in the fund to send forth the good news of peace on this old earth to men of good will. In thirty years we have never taken a cent of this money to spend on ourselves.

I suspect that I am a little peculiar for this age. I have never set a fee or specified an amount for my services. I simply go if I can and if I think it will be to His glory. I trust Him to work it out. Not too many months back I went to the west coast at the earnest solicitation of brethren who thought my presence would lend strength to a meeting. I spoke three times to large crowds and conducted two very lengthy question sessions. The check they handed me was exactly $75.00 less than my round-trip fare. When I arrived home I deposited it in the bank. The same day I got a letter from a brother in the east saying that he felt an urge to help us in our work. There was a $75.00 check in the envelope. I do not try to explain things like that. But He never fails to work it out somehow and I just keep on in absolute faith that He knows and understands and works through the brethren whom I love.

One thing that helps, I guess, is that we are old enough now that we can see that there are a lot of things that money cannot buy, so we have deliberately ordered our lives along simple lines. We do not even have a television set. This represents no prejudice against television, but we live very busy lives, working many hours each day. When I am at home, which is not too much, we have more than we can do, and when I am away Nell bears the burden of it all. I have no secretary. I answer all of the letters with my own hand. But you can see that our personal overhead is not too great.

That is enough about personal matters except to say that it always thrills us when any of our readers take time to sit down and write us about their views, their families, their problems and their work. We like to hear about your children and grandchildren. Most of all I am always glad to hear from the college kids. A great many of them are terrific thinkers and I learn a lot from them. I have never seen such frankness and honesty as they exhibit in our day. I am not at all frightened because they think for themselves. I would be sorry if they did not. They are a real challenge to me!

Perhaps we'd better talk a little about our future. Our series next year will be entitled "Commandoes for Christ." We would like, if our God wills, to deal very realistically with the problem of how we can bring the weight of spiritual armament to bear upon the real enemy at our gates today. Many of our methods belong to a time when we were a frontier people or a rural society. To continue to use them in the hope that they will again become effective is like shooting a blunderbuss at a nuclear bomb.

There must come a complete revolution in our concept of ministry, and in our relationship to structures and centers of influence. We can no longer flatter ourselves that we are winning the war. We become more of a minority with each tick of the clock. All of us are resistant to change and this is especially true when we confuse what we have concocted with what God has created. So some of what I will write will not be popular. It will be written in a prophetic strain and prophets are not always welcomed with open arms. But that is all right, for we will love those who disagree as much as we do those who concur with us.

We may be looked at askance because it is our aim to present an occasional article from a brother who is "different." We will print such articles not because we agree with them, but precisely because we do not. If conditions warrant we may express our views in connection with such articles. We hold that honest dissent is wholesome. It should be encouraged rather than stifled. This does not mean that we will publish diatribes sent in by those who have a partisan or factional axe to grind, but we want to give room for those who differ with us to be heard in the family circle once in awhile.

Those of our readers whose blood pressure will not allow them to read after those who differ can always ask for their subscription price to be returned. We will cheerfully refund it with no questions asked. There are still some who think that the editor should be the supreme judge of all the earth and throw out everything that does not repeat the party slogans. Our position is that none of us have all of the answers and we ought to listen to one another. We are not editing an orthodox party organ and we have no vested interests to protect. When you have nothing to lose but your soul you can afford to be more adventuresome. It is nice to know that only death can “fire” you.

I think it is very difficult for most of the brethren to realize that we are not running a journal for either the “liberal” or “conservative” restoration establishment. We are not the official spokesmen for any school of thought, or for any school that doesn’t think! The fact is that no one among our brethren can really define “a liberal” any more. They have used the term to apply to everyone from one end of our sectarian spectrum to another. One man’s liberal is another man’s conservative.

If I have learned anything, it is that, according to our partisan jargon, one is not a liberal or conservative because of where he stands, but because of where you stand as you look at him. A person who is left of one is right of another. So it is a little silly to stand around and exchange meaningless epithets. It would be an interesting experiment to get all of our folks together and ask them to draw up a document listing all of the views that make one a liberal. I think a good working definition for a lot of them is, “A liberal is one who knows more than I do about a subject, a conservative is one who knows less.”

I have said all of this to lead up to the statement that I will allow each man to stand upon his own merits. I will judge what he says each time by God’s word, as I understand it, but I will not condemn it ahead of time because someone has placed him in a partisan stereotype. I no longer fit any pigeonhole, and I shall not cram others into one.

Forgive me for saying that to me there is really nothing more stale than the fare regularly dished up in some of the brotherhood journals that I read. In some of them there is not one thing said which touches life as we have to live it. Our good brethren are going around and around on the partisan treadmill, answering questions no one is asking. Many of the “sound” brethren in all of our factions are frightfully out of touch with life. They are unfortunately consecrated to the ignoble task of perpetuating prejudice and patching up partisan parapets in a world that is coming unglued and falling to staves. It is a sad commentary that most of the world beyond the Texas border does not even know that “the fastest growing church” is in town. And there is a fairly good sized chunk of the world outside of the Lone Star state.

I am not saying that Mission Messenger is a shining example of relevant journalism. I have no illusions about it and recognize that ours is a feeble attempt to face up realistically to some of our problems. But there is one thing this paper will not become and that is a narrow exclusivistic propaganda piece for any party. We will not use it to promote hatred against any of God’s dear children.

When I write like this, I always get a few letters from brethren who are experts in the field of communication, and who express the thought that such articles as this are “countrified” rather than dignified. I suspect that they are right. But my heart is in the country while my feet pound city pavements. And I would rather visit than write. Since I cannot see all of you personally I do trust that God will bless all of you and give you strength to serve. I also pray that the series of articles for 1969 will help us all to walk honestly before our God.

Commandoes for Christ

Mission Messenger (January 1969)

[Abstract]

If there is any period one would desire to be born in, is it not the age of revolution, when the old and the new stand side by side and admit of being compared; when the energies of all men are searched by fear and hope; when the historic glories of the old can be compensated by the rich possibilities of the new era? The time, like all times, is a very good one if we know what to do with it.—
Ralph Waldo Emerson.

Commandoes for Christ! This will be our theme for a year. You will have to read what we write for several months before the appropriateness of the title can be really seen. We will not say all that should be said on the subject, but we will speak frankly and positively about those aspects which we do cover. We expect to make our meaning clear and plain. We shall pull no punches.

I confess freely that I am motivated by a sense of inner urgency, impelled by a fire which burns within my bones. I have examined my heart to be certain that what I say will be but an outburst of passion for the Lord, and not the clamoring for expression of some baser desire. I write because I must do so, for if I do not write I can no longer live with myself and I would not dare face Him in the great by-and-by.

Some of what I say will appear revolutionary. It is intended to do so. We cannot continue to mill around inside of our partisan enclosures, shielded from the very world which we are expected to penetrate and assault, and truly be the people of God. We must tear the blindfolds from our eyes and strip the masks from our faces. We must give up our clever little sectarian ruses and sly little stratagems by which we deceive ourselves into thinking that we are something, when we are nothing!

Any illusion that we are conquering the world for Christ must melt away in the glare of reality. We are losing the battle. After nineteen long centuries we are becoming an ever growing minority. Even the “numbers game” which we have adroitly played by manipulating statistics only serves to show the widening gap between those who are born once and those who are born again.

It was not intended to be thus. The host was to be “fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners.” The language employed in the inception of the heavenly invasion of our earthly domain was military language, studded with such words as fighting, victory and triumph. The soldiers of Christ were to be “more than conquerors.”

There was to be discipline, hardship, suffering and endurance. We were to grapple with the foe in hand-to-hand combat, swinging the sword while climbing over alien parapets. There was to be blood on our armor but glory in our eyes. We were to share in the Great Adventure, pressing back the enemy under the leadership of the Prince, singing as we went, “Where He leads me I will follow!”

But, somewhere along the line the bold endeavor came to a grinding halt, except for an occasional sally or skirmish. The minions of the Enemy infiltrated our ranks and convinced us that we should withdraw from the combat zone and build fortresses into which we could retire and find safety and security. We became imbued with the idea that we must hold our own and save the truth, by shielding it from exposure.

It was no longer a matter of coming together to repair our armor and to lick our wounds. The armor was hung up in the arsenal and the only wounds we received were the unkind cuts given by our fellows in the mess-hall. We now have an army top-heavy with those who do not want to fight. They will desert before they will go to the battlefield. They enlisted for the entertainment provided at our weekly bivouac and for the pension at the culmination of the term of service.

If there is any fighting to be done it must be carried out by trained mercenaries, men who want to make a career out of defence of the status quo, and who study the use of the sword primarily as a fencing weapon. A great part of the taxation must be spent upon their upkeep, providing a salary for their administration of company policy, officer's quarters for the comfort of themselves and their families, and vehicles for their use in carrying out the responsibility abdicated by others. There must be an office at the base headquarters, not a field office with a dirt floor in emergency facilities, but an air-conditioned room with soft rug and matching furniture. And there must be provision for stamps and stationery, and for the printing of the weekly agenda of sacred services and entertainment features for the troops.

The result is that we are victimized by our own creation, slaves to a system which we have developed, and which now dominates our lives. The tragedy is that we confuse this with that for which he agonized at Golgotha, and drive ourselves to perpetuate it because of a false sense of loyalty. We bring our twentieth century equivalent of "burnt offering of rams and the fat of fed beasts," and do not realize that our often heartless services may be a burden to our God and that He is weary of bearing them. Often we draw nigh with our lips and honor him with our mouths while our hearts are far from him.

THE INSTITUTIONAL CHURCH

Absolute candor requires us to say that the institutional church as we have propagated it can never bring forth judgment unto victory. It can never enter into the strong man's house and bind him and plunder his goods. It is not a camp of men eager for encounter and spoiling for the fray. Instead, it is a rest home, a shelter from the storm, whose inhabitants are "at ease in Zion, and who feel secure on the mountain of Samaria." We cannot win a war with people who are too apathetic to fight.

Then what shall we do? A great many, especially among our more youthful compeers are deserting the structure and "going over the hill." They have become disillusioned and discouraged with life in the monastery, and want to get out where the happening is. And a lot of them like to think of me as an antiquated die-hard because I do not "fly the coop" and flex my wings for a flight into "the wild blue yonder."

I share their eagerness to get on with the task, but I do not share the same enthusiasm for the strategy by which they hope to accomplish it. There are a good many reasons for my own thinking and they probably mean more to me than they do to a lot of the rest of you. Because they are important to what I shall be writing this year, I shall take the risk of boring you with a few of them.

1. I recognize that what we think of as "the church" bears but slight resemblance to the ekklesia of God about which the apostles wrote. We have taken a divine-human community idea and subjected it to pressures and tensions and political and cultural influences for a good many centuries, and we have constructed an institution which has satisfied us and given us a base from which to launch out in an attempt to share the message of Christ with the world. Our institution and his glorious ideal are not necessarily the same.

It is true, however, that the ekklesia has been in the world all of this time and while men may have submerged it beneath their fads and forms they could not drown or destroy it. It will continue to be here until Jesus comes. It has proved its hardiness by surviving the attacks of its foes and the mistakes of its friends. And while it may not be always, or even frequently, identified with the image we have projected upon the screen of history, it has permeated the hearts of many of those who have watched the projection with mixed emotions, and has involved them in the one body through the Spirit. If one works in a fellowship (and there is no other way to work effectively), he must work through that which exists. And that is exactly what I intend to do.

2. It has been my observation in the study of history that those who defect from the existing community because of the sectarian attitude of its constituency always end up creating another which eventually becomes more sectarian than the one which they abandoned. The quickest way to fill the world with “disloyal” churches is to pull out and start “loyal” ones. If the congregations planted by the apostles could get in the mess they did during the lifetime of the men who started them, it is not likely the ones we start will “hew to the line” or “stay in the beaten track.”

Most of our brethren would not have stayed in the congregation at Corinth a week. A bunch of them would have gotten their heads together and pooled their resources and rented the Odd Fellows Hall on the corner of Tenth and Main Streets, and put an advertisement in the Saturday evening edition of The Corinthian Times, under the heading “Church of Christ (Non-Tongues).” Those who did would have missed hearing Paul when he was in the city for he wrote that he intended to meet with “the liberal group.”

Although every “pull-outer” would deny it, the real reason why a separatist protest group turns out sectarian is because it is started by sectarians at the outset. The very essence of sectarianism is the self-righteous exclusivistic attitude. The very word “Pharisee” means “separatist.” And God did not think very much of the idea since he had Jude to write, “These are the ones who separate themselves, worldly people, who are empty of the Spirit” (verse 19). When sectarians separate from other sectarians, you end up with two groups of sectarians. One is too much!

I am not referring here to those brethren who are sometimes ejected from the party because their loving disposition embarrasses those who do not possess it. There is a great deal of difference between jumping overboard because you just do not want to be around the other passengers, and being thrown into the sea by the other sailors. Jonah found that out. There are some places where the wineskins are pretty old and if your thoughts begin to ferment you have to get out before an explosion occurs and everyone in reach gets doused!

3. I am not imbued with the idea that you have to give “book, chapter and verse,” for every little action as are some of our brethren who spend their time cooking up slogans for which they cannot give “book, chapter and verse.” The early saints had no book, and when they finally got one they could not give chapter and verse for about fifteen hundred years until someone came along and divided it up. The man who did it was blasted as a modernist, and some of his contemporaries said he was moved by Satan to number the verses as David had been to number the people. If you would have asked any of the apostles to “give you book, chapter and verse,” they would have looked at you in amazement.

Recently one of the congregations in our city advertised that the preacher would engage in “Book, Chapter and Verse Preaching.” Since I had never read of that kind in my Bible, I went and listened, but it was no different. It consisted of very little “book” and a great deal of explanation, elucidation and exposition. It did not take God very long to say what he wanted to say, but it takes quite awhile for our brethren to tell what they think he meant by what he said. And I am always made to wonder how the Philippians made out with the letter they received, without the one to the Romans and the Ephesians to flip over to and explain their own. There couldn't have been too much rustling of the pages when Onesimus handed Philemon the little note Paul wrote to him from his prison cell.

I have said all of this because I want to ask my brethren who specialize in the practice, to give book, chapter and verse, for rending and dividing the family of God as a means of obeying God and as a step toward unity. Is there any scriptural authority for the jumbled disarray and hotchpotch which we have created? I confess that I am a little suspicious of doctors whose only treatment for any ailment is amputation, and who are walking to and fro in the earth waving the sword of the Spirit and seeking whom they may decapitate. And I hold no brief for those who fly off into space like splinters from the butt-cut of humanity. There is not much life in a splinter.

4. I have done a lot of thinking lately about the last letters which Jesus dictated to the golden lampstands which his envoys planted in Asia Minor. By the time these were written the Enemy had gotten in his work and things were in a rather sorry state. A lot of the original luster had faded. "The silver had become dross, and the wine mixed with water." Accordingly, this provides a fine opportunity to determine how God would have us react in congregations composed of those who are cantankerous and contaminated. I want to make a few statements which may appear a little shocking to some in our day of warped thinking!

One can be saved even though he is in a congregation where some hold to and advocate doctrines that are actually vicious and destructive. He can be victorious and receive the hidden manna, the life-sustaining food from heaven which is unknown to those who are agents of false propaganda (Revelation 2:14-17).

One can be saved even though he is in a congregation which tolerates a woman who claims to have the gift of prophecy and uses this as a guise to encourage immorality and idolatry. Those “who do not accept this teaching and have had no experience” with the esoteric realm of black magic, can hold fast to what they have, and persevere in doing God’s will to the end, and they can receive the morning star (Revelation 2:20-29).

One can be saved even though he is in a congregation that is dead, while it has a reputation of being alive, although it has never completed any work it ever planned or attempted. He can keep his own garments free from stain and pollution, and walk with Christ in white, because he is deserving (Revelation 3:1-6).

One can be saved even though he is in a congregation which is so proud and arrogant as to think it has it made, when it is actually like a pitiable wretch, poor, blind and naked. The secret is to listen to the knock at the door, and when you hear the voice of Jesus, to let the Savior in. One can sit down with Jesus in pleasant company even in a congregation which nauseates God with its tepid condition.

Some of the congregations in Asia, in whose midst Jesus stood, were so far out and so bad off, they would make our worst ones look like they had a mild case of measles. But not once did Jesus recommend that “the good guys” grab their white hats, pull out and start a rival institution down the street. God’s lamp-stands in Pergamos, in Thyatira, and in Laodicea, might be tarnished and the wicks untrimmed, but they were his and they were all he had. He made no provision for some crusader to split them open for the sake of oneness.

5. There is another reason why I shall not abandon the institutional church. In a very limited way and in a very restricted sense, I helped to make it what it is. I contributed to its factional stance, and aided and abetted its tragic resort to legalism which has made it rely upon externals rather than upon “the righteousness which comes from faith in Christ, given by God in response to faith.”

My influence was limited by a lack of opportunity and not by desire, for I would no doubt have made the situation worse if I had gained a greater influence. I sincerely thought that our movement was the people “and wisdom would die with us.” While this is somewhat frightening when it is recognized how thoroughly one can be brainwashed, it also holds forth the greatest hope. If a partisan so thoroughly saturated with a sense of factional self-righteousness can come to know the meaning of grace and the extent of brotherhood, others may certainly do the same.

With all of the faults attributed to it by those who mature in a sense of personal relationship to Christ Jesus, the institutional church contains the best people on earth. Their very dogmatism is an overt demonstration of a desire to be faithful to God, even though they are sadly deficient in a knowledge of the divine nature. They have fragmented themselves into rival tribes, but their motivation has been a fierce determination to preserve what they mistakenly regard as “the faith.” But the Spirit can do wonders with the great smouldering backlog of apathy if enough splinters catch on fire and snuggle up close to it while aflame. Separation may extinguish both the splinters and the backlog.

This does not mean that I propose to become a mere constituent of the great mass of unconcerned and indifferent ones who are entangled in “the system.” Instead, by God’s grace I shall seek to be a humble tool with which He can crack the shell. I regard the institutional church of our day as a vast mission field, an area of fallow ground which needs to be broken up by the plow of the Spirit. It must be penetrated with the dynamic of concern and melted in the blast furnace of God's white-hot purpose. It is not my intention to write aimlessly about how this can be done, but to develop a strategy of involvement and to outline a campaign for the conquest by our King.

SURVEYING THE SITUATION

But what is the "institutional church"? On this point we need to be clear, and yet we shall have a great problem of separating the chaff from the wheat. This is understandable because there has long been a mistaken view that a thorough separation took place when men joined the institution. The institution is thus regarded as a granary in which only wheat is stored. For one to move his threshing machine into the granary and proclaim that it is a field brings animosity and recrimination. And yet there is nothing more essential than this very thing. We have been trying too long to feed starving humanity with bread made from chaff.

Foy E. Valentine thinks that our institutionalism may be the result of a deep fear that the church's power and glory are slipping away and that we must build boxes in which to keep these qualities, or we may lose them entirely.

Elton Trueblood declares that the church is the hardest problem of Christianity, and that we cannot live with it or without it. Many other writers in our generation are wrestling with the paradox which we are compelled to face, after divesting ourselves of the colored glasses which have been gratuitously furnished to us. Some will never take them off because they do not want too much light.

It may be easier to define the institutional church by what it does and does not, than to give a satisfactory dictionary definition. That is, we may describe it easier than we can define it. One of its outstanding characteristics is the preoccupation with forms, structures and power bases designed for its own preservation. These take a hundred varied shapes.

There are written creeds, and what is worse, unwritten creeds. There are the traditional headquarters, the radial centers of influence and judgment where doctrinal emphasis is decided and where a top echelon of recognized human authorities exercise control in subtle ways, effectively and piously destroying those who do not “play ball” under their coaching.

There are the supporting agencies, the vested interests, which draw their substance from the party and then furnish the pap upon which the party feeds. For these the party fights with the ferocity of a mother animal whose cubs are attacked or threatened. All of these are woven into a complex machine in which there is an interchange of supervisory personnel so that a pressure upon one area is felt throughout the whole system.

There are the huge cathedral-like piles of brick and stone, glittering palaces of modern architecture which cost hundreds of thousands of dollars and enhance the image. It is always these temples which are photographed professionally to adorn the covers of the institutional catalogs and appear on the pages of the orthodox journals. In conjunction with these has grown up peripheral businesses hawking various kinds of commodities and services, urging that you purchase your soap and paper towels from faithful Christians and thus help to channel the profit back into the party treasury.

This is “the System” which is repeated in every rival party in the land in a major or minor fashion. And it is always introspective and selfish. It proposes to thwart the dictum of Jesus that life is gained by losing it, and that the cross is the key to glory. It regards men as potential cogs in the development of greater wheels and serves humanity not so much from a sense of sheer compassion as with a view to its own gains and interests.

When all of this is said it appears that “the church” needs to be saved, not so much from its sins, which are many, but from itself. The attitudes which it possesses are the same as one finds in the world, but they are much more dangerous because they are sanctified and maintained and justified under the banner of Christ. This makes it much more difficult to change the church. It is always hard to save those who do not know they are lost. It is even harder when that which is lost suffers from the hallucination that it is in “the saving business” and has an exclusive franchise on the territory.

The reason that a lot of glittering idealists “wash out” is because it is easier to encounter the evil that is not entrenched or glorified. One hears upon every side the statement, “I’d rather try to plant ‘a church’ in a heathen country than to try and get an old dried-in-the-shell congregation to start serving Jesus.” It is altogether possible that it is easier to slay a dragon in the open field than to attack one in his cave, but statements such as the one we have quoted may tell as much about those who make them as about the “hard-shells” among us.

If we have enlisted in “The Light Brigade” to fight the forces of darkness we must oppose darkness regardless of where it is found. We cannot just choose the easy spots. It is true that by going into an area which has never seen the light at all we can shine brightly with relatively low wattage, but we may also end up in that species of mediocrity which only sharp, incisive encounter can overcome. Real combat troops are not averse to clearing up “the trouble spots.” Sometimes these are behind the lines.

It is quite obvious that the royal army cannot continue with its “business as usual” attitude. We are losing the war. To continue on our present course is suicidal. A genuine reformation is long overdue. But people do not like reformation. They especially dislike it when it involves revolution. Reformers are always denounced as heretics and traitors. In spite of this, and regardless of the consequences, I am going to plead this year for a complete tactical change. Among other things this will include the following factors.

A TEN-POINT PROGRAM

1. A candid admission that “the church” as we have known it in our day is not an army of finely-honed fighting men with an invincible esprit de corps, but a mass of individuals assembled together around some lesser or inferior principle which is not worth dying for, and therefore, not worth living for.

2. An utter abandonment of the idea that the war can be won by a group of professionals hired to pamper the enlistees and entertain them by public dissertations. No group of recruits can ever be trained to fight a bloody battle of hand-to-hand encounter merely by the lecture method. The soldiers must learn discipline under fire. We must develop a “get tough” policy or we have had it!

3. A complete re-assessment of the purpose of buildings and structures maintained as property holdings by the armed services, and a re-evaluation of the kind of meetings held on these premises in an effort to determine whether such meetings contribute materially to the equipment and morale of the troops.

4. A recommendation that we train commandoes as a part of a well-designed strategy for regaining those areas from which we have withdrawn and which have been occupied by the opposition. This cannot be done by a haphazard, trust-to-luck program. It must be the result of a plan involving proper procedures on a long-range basis.

5. A renunciation of fellowship in the ranks on a vertical basis with its consequent divisions and animosities, in favor of a recognition of fellowship on a horizontal level, cutting across the vertical lines and involving the concerned ones who sincerely regard Jesus Christ as Lord.

6. The formation of cell groups composed of those who want to share a deeper experience with one another and The Eternal, and who will meet in homes for the purpose of exchanging accounts of encounters and experiences, and to pray for doors of witness to be opened unto them by the Spirit. In this “church in thy house” approach there must be no thought of abandoning the institutional church. Instead there must be an earnest entreaty to God to be sent into it as kindling wood aflame to light a fire in the great bulky backlog of apathy and indifference which mark the church in our century.

7. A stubborn insistence that we relinquish our sectarian jargon which contributes to the unhealthful state in which we find ourselves, and recapture the vocabulary of the Holy Spirit so that we communicate the will of God in and to our generation. This will mean the complete abandonment of a lot of our pious pet phrases.

8. A bold approach to the task of infiltrating our culture in this secularistic age, making full use of the technological and scientific discoveries to speak meaningfully to men where they are about God as He is. This will involve the employment of every legitimate skill in confronting modern man with the claims of God. It may require a complete transformation of our ideas of worship and service.

9. A realistic translation of the word of God into living letters composed of men and women, so that in a post-literate age the once-born will see history being made before they read about its roots, and will be driven to the Book by an insatiable curiosity as to the motivating force behind the kind of moral integrity and spiritual transcendence which they observe in the lives of the twice-born ones. This is the new translation most needed in our day, not a new volume to hold in our hands, but a new life to be held in His hands.

10. An honest rejection of the sectarian stance as having any potential or possibility for the fulfillment of the divine kingdom concept among men. This means the surrender and giving up of our own brand of crazy-quilt sectarianism and not merely calling upon others to cease being sectarian, or to adopt our brand. It means the re-affirmation of the one body as composed of all who are joined to Jesus as Lord by the indwelling Spirit. It further means the removal of barriers which hinder the functioning of any member while he moves in meaningful and decisive fashion toward a mutual sharing with others.

These ten points represent areas of exploration and stress for the coming year. The magnitude of the task which we have assigned to ourselves neither frightens nor staggers me. I am resolved to press relentlessly on in the battle to win men's minds and bring all of their thoughts into captivity unto Him "whom having not seen we love." It is our intention during this year, if our Lord wills, to show that we can win this battle if we have the daring to get into the fray.

Arthur O'Shaughnessy, the Irish poet, has said, "Every age is a dream that is dying, or one that is coming to birth." I embrace no dying dream. I cherish the living faith that a dream is being born and I covet the hope that I may help in the delivery.

[Abstract]

There were just the three of us and we were sitting in the den, quietly talking about our faith. He had been here once before when he came to apologize for having formed an opinion about me based upon what others had said. Now he had a few more days respite from college and he had brought his fiancée, for he wanted me to know her also. We all seemed to be relaxed with each other and there was no reserve created by the need to be formally polite. We were members of the same family and there were no barriers.

He said, “You seem to exhibit such positiveness. Don’t you ever have any doubts? I mean the kind that gnaw at you deep down and in the dark.”

I thought for awhile before I replied for I did not want to project a false image. I confessed that there were a lot of areas in which I was not sure, and I thought this was good because it made me cautious where I might be impetuous. But there was no doubt in my heart about the existence of God, or his providential concern for my life, or my hope of seeing him face to face after the mists have risen from the final valley.

I pointed out that such doubts belong to those who are younger, those who have time. They flit through the mind like a sparrow fluttering through the living-room, and you not only must drive them out but also repair the aperture through which they entered. Some of us do not have time left to chase sparrows or to fix windows, so we must be careful to keep our mind on the task at which we are working.

The girl spoke up. “Even if one doesn’t have any real doubt, don’t you think there may be some special place where it is easier to believe, where you can just close your eyes and lean back and somehow know that God is there?”

Then I told them of Abraham and the place of the smoking lamp; of Jacob at Bethel, which to him was “the gate of heaven;” of Moses and the burning bush; of Samuel and the stone pillar, called Ebenezer; and of Elijah and the cave mouth on Sinai. Everyone has a place, I think, and it is the place to him only of all the teeming millions of the earth. No one else would ever understand its magnetic pull on his heart.

I am a native of the hill country. One who was born where the blue haze of the Ozarks dips gently down to kiss the brow of distant cedar-clad mountains, may find his faith meaningful when he lifts up his eyes to these hills. As a barefoot youngster I imbibed faith when I drank from clear springs, when I smelled the fragrant wood smoke from a cabin chimney, when I heard the echo of honking wild geese in a flying wedge against the setting autumnal sun. Every sense said there was a beneficent Creator.

So there is a moss-covered ledge extending out above a gently winding river, which I can still see in my dreams, although I have not been there for years. It is completely hidden from sight of any human habitation. As a young preacher still going to high school I used to go there often. It helped to clear the cobwebs from my brain and air out the musty corners of soul.

Sometimes it was spring and the dogwood tree, of which legend says the cross was made, was in full bloom. The redbud also gave startling beauty to every slope, while on the ground there were patches of delicate wild violets which looked as if someone had carelessly thrown down a purple carpet.

Again it was summer, and the rasping sound of the cicada was heard, demanding attention above the melody created by the birds, nature's sylvan choral society. If it was late evening there might be the booming bass of a bullfrog hidden in the weeds along the bank of the stream, or the sudden splash of a leaping fish. And always there was the faraway bawling of the cows as they plodded homeward from pasture to milking-shed.

Or, perhaps it was autumn, and the golden persimmons were ripening from the first frost, or the wild grapes were hanging in tangy clusters upon the vines. If one sat without moving, sweeping only his eyes across the panorama, life was everywhere manifest. On the opposite hillside a fox might be seen slipping through the hackberry bushes and sumac. Closer at hand, a squirrel, wholly oblivious to your presence, would be gathering hickory-nuts or acorns to add to the hoard in his secret cache.

And then there was winter. I've visited the place when the sleet pelted my face like leaden shot, and when it rattled against the stiff canvas of my hunting coat as it did against the window panes. I liked this world of white with its ghostly shadows above, a world which belonged for a few fleeting minutes just to myself and the great wraith-like owl whose enormous wings made hardly a rustle while slipping through the gloom on a bloody mission of survival.

And I never turned back toward the world with its arteries of rushing traffic, of whining rubber and throbbing steel; with its narrow streets and alleys filled with misery and squalor and sin, that I did not stop and repeat aloud for my ears and for His, "And the Lord said in his heart, I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake; for the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth . . . While the earth remaineth, seedtime and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease."

Yes, there are places where you can just close your eyes, and lean back and know that He is there. And when you have known such a place you can go anywhere else on earth without doubting. For once you have come to know the Presence in your life, nothing else that ever happens can stifle or erase it.

A man may be a heretic in the truth; and if he believe things only because his pastor says so, or an assembly so determines, without knowing other reason, though his belief be true, yet the very truth he holds becomes his heresy.— John Milton.

As one reads the account of the activities of the primitive saints, and studies the letters written to congregations and individuals, he is made aware of the power and mobility which seems to throb in almost every page. The Greek language was very versatile and capable of making keen distinctions. There were a great many words for power to be found in it but the apostles almost exhaust that vocabulary of power in presenting their picture of the ancient order.

It is at once apparent that we are reading about an army on the march, advancing relentlessly against the foe. There is here no thought of entrenchment or of retiring to a fortress for safety. The soldiers are not holding a fort, but storming one. They are pulling down strongholds, casting down armament from elevations and bringing opposing forces into captivity (2 Corinthians 10:4, 5).

Our words dynamite, dynamo and dynamic are power words. They conjure up mental images of explosive energy, yet they are only transliterations of an original term applied frequently to the functioning of Spirit-filled saints. The apostle Paul was not ashamed of the good news of Jesus because it was God's dynamic unto salvation for both Jew and Greek. There was no reluctance in confronting legalism or philosophy for this message was capable of cutting its way through either maze with its keen edge.

It is unnecessary to belabor the point that "the church" in our day is wholly unlike "the Way" about which we read in the books written by the Greek physician, Luke. We seldom think of "exceeding greatness of his power," or "the working of his mighty power." We are involved in programs, building fund drives, and committee meetings. The fighting in which we engage may be in the form of argumentation over paving the parking lot or purchasing cushions for the pews. The liveliest session of the year may be the business meeting in which we discuss the color of an aisle runner or a pulpit rug. There is no thought of wrestling with the cosmic forces of the universe or with the invisible king of the region of the darkness of this world.

It is probably not nearly so important that we know what factors contributed to the production of our state as to know what we propose to do about it, but we may profitably pause for a little while to assess the situation. In no attempt at being exhaustive I will list a few items which seem to be germane.

1. We have watered down sin until it is no longer considered as an offence against the Majesty on high, but merely anti-social behavior. The sinner may be more of an eccentric in our culture than an enemy of God. And the blame for his condition may be charged to the social structure rather than to the individual. But man is so constructed, as a rational animal of choice, that by intuition he recognizes that he cannot divorce the choice from the result or consequences, and fine-spun behavioral theories only confuse him.

In the confrontation of men with the Good News in the early years of the ekklesia there was no attempt to throw a mantle of respectability over man's corruption. Without Christ men were dead in trespasses and sins. Their behavior was occasioned by lust, and they were children of wrath. They gave themselves over to lascivious practices. They worked all uncleanness with greedy hearts.

Thus, those who embraced the Message had a consciousness of the futility and helplessness of their own efforts, and a realization that they could be rescued or extricated only by the undeserved kindness of the One against whom they had voiced their enmity. They were slaves bought by a new master and given a writ of manumission signed with blood. They were like shipwrecked sailors drifting on a sea of floating filth, and plucked out of the jaws of death by a kindly hand. They were criminals facing the gallows and the darkness of oblivion, handed a pardon as they were climbing the steps to the noose.

And they had a personal testimony, a thrilling story of the Great Adventure. Once they were dead, but now they were alive; once they were lost, but now they were found. Men who may be unmoved by a magazine article dealing with how a maladjusted individual becomes socially re-oriented, can become so engrossed with the tale of a rescue of a shipwrecked crew or the restoration to life of a dead man that they will read a whole book without once laying it down. The disciples of Christ in the first century had a story to tell and the world listened. It is difficult to save one who does not know that he is lost.

2. We have lost the sense of the need for personal reconciliation with God. In some cases this is due to the fact that we are oblivious of the Great Gulf, the Grand Canyon created by the erosion of sin. In other cases God seems so remote that it is useless to dream of a bridge that can span the expanse. But whether we think of Him as so close that anyone can touch Him regardless of sin, or so far away that no one can do so regardless of desire, we have little consciousness that he can be "touched with the feeling of our infirmities.”

The ministry of reconciliation has no relevance for our lives. We are not angry with God and we cannot see why He should be angry with us. Least of all are we angry with ourselves because we are sinful, falling short of the high calling, failing to follow the beckoning finger of glory. We are satisfied to wallow in the valley without foiling up the steps to where the mist hides the Presence. We flatter ourselves that if we ignore Him He will not see us. If we are not troubled by our sin, He will not be.

Thus we become reconciled to our sin instead of being reconciled unto God. We learn to live with it rather than with Him. We settle for the cheap grace dispensed by our own warped character rather than the costly grace which requires the blood of atonement as the red seal of its validity. In such a state we have nothing to offer a blighted and frightened world except a vain hope and a fleeting shadow.

The word of reconciliation is plainly stated. It is simply that “God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them.” Sin does count unless God chooses not to impute it. We cannot choose not to count it because it is already posted to our account. We must be reconciled or stand naked, not being clothed in righteousness. Reconciliation provides the only covering for our shame, the only protection from our guilt. God was in Christ and I must be in Christ if I am to meet God.

3. We have been betrayed into resting our hope in an institution rather than in a Savior. Thus we are not so much members of a body through action of the Spirit as we are affiliates of an organization by complying with terms. We lack the throbbing, pulsating, tingling sensation of the blood circulation which binds us all together in the unity of heart. And we are among those who by implication are condemned because they “glory in appearance, and not in heart” (2 Corinthians

The difference between the primitive saints and ourselves is well illustrated in the first genuine encounter of two former fishermen who were filled with the Spirit, and the entrenched theological and political leaders of the Establishment in a prominent city. Taking advantage of a favorable climate which had been created by a phenomenal happening in the life of a publicly known character, the two men spoke unto the people without securing permission from City Hall.

Members of the local clergy, accompanied by representatives of an anti-supernatural sect, had them arrested late in the day, so there was no opportunity to secure bond, and they were held in the city jail overnight. The intense feeling which resulted in this action was prompted by the fact that “they preached through Jesus the resurrection from the dead.”

The next day the hierarchy assembled in formal court session and demanded of the two men that they reveal by what authority, or in whose name, they were acting. The answer was “By the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth.” The court was astounded. They saw two men of unflinching boldness, and upon enquiry learned that they were without formal education or scholastic degree. The only way by which informants could explain their fearless demeanor was by pointing out that they had been with Jesus.

The court bailiff removed them from the room so that the judges could confer as to what disposition should be made of the case. It was finally decided to issue an injunction against their speaking to any individual in the name of Jesus. The men were returned to the courtroom and solemnly and sternly charged that they must under no circumstances speak or teach in the name of Jesus. The men were undaunted. When given a chance to address the court they said, “You are capable of determining whether it is proper in God’s sight to listen to what you say instead of to what He says. We cannot desist from speaking those things which we have seen and heard.”

The angry judges threatened them again but decided to free them in order to avoid a civil rights march against the courthouse, since community feeling was running high at the time. The men went at once to their own company and rehearsed all that had transpired, whereupon they all prayed with such fervency that the place was shaken where they assembled together, and they were all filled with the Holy Spirit, and spoke the word of God with boldness.

The account is significant because of the prominence given to the relationship with Jesus. The message was the resurrection through Jesus, the authority for the activity was Jesus, the secret of their boldness was association with Jesus, the great grace which came upon them all was through Jesus. There was no plan, no program, no pre-conceived campaign. Instead there was a simple moving into every situation as it arose with Jesus. The talk to the crowd, the testimony to the court, the prayer with their own company; all of these were unstructured. It is difficult to draw up a speaking agenda when your speakers may all be locked up in the calaboose or called into court.

The danger of institutional connection is that men may not be free to speak without securing permission from other men to do so. It should be the opposition which forbids, threatens and restricts the saints, but too often the religious institution is more dangerous to the exercise of freedom than the political realm. Men cannot go everywhere preaching the word until they are free to go anywhere and preach it. Men who belong only to Jesus can heed his command to go to the uttermost parts of the earth. All too often “the church” comes between men and the will of Jesus. It may be to our own brethren in our day that one must say, “You are capable of determining whether it is proper in God’s sight to listen to what you say instead of to what he says.”

SECULAR AND SACRED

4. We have limited our relationship with God by allowing ourselves to be brainwashed into dividing our lives into areas called secular and sacred. In doing so we have come to think of serving God at certain times and in doing certain things. We have consecrated and dedicated holy places which we call sanctuaries, and we have hallowed days which have come to be regarded with special reverence. Yet this is directly opposed to the very genius of The Way inaugurated by the blood of Jesus. It belongs to Judaism which was but a shadow, instead of to Jesus who is the body, or substance.

Jesus died to destroy and remove the walls separating and fragmenting life into areas marked sacred and secular. Those who erect such walls are living B.C. lives in an A.D. world. There are no holy places now. There are only holy people. We are God's only temple. We are God's only building. "For ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people."

It is ridiculous for us to talk about "going up to the house of the Lord." We are the house of the Lord. The only sanctuary God has on earth is the human heart. Whatever I do is done as a member of Christ. One can no more separate himself from the body of Christ while he does certain things than he can unscrew his own arm while he performs a task. It is this which makes the life of sin unthinkable. If one were holy only while in a place of ritualistic performance he could live as he pleased at other times without reflecting against God.

It is precisely because we cannot "check in" and "check out" in service to God that every word and deed must be done to the glory of God. "Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ? shall I take the members of Christ, and make them the members of a harlot? God forbid." Either all that we do is worship of God, or nothing is. Worship is not the performance of acts but the prostration of the heart in the presence of God. It is no longer a performance upon mountains or in special cities, it is deep reverence in spirit and in truth.

We have negated one purpose of the cross and forsaken grace for the law. We proceed as if the law had not been fulfilled and we are still involved with jots and tittles. In our spiritual immaturity we demonstrate our deficiency of faith. For Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth. Christ set us free from the bondage of the law but we have erected our own prisons for the spirit. We call them “churches.”

Now the real question is how we shall recapture our freedom and regain the power which can again make us “more than conquerors through him that loved us.” The problem, is intensified because of the structures we have created. These always inhibit freedom because they have grown up out of fear, and fear enslaves. “Fear hath torment” (1 John 4:18). We must be free to take risks or we will think only of preserving the status quo. This latter is the real purpose of institutions.

Just as liberty is stifled by regimentation and conformity so power is siphoned away by the need to keep the wheels turning, even though they are spinning without any real traction. We expend more energy in keeping the machine in condition than in a forward thrust into the world. Our manpower too often consists only of stationary engineers. We have organized ourselves to live and have organized ourselves to death. It requires more personnel to care for the barracks than we have in the field.

The primitive saints had some things going for them which made it easier for them to get into the fight than it is for us. In the first place they were imbued with the idea that Jesus was coming again, and many of them lived in happy anticipation of this great event transpiring during their lifetime. It was necessary for Paul to write one company and tell them that they should not allow themselves to be deceived into thinking that the great day was at hand. He urged them to return to their daily employment and manual labor so they could support themselves with honest toil.

Twenty centuries have passed and the Lord has delayed his coming. The bright hope is no longer a subject of conversation. It has ceased to be a magnificent obsession. Life has become routine and humdrum, and the thought of a longer vacation with pay has supplanted the coming visit of the King in importance. Somehow we must recapture the sense of urgency, and the importance of the now because of what will happen then.

Too, the first disciples were fortunate enough to be allowed to suffer persecution. This served a great many salutary purposes. It weeded out hangers-on and mere camp-followers. There are very few who will go along “just for the ride” if they know that the destination is prison or the stake. It amounted to a stiffening of the conditions for membership by eliminating “the fearful, and unbelieving” (Revelation 21:8). This created an elite corps of the brave and trustworthy with the consequent high degree of morale always found in such a group. Persecution served also to keep them from putting down deep roots on earth which would make it more desirable than heaven. The order from the central command post was plain—when they persecute you in this city, flee to another. The mobility of the troops was assured by recognition of the fact that “here we have no continuing city, but we seek one to come.” Earthly possessions were expendable and subject to the fortunes of war. “You took joyfully the spoiling of your goods, knowing in yourselves that ye have in heaven a better and an enduring substance.”

Another favorable circumstance was found in the fact that every company was active in the field and was not hampered by or cumbered with jointly owned barracks or real estate. As a fluid underground movement staff meetings, which always involved every soldier, were held in caves, underground tombs, third-floor halls or private homes. Secret codes or signs were used to direct the enlisted men to the temporary quarters and infiltrators who did not have the password were not received into the house.

When their houses were ransacked in Jerusalem, and male and female troops were arrested and imprisoned, the ones who escaped scattered, with the exception of the corps of officers. The scattered ones began immediately to inaugurate guerilla tactics wherever they went. One of them went down to a recalcitrant city and in a single-handed effort took possession of it in the name of the absent King. When couriers took word of this back to the staff officers in Jerusalem they immediately sent two of their most versatile men down to consolidate the area. On their return trip they effectively secured the surrender of many villages.

Others infiltrated territory farther afield. Some who were natives of a foreign sector quietly entered the capital city. Because of their knowledge of the customs and language they were able to secure a great many enlistees, and a training program was set up for a year under the direction of two outstanding storm troopers. Always held before the eyes of the trainees was the goal of world conquest. They had no money to devote to the purchase of comfortable headquarters and no time to attend meetings purely for pleasure or pastime.

Although we commonly claim to be heirs of these valiant men we have come to settle for a lesser goal and for a cheap victory. The glory is departed. The vision has grown dim. We have been like a woman with child who draws near to the time of birth and is too weak to deliver. "We have not wrought any deliverance in the earth; neither have the inhabitants of the world fallen."

What shall we do? What can we do? We cannot expect in our culture to experience physical persecution in this generation! Can we be purged and purified without it? Can gold lose its dross without passing through the fire? Can our silver be refined except in the furnace of affliction? Must we pray for hardship, suffering, loss of possessions and threat of death in order to drive us to trust in the Lord rather than to lean upon the arm of man?

How can we gain again a sense of the imminent coming of our Lord while he still tarries? What can we do to avoid unconsciously joining the ranks of the “last days scoffers” and asking, “Where is the promise of his coming?” Can we escape that philosophy which predicates continuity of the future based upon conformity of the past? How can we make the coming of Christ real to those whose hearts have grown fat, whose ears are dull of hearing, and whose eyes have been closed through willing ignorance?

I think it is evident that in our twentieth century world we cannot dispose of all our real estate holdings and resort to caves and catacombs. Some of the more radical will write their brethren off and forsake them, but most of these will not be any more loyal to Jesus. They will rail against the institutional church with its monastic structures but they will not themselves be kindly affectioned one to another in brotherly love. They will not be fervent in spirit, serving the Lord.

We do not live in a misty dream world, but in a real one. And we must live in the twentieth century world, not in one of centuries past. Our problem is that because we are frightened by the big world which God has made, we make little artificial worlds of our own. The situation we face is not ideal and neither are we. We must move into it without the power to see into the immediate future. And even our best judgment is not always faultless. We must learn to take calculated risks.

It is for this reason we point out that the situation is not necessarily hopeless unless we relinquish our hope and trust. The ground for optimism lies in the fact that in every religious community in our day there is a group who sigh and cry for all the abominations that are done. These compose the remnant of God and God is always in the remnant business. He places a mark upon the foreheads of his people and he puts a new heart and new spirit within them.

This remnant becomes God's salt or leaven. They are an ekklesia within the ekklesia. Just as people are called out of the world and yet remain in the world to leaven it, so the remnant is called out and yet remains within the ekklesia to leaven it. In order to achieve the most good we must restore fellowship on a horizontal rather than a vertical basis. Let me explain.

Our fellowship has been regulated by vertical lines. When brethren disagreed with us we drew vertical lines which kept us enclosed and excluded others. Those who were driven out then drew another vertical line beyond which others dare not think or go. The whole realm of Christendom is divided into separate sects or parties by such lines, for vertical lines always become walls of separation. The vertical lines are based upon deductions, inferences and doctrinal interpretations.

Now we are seeing that in all parties created by such vertical lines there are some who are not satisfied with their sectarian status or with the dishonest methods used to defend it. These are actually closer to one another than to many others within their vertical lines. It now becomes a question of whether the things which divide us are as important as the things upon which we can agree. It is even more germane to ask whether they are as important as our goal.

The remnant between each set of vertical lines constitutes a fellowship. Fellowship is the sharing of a common life, and these share in a common concern. They are a fellowship of concerned ones with an interest in answering the prayer of Jesus for the unity of all believers as a means of causing the world to believe that God sent Jesus to die for our sins.

It is time that the concerned ones ignore the vertical lines which separate them and flow together. This does not mean that they come out from between the lines and create a new unity party, for this would result in another vertical line and a new faction or sect. This new vertical line would keep them from exercising any influence upon those who were within the original lines. They must stay where they are and merely melt the lines between themselves and others of the concerned ones. Thus they will flow together because the lines will no longer have any relevance to them although they are in direct contact with those with whom they have always associated and who are still between the lines. They will be God's salt to touch the mass of partisans who are unsalted with the unity concerns.

Jesus specifically declared that his purpose was to start a fire on the earth. In order to do this he must have kindling wood, and the fellowship of concerned ones must be such flammable material. When they are aflame they can then set fire to the great backlog of material in each party. If they leave where they are and form a kindling wood party they will have a hot flame for awhile but they will finally be consumed and die out and the religious world will be unaffected. They will leave only a small pile of ashes to mark their place of expiration.

It can thus be seen that we need to remain in contact with the pile of material which has smouldered and smoked but never really caught on fire. That pile of material in our day may be the institutional church in the world. The temptation is to leave and create a flash fire of our own, but such fires are of no real permanent value. They burn out and leave the real problem untouched. But let us pursue our analogy a little further.

If we do not have direct contact with other flaming or glowing material we soon turn to gray ash and become cold. We must have a kindling of our own motivation and spirit. This means that there must be a genuine closeness of the fellowship of the concerned to keep the flame alive while the backlog can be ignited. This can only be achieved by cell groups which meet in private homes, in dormitory rooms, or in other places which are “a little way apart.” These are our catacombs of today! The ekklesia within the ekklesia must again become “the church which is in thy house.”

In gatherings of such cell groups there should be no structured agenda, but room should be left for the Spirit to work and blow upon the kindling wood to make the flame burn brighter. It is very essential that such meetings not become ends in themselves. This is a great temptation. Satan is a clever strategist. He knows how to take advantage of our human nature. We like to be with others of the same interests as ourselves. If he can turn our gatherings into chummy little “righteous club” meetings, he will do so.

One of the prime purposes of cell groups should be to strive together in prayer that their service may be accepted of the saints, that great doors and effectual may be opened, and that the God of peace shall bruise Satan under their feet. It is probably best that those attending kneel in prayer and thus bow their knees unto the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. If the gatherings are held weekly, those in attendance should recount any victories that have been won through God’s power since the previous meeting. This is essential if morale is to be built up.

In subsequent articles it is our intention, God willing, to show what changes we must make in vocabulary, method and attitude, if we are to be filled with the fruits of righteousness which are by Jesus Christ unto the glory of God. We will deal objectively with the steps required to qualify ourselves to speak boldly as we ought to speak. It is not our intention to simply be critical but rather to suggest measures to be “the sons of God, without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation, among whom we are to shine as lights in the world.”

The Touch of Life

Mission Messenger (February 1969)

[Abstract]

“The company that Jesus chose to keep was the company of ordinary men. He was more at home with fishermen, farmers, shopkeepers and tax gatherers than with the religious leaders and the priests. His talk was of seedtime and harvest, of buying fields and building houses, of boats and nets. The neighborhood he chose was secular life, the world of ordinary men and women.”— God’s Frozen People.

It is generally believed that the religious establishment of our day exists to further and promote the ideals of Jesus upon the earth. It is unfortunate, but true, that the exact opposite is often the case. The truth is hardly ever spoken about it for the simple reason that it is inimical to one’s status or hope of gain. The tendrils of men’s hearts are entwined in the traditions they have inherited and cultivated and one who challenges them is regarded as a dangerous usurper who would tear up religion from its roots. Our Lord found this out and Calvary was the result.

In spite of this I am willing to risk my reputation and future in presenting my honest sentiment about some reforms which are long overdue and which must be effected if we are to be workers together with God. I believe that it is demonstrable that certain cherished concepts and practices in which we indulge are actually defeating the will of God in spite of the good intentions of those who promote them.

It will seem startling at first to my readers when I say that Jesus did not come to establish a new religion in the earth. He actually came to put an end to “religion” as a means of serving God. Religion is involved in holy places and sacred days, in rituals and sacrifices, and in written codes and priestly cults. Until the world was considered mature enough, God placed mankind under the governing hand and tutorship of religion. It was a faithful slave entrusted with the task of leading us to faith. Now that faith has come we are no longer under a custodian. We have been set free by the grace of God.

The only “religion” which is acceptable unto God and the Father is life itself. It is not related to acts performed as rites at all. It consists of going personally to ascertain the needs of widows and orphans with a view to relieving them, and of guarding against contamination in daily contact with the world. There is no intimation of anything done in a sanctuary or chapel made with hands. It involves worship in spirit and in truth. It is expressed in concern for the helpless and with the life of integrity. It is pure and undefiled.

Jesus came that we might have life and that we might possess it more abundantly. He is the bread of life. He said, “I am the living bread which came down from heaven: if any man eat of this bread, he shall live forever: and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world.” Immediately the Jews who first heard this became involved in a heated argument as to how this could be done. It did not fit into their theological concepts.

They thought that eternal life was contained in the scriptures, and that it could be secured by searching, debating and disputing until one could quote “book, chapter and verse” for every minute act he performed, regardless of how mechanical it might be. They could not grasp the fact that life came through a vital personal relationship. Jesus said, “You search the scriptures because you think eternal life is found in them, when their real purpose is to point you to me. And you will not come to me, that you might have life” (John 5:39, 40).

In the same breath he put his finger on their trouble. “How can you believe which receive praise from one another, and are not interested in seeking the praise which God bestows?” Praise accorded by men is always based upon externals, upon things which may be seen. It often seeks a return and is part of a barter system. Praise from God is not based upon the things that are seen, but upon things which are not seen. “Man looketh on the outward appearance but the Lord looketh upon the heart.” It is important as a prelude to faith that we decide whose praise we prefer to receive.

This brings us to the question of how we should employ the scriptures. It is a vital question because upon the answer we make to it depends whether we shall seek to develop the kingdom of heaven into a police state with certain of the citizens riding high in the saddle, or whether it will be a realm of understanding and mutual concern inhabited by sinners whose only claim to recognition is grace which originated outside themselves and leaves no ground for boasting.

If we turn back the pages of history and convert the love letters growing out of the new covenant into a legalistic code in which we assume that life is contained, we nullify the purpose of the cross. We also doom ourselves to a life of fruitless searching for something which is not there. It seems almost elemental to say any use of the written word to defeat the very design of the Living Word is misuse and a cruel hoax practiced upon the weary pilgrims dying from thirst. One who cannot distinguish between a road map and an oasis, or between a directional sign and a fountain is hardly to be regarded as a safe guide to the water of life.

The scriptures are to take us by the hand and lead us to Jesus, and when we arrive his message is always, "Follow me!" Jesus established no institutions, erected no buildings, put on no drives, and established no headquarters. He simply invited men to live in a world where death was all around. He said, "Whoever lives and believes in me will never die." He also said, "Whoever believes in me will live, even though he dies." If that sounds paradoxical it is because life and death are always paradoxical to men in the flesh.

It is possible for us to get so wrapped up in religion with its boards and bureaus, its modes and methods, that we actually forget about the life that Jesus came to bestow. Even worse than forgetting, we may confuse all of the activity and bustle which is necessary to keep the machinery running with that life. This is the greatest tragedy of all. Life is the gift of the Great Physician, and we may employ vehicles in which to get to Him, but we never want to confuse an automobile with the doctor.

The life of Jesus touched all of life about him. It was free and outgoing as real life always is. The body is merely an earthen vessel for conveying the life from place to place. But life is not material. It can never be contained and bottled up in an earthen vessel. So wherever Jesus went life reached out and touched and changed and transformed men and women. Some of them were sinners, social outcasts, and down-and-outers. But when the life touched them they became kingdom material.

It is one of the fallacies of "religion" that it tends to think of people, not as whole persons, but as fragmented and compartmentalized. Jesus came to save men, and men are beings who bear the image of the earthy, and can bear the image of the heavenly. Jesus was interested in anything which contributed to manhood, whether physical, intellectual, moral or spiritual. He was touched by all of our infirmities. And he was no less God's Son when dealing with the physical than when dealing with the spiritual.

The word for salvation is soteria. The word for save is sozo. It means deliverance from any peril, danger or abnormal condition. It is rendered save 92 times, heal 3, and make whole 9. It has to do with the restoration of one to a state of normalcy. Sin did not affect one part of man, but man as a whole, as a person. It was sin which caused sickness, pain and death. For this reason one actively opposes sin in the world when he overcomes its effect upon the body, mind or heart. Thus the word used to describe what happened to the sick who touched the garment of Jesus (Matthew 14:36) is identical with that used for the effect wrought upon those who hear with their ears, understand with their hearts and turn to God (Acts 28:27).

Jesus did not turn his divine Sonship on when he started preaching to the multitudes and turn it off when he began passing out bread and fish. He declared that he came to do the work of Him by whom he was sent, and whatever he did was the work of God. We must assume that it was the work of God to relieve the embarrassment of a host by providing wine at a wedding, feeding the hungry, washing the feet of the disciples, and healing the sick. In other words, to exercise compassion and to share with men in their need was a part of the work of God. "My Father works always, and I must also work" (John 5:17).

On the one occasion when Jesus described the final judgment scene he depicted a separation of humanity, based not upon doctrinal correctness or aptitude, but upon active concern for the needy. "I was hungry and you fed me, thirsty and you gave me drink; I was a stranger and you received me in your homes, naked and you clothed me; I was sick and you took care of me, in prison and you visited me." Jesus identifies with the needy rather than with those who are intellectually correct. "I tell you indeed, whenever you did this for the least important of these brethren of mine, you did it for me!"

It is vital to remember that the Father blessed those who had compassion and did something about it. It was for these the kingdom had actually been prepared since the creation of the world. The “least important” are those who cannot return our favors. Our help for them cannot produce any personal gain. They cannot reciprocate economically or politically.

I am quite convinced that selfish men who wish to project an image of following Jesus will resort to every form of subterfuge to keep from really doing so. Following Jesus is a costly, time-consuming business which brings no earthly profit that can be rung up on a cash register. One of the cleverest dodges of the institutional church is to brand compassionate sharing as “the social gospel.” This shibboleth, mouthed by partisan preachers is enough to shut up the bowels of mercy and close off the feeblest attempt at sharing.

Thus, well-dressed, perfumed, jewelry-wearing men and women can sit in air-conditioned temples and worship God without giving a thought to the fact that less than a mile away, human beings arise from troubled sleep in rat-infested, stinking ghettos where an air of hopelessness and despair broods like an evil spirit over their grimy tenements. Those who profess to love him who allowed the decaying flesh of lepers to touch his own, contrary to the law which branded these unfortunates unclean, shrink away from the contamination of their hands and garments through contact with those whom they regard as social pariahs.

To take the money heaped up on collection plates carried by immaculate ushers and use it to relieve the stark tragedy of the forgotten masses would dishonor the Lord. There are those who actually teach that the funds deposited in huge bank accounts as a part of the institutional treasury cannot be dispensed to any of the poor except those whose names have been safely enrolled on the church roster. It is not according to “the pattern” as interpreted by these ecclesiastical lawyers. But they start with an institution, a weekly collection, a treasury, and a bank account, without once remembering that these have all been dreamed up in the fertile brains of a clerical caste. Jesus and the early disciples knew nothing about any of them.

In the thinking of these men there is nothing wrong with “the social gospel” if it is limited to members of our exclusive society. We may even help those outside if there is a good possibility that our charity may get them to come in with us. Our hand-outs must be regarded as bait to increase our attendance statistics and to pad our membership rolls. Such manipulation of human misery to pamper our own selfishness is a sin of the deepest dye. The only reason that Jesus relieved human suffering was because of the deep feeling of compassion which welled up within him when confronted with pain and misery.

The sharing of means with the less fortunate is not a social gospel. The true disciple knows there is no such thing as “another gospel.” Men may pervert the gospel of Christ and many do. But to act as Jesus did in the world will not pervert it. Jesus moved on earth in a body. He still does so, but we are that body now, and when we minister to the sick, the feeble, the hungry, and the distressed, we are ministering to Jesus. And Jesus is ministering through us.

Jesus said of his disciples, “I sent them into the world just as you sent me into the world.” The disciples are not bringing another gospel when they act as Jesus did in the world. They are prolonging and extending his mission. When they set captives free, bind up the brokenhearted, and set at liberty the bruised and downtrodden, they are fulfilling God’s purpose as they do when they proclaim glad tidings to the poor.

We are always confronted with priority ratings by legalistic minds. “Which is the more important,” we are asked, “the bodies or the souls of men?” Jesus never allowed himself to be caught on that hook. Once he was walking through the wheat fields on a sabbath day, and his hungry disciples began to pick the grain and to eat it. The Pharisees immediately said, “Look, it is against the Law for your disciples to do this on the sabbath.”

The reply of Jesus was a classic. All modern Pharisees ought to read it. Our Lord plainly showed that human need always takes precedence over law. He cited the case of David and his men who were hungry, and who went into the holy place and ate the consecrated bread in direct contravention of the law which strictly forbade any but the priests to eat it. He mentioned the fact that the priests actually broke the law every sabbath in preparation of the offerings, yet it was not held against them.

He said, “There is something here I tell you greater than the temple.” That something was the principle enunciated by God, “I require mercy and not sacrifices.” Jesus said that those who learn this will not condemn the innocent. The thing which takes precedence is the need at the time. If your enemy hunger, do not preach him a sermon, but feed him; if he thirst, do not hand him a tract, but give him drink. It is not true now, and it never has been true, that preaching sermons will solve all of the needs of men, either in the body of Christ or out of it.

“Suppose a brother or a sister is in rags with not enough food for the day, and one of you says, ‘Good luck to you, keep yourselves warm, and have plenty to eat,’ but does nothing to supply their bodily needs, what is the good of that? So with faith; if it does not lead to action, it is in itself a lifeless thing.”

We are again forced to examine the quality of our faith in this day. We live in a different world than the one which most of us entered at birth. It is no longer a quiet, placid rural culture in which we exist. Secularization and urbanization have married and brought forth technopolis. We are in a world of ferment and torment. Roots have been jerked up. People have been shunted from their places of security. Many have been forced to migrate to large centers of population which have a way of life for which they are not adjusted and to which they cannot readily adapt.

The result is that city centers decay and rot, and human beings for whom Jesus died are forced to live like animals. Our social fabric is best described in the prophetic words, “The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint. From the sole even unto the head there is no soundness in it.” What has the institutional church done? Has it closed the wounds, bound up the bruises, or mollified the stripes with oil? Candor forces us to admit that generally it has fled the scene to protect and preserve its image. It has sought refuge in the suburbs where it can pretend that the noise and the stink and the putridity are not there, that it is all a bad dream from which we will awaken to laugh at our fright.

There are those who have not retreated. In bold new approaches they have attacked the problem. They have recognized “religious” buildings and structures for what they are—mere tools to get the job done. They know that these tools will not always fit the task in our day. “Church buildings” are useless when people will not enter them, and it is people for whom Jesus died. Abandoned store buildings, private homes, remodeled garages, these have been pressed into service as oases in a desert of despair, where men can secure food, clothing, counselling, and see Jesus at work in His members.

But all too often even such meager attempts have been attacked and condemned by the church now safely ensconced in the shiny new edifice on Greenacres Drive. The converted slum building in which ghetto children are shown how to cook and sew, where Bible classes are taught and subsistence meals are served, is casually dismissed as a part of “the social gospel.” The old store building with the broken whiskey bottles at its side, which has been made into a center where dope addicts can receive help and strength is scoffed at. The coffee house maintained by young people as a bridge between the world of the “ups and ins” and the frightful world of the “down and outs” is sneered at as a project of starry-eyed do-gooders.

But Jesus may be nearer to the slum dwelling, the ramshackle store building, and the coffee house, than he is to the modernistic suburban cathedral with its plush aisle rugs and its stained glass windows. This is so utterly unthinkable to most of us that it appears as heresy. We are hooked by the fact that we “dedicated” the churchly structure to God, with a welcome speech by the mayor.

Of course the word heresy is simply another escape hatch which we have developed. All we need to do is to label a thing “heresy” and we can file it in the “limbo file” and forget it. We overlook the fact that every reformer whom we now honor was branded as a heretic during his lifetime. A hero is merely a heretic who has been dead for a century.

Our plea is that we cease to trust in our rites and rituals as means by which we seek to purchase God’s approval; and move into the world in meaningful encounter, grappling with all of those sinister forces which destroy the dignity of man, and reduce him to a mere animal level. There is not one degrading aspect of life that is not traceable to sin. Sickness, filth, squalor, pestilence, poverty and immorality are the spawn of sin in the world. If sin had not entered as a result of man’s decision, none of these would have troubled us.

And all of us, without exception, have the taint of sin clinging to us. Not one of us can escape its effects. We are sinners seeking to mitigate the consequences of sin because grace has burst upon us in its shining splendor. We could have been the drunk sprawled in the doorway with the sour odor of our own vomit sickening the passerby. We could have been the dope addict puncturing a vein to inject the substance which would temporarily halt the demon tearing and clawing with fiery talons at brain and flesh. We could even yet become either, for temptation, like God, is never far from any one of us.

Can it be that God is fed up with our psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, our pious recital of cliché-laden prayers, and our empty, vacuous, pointless sermons, which are carefully slanted so as to detour around our real sins, and which are filled with innocuous generalities? We seem to forget that God can get enough, even of the stuff which he has asked us to bring. "I have had enough of the burnt offerings, of rams, and the fat of fed beasts." We can drag ourselves reluctantly to meetings and bring things which we think will make God happy, but He may say, "I do not delight in the blood of bullocks, or of lambs, or of he-goats." What is the twentieth century substitute for a bullock or a he-goat?

The prophet represents God as saying that a great deal of what goes for ritual is mere trampling of his courts. This means a milling around aimlessly in so-called holy places, with a sanctimonious expression and a frozen smile. It means going through a performance automatically and mechanically, without ever really involving the heart or inner man. Stilted programs may make God as weary as they do some of the earthly participants, and He may be as bored by some of our midweek prayer meetings as a lot of the members are. "And when you spread forth your hands, I will hide mine eyes from you; when ye make many prayers, I will not hear."

What is the liturgy in which God delights? The answer is unequivocal. It is the sharing of life and love. "Seek Justice, relieve the oppressed, defend the fatherless, plead for the widow." The prophet Jeremiah states it thus, "Execute justice and righteousness, and deliver him that is robbed out of the hand of the oppressor: and do no wrong, do no violence, to the sojourner, the fatherless, nor the widow; neither shed innocent blood in this place."

On the face of this clear declaration, the real service to God may be rendered in the civil courts where Christian attorneys plead without charge the cause of the poor. It may be in statesmanlike conduct of legislators who pass laws against unjust discrimination. It may be in the board of aldermen where men of deep conviction take steps to deliver the depressed ghetto dwellers from the oppression of tyrannical landlords or venial storekeepers who exploit the poor and the ignorant for gain. The treading of sacred courts by cold, indifferent, and unconcerned men and women, who use their votes and ballots to further selfish interests, will not impress God. The Father of all mankind will not be deceived by vain oblations or the noise of solemn assemblies.

All too often the religious establishment has crushed the people of God and ground the faces of the poor. It has not existed to help widows but to take from them. It has equated itself with God and taught stewardship to the institution as the equivalent of faithfulness to God. It has threatened men with hell and perdition if their money was not poured into the coffers. Perhaps the time has come for an impartial investigation of what constitutes service to God and how it differs from the treading of the courts in our generation.

Once the voice of God spoke through the prophet, "Take away from me the noise of your songs; to the melody of your harps I will not listen. But let justice roll down like waters, and righteousness like an everlasting stream." Is this not the God whom we serve?

“The ultimate test of what a truth means is the conduct it dictates or inspires.”— William James.

Our ridiculous and inane divisions constitute a galling yoke bearing down upon the shoulders of the restoration movement. They effectively nullify any appeal for unity which we might make in the halls of religious discussion in our day. They give the lie to any vaunted claim that ours is a superior knowledge of the will of God. Unless we face up realistically to the problem of our own schismatic state we forfeit the right to be heard by honest men and women seeking the road to oneness.

We started out as “a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects.” How did we come to be one of the most divided movements on the current American scene? The answer is not a simple one. It involves human temperament, cultural development, changing environment, and factional animosity. But primarily it stems from adoption of a false philosophy with its attendant train of fallacious premises, and this produced the will to divide. It has left us fragmented, splintered and torn to bits.

What is the approach of orthodox “Church of Christ” editors to our predicament? They have only one. It is to assert over and over in a monotonous fashion that it is a simple question of respect for the authority of the word of God. They saw away at it like a fiddler with a single string and a tight bow. And they only contribute to the division. The fact is that anyone who reads the “official journals” of the party soon realizes that they have no solution to the problem of division. Instead, they actually promote and perpetuate it.

Thinking men and women are becoming a little tired of the arrogant assumption that only one minority group has any real respect for the authority of Jesus while all others are deceived or deceivers. And they are increasingly concerned about which Church of Christ has such respect, seeing that there are a couple of dozen of them, and all of them regard the others as outside the pale. In the intellectual climate of our age it is doubtful that we can fool a great many calm reasoners in the future. We may even have a difficult time keeping a lot of our own members fooled. Thinking is catching, and if it becomes epidemic in proportion, brethren will scale our walls as if they were not there.

It is a little silly, when you sit down quietly and ponder about it, to blame everyone else for the mess in which we find ourselves. Each one of our factions gives itself a clean bill of health while stigmatizing all of the others. All are “loyal” in their own sight. But so long as we are divided none of us are faithful, because our divisions themselves are condemned in no uncertain terms. We are exactly where our thinking has brought us, and we will be tomorrow exactly where our thinking takes us. We are divided because we have thought in terms of division. If we are ever to be united we must think in terms of unity.

I deny emphatically that our problem is lack of respect for the authority of God’s word upon the part of everyone else. That is an escape hatch which we have constructed and into which we can retreat to keep from facing up in meaningful encounter to those who differ with our interpretations and insights. If we can project the idea that all who use instrumental music, or hold pre-millennial views, despise the authority of God's Son and do despite to the Spirit of grace, we can scamper into our bunkers and slam the iron door shut over our heads, and sit inside breathing the perfumed air of our own self-righteousness and let the world go to hell.

The same thing can be done by others who regard support of orphan homes, contributions to Herald of Truth, Sunday schools, individual cups, fermented wine in the Lord's Supper, and a host of other issues, as indicative of a wholesale denial of the authority of the Son of God, and a deliberate attempt by "liberal rebels" to storm the gates of glory and unseat him from his position at the right hand of the Father on high. The result is that instead of having one holy temple composed of living stones, we have pock-marked the earth with little factional hummocks which look more like a prairie dog village than a kingdom of saints. It is a tribute to the longsuffering and patience of God that He has not long ago swatted us into oblivion for our pride and arrogance.

It is sinful enough to have created the kind of sectarian complex which we mistakenly equate with God's purpose, but it is even worse to be satisfied with it and to defend it as the last best hope of a universe wallowing in iniquity. It is time for a reformation, a sweeping reformation, and it should begin with Church-of-Christism. It must begin with an honest renunciation of those false propositions upon which we have constructed our architectural monstrosity with its isolated rooms filled with "brethren in error" gunning for each other through shattered windows. It is time for all of us to regain our integrity regardless of cost. It will no doubt be easier for those who have nothing to lose but their souls.

Let me suggest some things which we must surrender, as I view it, if we are again to become effective as leaven in our age. I do this sincerely, and ask only your sincere consideration of what I say. In reality, there will be little new in what I say, but it must be said in this fashion.

1. We must reject the concept that the restoration of the ancient order means the reproduction in our age of any congregation established by, or existing in the days of the apostles. We cannot go “back to Jerusalem” and we should not want to do so. The congregation at Jerusalem was made up of human beings and was subjected to all of the passions and prejudices which men bring to an institution.

There were problems created by murmuring over food distribution and by dishonesty caused by greed. There were cultural and environmental involvements, and sectarianism within the number. Racial prejudice was a constant source of trouble. It is questionable whether any uncircumcised person was ever invited to eat with the Jerusalem saints.

What we seek to recover is the ideal of God as manifested in Jesus. That ideal was never fully reproduced in any congregation of people in the past. It will not be in our own. But each congregation in every age becomes its own “Jerusalem.” The word of the Christ comes to each group of saints, “So must the change of heart which leads to the forgiveness of sins be proclaimed in his name to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem.”

We make a mistake when we locate Jerusalem on a map of the earth’s surface. Jerusalem is now defined in terms of spirit and reality. “Believe me,” returned Jesus, “the time is coming when worshipping the Father will not be a matter of ‘on this hillside’ or ‘in Jerusalem.’ Nowadays you are worshipping with your eyes shut . . . Yet the time is coming, yes, and has already come, when true worshippers will worship the Father in spirit and reality.”

God declared that Jerusalem was the center of the earth. But the center of the earth for you is where you are. And beyond you lie your Judea, your Samaria, and the uttermost parts of your earth. Renewal does not come by going back to a certain time or place. That which is temporal and spatial belongs to what is visible. “For we are looking all the time not at the visible things but at the invisible. The visible things are transitory: it is the invisible things which are really permanent.” Renewal comes through recovery of proclamation, purpose and power!

2. We must divest ourselves of the notion that every method of Jesus in the implementation of his divinely ordained purpose is equally important with that purpose. This is essential for two reasons. It will deliver us from the hypocrisy we manifest in arbitrarily sorting his actions into two bins labeled “Contemporary Customs” and “Continuing Concerns.” And it will enable us to distinguish between that which was incidental to the doing of the act and its design.

It is a mistake to reason that Jesus intended to provide for us a detailed and meticulous pattern filled with its own jots and tittles. I am old enough to recall when congregations almost split over introduction of a baptistery and even after this convenient accommodation for immersion was installed there were still those who had to be taken to the river and baptized in running water as Jesus was. One purpose of baptism is to introduce all of us into one body, yet there were those who would have fractured the body into bits over the matter of where the act was performed.

In exactly the same vein is the idea that the Lord’s Supper cannot be observed with anything but unleavened bread. Jesus did not choose unleavened bread. He had no choice. He simply took the kind of bread which was the regular diet of the Jews at the time of the Passover and used it. It is an interesting fact that not once is the word azumos, unleavened bread, ever used in connection with the Lord’s Supper. The word is always artos, a loaf, whether leavened or unleavened.

There are those today who are so legalistic they would make even the way the loaf is broken a test of fellowship. I know some brethren who would turn away from the Lord's Supper and refuse to eat and drink in memory of his death if the fruit of the vine was fermented. I know of others who would do the same if it were not. All of these mistake the very genius of the Way and are Judaistic in their approach. They are under law and not grace.

In spite of the fact that they claim to be ardent sticklers for the truth and defenders of the faith, their problem is that they do not know what constitutes either the truth or the faith. In their blind adherence to the letter they crucify the spirit and drive a factional dagger into the very body they claim to revere. The Lord's Supper is a visual depiction that we are all one bread and one body, and any insistence upon a purely incidental feature which will make it impossible for us to eat and drink together is inimical to the very ordinance. The kingdom of heaven is too majestic for its citizenry to spend their lives in nit-picking and finical namby-pamby.

Jesus said, "Surely life is more important than food, and the body more important than the clothes you wear." If this is true of the physical body of man composed of dust, surely the life in Christ is worth more than arguments about individual cups or fermented grape juice. And surely the body of Christ is worth more than any man's opinion about orphan homes or television programs. How long will we continue to frustrate the work of God by our own littleness? How long will we continue in the perverted sense of values we have projected?

3. We must forever free ourselves from the grave error that fellowship is equivalent to endorsement. The very act of equating the two is factional and divisive. It would make all fellowship of men with God impossible, for if God is forced to wait until we are free from every mistaken view before he can be in fellowship with us, there can be no fellowship. It is God's grace which makes it possible for him to accept us. It is sharing in that grace which makes it possible for us to accept others as brethren, even though we cannot sanction all that they do.

If Paul could call the Corinthians a “congregation of God’s people at Corinth, dedicated to him in Christ Jesus, claimed by him as his own” (1 Corinthians 1:2), we should have no problem with any of the brethren whom we know. If he could repeatedly call them “my brothers” and designate them as “God’s garden,” “God’s building,” and “God’s temple,” we should be ashamed of our unlovely attitudes toward our brethren.

The fact is that brethren who refuse to recognize and call upon God’s children to pray, simply because they hold a different view about instrumental music or the millennium are not mature saints. They are infantile and childish. It is difficult to imagine those who claim to be children of the Father “setting at nought a brother” because of a divergent view of orphan homes, colleges, cups and classes.

That we could ever become so irrational and undiscerning as a people seems almost unthinkable. Those who defend such a fatuous course should be ashamed to live and afraid to die.

Regardless of what is said about the mistaken ideas relative to such things, it is the man who makes such matters a test of fellowship who is guilty before God of creating division in the body of Christ. No man can be held accountable for endorsing what he personally disavows. I am in the fellowship with many brethren with whom I disagree, and with thousands who engage in practices I cannot personally endorse. But I cherish our family relationship and our unity in Christ Jesus as of more worth than any view or opinion of those in my Lord, and I shall not separate the saints, nor drive them away because of our lack of mutual understanding of some things.

We have charted a course which makes us appear as a group of inconsistent eccentrics in the very religious realm which we started out to penetrate with the glad tidings that unity is possible in Christ Jesus. Our present philosophy forces us to be modern Ishmaels, with “our hand against every man and every man’s hand against us.” It is time for us to renounce what God calls “a wild ass” existence of extremism and exclusivism. Let brethren hold their views about supporting orphan homes, the Herald of Truth, cups, colleges, classes, etc., but let us search for situations where we can labor together. Why keep up a continual clamor and a din of agitation about those things which have not one thing to do with our relationship in Christ Jesus?

4. We must rebel against the factional leadership of preachers and editors whose purpose is to maintain our sectarian status quo and who are dedicated to the inglorious task of thwarting every meaningful move toward a greater sense of oneness among the believers. In spite of all the exalted tributes paid to congregational autonomy by partisan journalists, our congregations are not free from fear. It is a farce to claim that they are. Every faction has an earthly headquarters to furnish an “infallible interpretation” as a guideline for the adherents of the party and almost everyone of these is built around a paper. By carefully filtering out opposing views and by lop-sided editing the people can be kept in ignorance of what goes on in the religious realm. Government by “editorcracy” enables the central power structure to reach into far-off places and ruin the courageous souls who will not conform.

The news that is printed is slanted to favor the factional position, playing up every gain from other sources but never hinting at defections from the party. To read only one paper regularly one might be led to believe it was the only one being published. A conspiracy of silence forbids favorable mention of any other journal. There is abundant evidence that many of the more perceptive students in our day are beginning to resent self-appointed censors and a rough time ahead can be predicted for those who have confused brotherhood with “smotherhood.”

We must recapture the right of brethren to read the word of God for themselves, to form their own conclusions, to question and to be questioned. The day of the dictatorial “Curia” is gone. It belonged to the Dark Ages of superstition and ignorance when men could not read and the printed word was a “sealed book” until someone literate happened along. It is time to throw open the window and let in fresh air. It is time to turn the full glare of the spotlight of truth upon our positions and practices. Let’s rip apart the paper curtains which separate us and let the sun shine into all of our darkened factional cubicles. We are not rats that we should cherish the gloom of isolation. We are brethren. Let the truth be known.

5. We must develop the courage to speak out boldly against the intolerance and bigotry which characterize the sectarian attitude of which our brethren are victims. We must restore a prophetic ministry with its power and penetration. The word of God must be to us as a fire, and as a hammer that breaks the rock in pieces. We dare not to sell our souls for money or barter away our integrity for a position. “Is life so dear, or peace so sweet, as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery? Forbid it, Almighty God!”

Let lesser men cringe and cower before the forces of tradition and custom, but let those who love the Lord rise up and batter down the walls of hate and spite which keeps God’s children apart. Let us ignore these human barriers and share with our brethren wherever they are. Shall we continue to be like barnyard fowl, tamed, domesticated and with wings clipped by the scissors of conformity? Shall we cluck in contentment inside of our pens while a world goes up in flames around us?

The time has come for the saints to unfurl the flag of brotherhood, to transcend the human limitations imposed by those who have usurped the prerogatives which belong to all the citizens of the kingdom. It is just not true that all of the brethren who differ with us reject the authority of Jesus Christ. Many of them simply reject our claim to be the supreme court to interpret for all mankind the revealed will of the Father. To reject our authority is not to deny the authority of heaven. Those who really deny the authority of Jesus are those who assume for themselves the role of official interpreters to whose dicta every knee must bow and every tongue must confess.

I want the whole wide world to know that, as a free man in Christ Jesus, I shall serve all of my brothers in Him. I refuse to forfeit my liberty to pope, prelate, preacher or priest. I shall not bow the knee to canon, curate or cleric. To my own Master I shall stand or fall and to him I shall allow all others to give answer. We can overcome the ecclesiastical serfdom into which we have fallen if we love God enough to make the sacrifice. But we must convert our dreams into decisions. It is not enough to gaze at the Star; we must start following it if we are to find Him.

As John Tyndall put it back in 1871, “The brightest flashes in the world of thought are incomplete until they have been proven to have their counterparts in the world of fact.” Come on, brethren, let’s go!

The Unmistakable Scent

[Abstract]

“Thanks be to God who leads us, wherever we are, on Christ’s triumphant way and makes our knowledge of him spread throughout the world like a lovely perfume! We Christians have the unmistakable ‘scent’ of Christ, discernible alike to those who are being saved and to those who are heading for death. To the latter it seems like the deathly smell of doom, to the former it has the refreshing fragrance of life itself” (2 Corinthians 2:14-16).

At first glance it seems rather incongruous to compare the spread of knowledge in the world with the pervasion of the atmosphere by perfume. On second thought it may be agreed that the illustration is quite appropriate. Men tend to breathe in the glory of Christ and are affected by it exactly as they are stimulated by the sense of smell.

The picture in the mind of Paul was the stirring one of a Roman triumph. This was the most elaborate spectacle ever staged in the Empire. A conquering general returning to his homeland was accorded this glittering honor. The conqueror was arrayed in a lustrous robe of rich purple, embroidered with gold thread depicting his victories. A crown of pure gold rested upon his head, while a branch of laurel, the symbol of victory, was carried in his hand.

He rode in a beautiful chariot decorated with plates of ivory and chains of gold. The chariot was drawn by a team of white horses. Standing at the back of the general was a slave who continually screamed accusations and described in a loud voice his weaknesses and vices. This was a provision to keep him humble and to overcome pride.

Musicians led the procession, while the chariot was followed by wagons loaded with spoils, and by a train of kings, princes and captains who were captives of war. Attendants accompanied the parade waving censers of perfumed incense reserved only for such occasions. Always some of the captives who had violated covenants and rebelled were led to death, while others who had been submissive were liberated. Frequently these became allies.

Thus, some of those who smelled the perfume wafted upon the air from the swinging censers knew that it betokened the approach of death, while others recognized that it was a portent of the life and liberty which would soon be accorded unto them.

The apostle knew that his description would be understood at Corinth. Two centuries before he wrote, Lucius Mummius, a Roman consul, had swept across their province and laid Corinth and other cities waste. The Roman senate accorded him a triumph, and bestowed upon him the name Achaicus because of his devastation of Achaia. Written into the official annals of the city were the names of those who had been taken to Rome, some to be killed and others to be saved from death.

Now the apostle was in the vanguard of another conquest of Corinth. This one was made with the sword of the Spirit and not the blade of steel. So he wrote to them in this same letter, "The battle we are fighting is on the spiritual level. The very weapons we use are not those of human warfare but powerful in God's warfare for the destruction of the enemy's strongholds. Our battle is to bring down every deceptive fantasy and every imposing defence that men can erect against the true knowledge of God.”

In our lead passage he ascribes thanks to God for the divine leadership which makes possible the triumphant procession of Christ everywhere. Throughout the world the incense of the testimony of the apostles is wafted upward like a lovely perfume, and the atmosphere of every nook and cranny of the Greek world is infused by it.

Wherever Christians go the scent of Christ is perceived. It is unique and unmistakable, a blend of the finest qualities of grace and truth. It purifies the air and makes life more pleasant and endurable. Yet it is a heady fragrance which has a varied effect. Those who are heading for death imagine it to be the smell of doom, bringing with it the anticipation of grave disaster. To the rest it is the very breath of life itself. I know because I am in the victory train by adoption of the captain of my salvation, through his grace.

Spiritual Pioneers

[Abstract]

The spirit of adventure! This is the thing which Christians have often lost in our day. It is this loss which reduces our lives to a treadmill existence, which makes us heavy and stodgy. This is what contributes to a mere “treading of the courts” by weary, bored and apathetic worshippers. There are no frontiers to conquer, no forts to storm. The dream of world conquest has faded. The vision of the King before whom the celestial princes cast down their crowns has blended with and become lost in the murky haze of the passing centuries.

It does not need to be so. There are greater dragons breathing destructive fire in our day than were ever conjured up by fertile imaginations in the bygone days of myth and chivalry. And ours are real! There are giants stalking through our land wearing seven-league boots and threatening to crush all that we hold dear and revere. But we have allowed ourselves to become blindfolded with the rags of tradition and of the status quo until our imagination has drained away and our will to fight has been washed down the drain.

There is little courage required to drive to the “church parking lot” on Sunday morning and enter the educational building to discuss the lesson of the day as set forth in a quarterly so designed as to offend no one. Nor does one have to be especially brave to sit in a cushioned pew designed for his bodily ease while watching a presentation in which the chief actor must manicure his lines so as to start evacuating the clock-watchers promptly at the stroke of twelve.

This kind of thing is called “Christianity” by millions in our day. And it has produced a smug, complacent, lukewarm institution which makes even God want to vomit. There is the soul-warping pride in property and real estate holdings, the glory in the glamor of bricks and concrete, the shameful boasting in temples made with men’s hands, despite the plain statement that God is not worshipped in such. And there is often the even more detestable sin of influence peddling, of political wirepulling, of base maneuvering for positions of power by clerical aspirants, who are not honest enough to admit they are a special clergy. We earnestly wish that such language could be proven extreme, that someone could show indisputably that the conditions we have mentioned simply do not exist. It would cheer our hearts to know that we are wrong. But our hope lies not in the apathetic mass. Rather it is found in the lives of the venturesome few, the spiritual vikings who dare to turn the prows of their boats into uncharted seas. I know some of these pioneers.

There are missionaries who are sick of being mere forerunners of a sect, and who have dared to cut themselves loose from the financial apron strings which bound them to the alma mater which we have fashioned. They are setting their faces toward strange cities and forbidding jungles, going only to tell men of the resurrected Lord of life, and to lead them into a vital relationship with Him, unfettered by American ways and culture.

There are the schoolteachers who are turning their backs on plush positions in suburban educational plants, and by deliberate choice going into the fetid, stinking ghettos, to teach the hopeless and deprived human spawn, gasping to hold their heads up and to swim in a slimy sea of despondency and desperation.

There are the college young people turning a deaf ear to the enticing offers of great industrial complexes to open up “talk shops” and “coffee houses” in the inner city where dope-pushers, pimps and prostitutes ply their devious trades and sell living human flesh as nonchalantly as dead animals are peddled in meat markets. These young Christians are literally trying to throw out the lifeline to sinking mariners battered and buffeted by waves of passion and storms of hate.

There are the university students who dare to challenge the smut-merchants and obscenity-hawkers, and who bring a witness to bear where secularism has planted her inglorious standard. These trust in God and in the power of His might and refuse to be deterred from their dedicated service to Him whose name they bear.

There are the fathers and mothers who maintain unswerving discipline motivated by love, the men and women in shops and offices who refuse to lower their ethical standards, the neighbors who dare to be different from a decadent society, and others who have heard the clear ring of the trumpet on distant heights and who would plant their feet on higher ground.

All of these are bold followers of Him who ran the gauntlet of men’s passions and sins, and fearlessly faced the foes wherever He met them. The spirit of daring is not dead. There are still those who stand athwart the path and battle evil without flinching. To them the Way is not one of cold indifference or calculated neutrality. And these will be the vanguard on that day “when the saints go marching in.”

In the meantime they must cut their way through our own labyrinth of red tape and meet the opposition which resents taking the battle to the streets and market-places for fear that it will besmirch our image. We must maintain at all costs our clean-cut suburban look so that an affluent society will compliment us for our community spirit even while they resist the Holy Spirit. It would be wonderful if we could entice the forces of Satan to come to our vantage points where we could anesthetize them instead of battling them. Since they will not do so we hail those who have the courage to go where the action is. Too many of us confuse the vineyard with the storage shed and spend a lifetime “picking over” the same grapes.

Vocabulary Problems

Mission Messenger (April 1969)

Volume 31

“Abuse of words has been the great instrument of sophistry and chicanery, of party, faction, and division of society.”— John Adams (March 31, 1819).

Jesus did not come to earth merely to create an institution, composed of folks who are nice to be around. The tears which coursed down his cheeks when he bade Jerusalem farewell, and the sweat and blood which caked with the dust on his thorn-lacerated brow as he died on the cross give silent witness that there was more to it than that.

Actually, his advent marked another decisive stage in a cosmic conflict. It was not the last event in the battle of the ages by any means, but it set the stage for it, and guaranteed that when the final trumpet blast dies away, victory will be on the side of the forces of righteousness. It is difficult for mere mortals to realize that there is a realm of darkness, inhabited by demonic forces, a kingdom of conspiracy engaged in a malevolent plot against all who have chosen to march under the crimson banner of the Messiah.

In our sophisticated age it is popular to deny that there are intelligent beings in either a celestial realm or an infernal region. When man becomes his own god he has no need of angels or heaven. The concept of evil spirits antagonistic to a world of peace and order is regarded as a relic of an age of fantasy and superstition. It is a myth from the misty past unworthy of notice by enlightened moderns.

Allow me then to announce that, in spite of all the arguments set forth by brilliant theologians and philosophers, I am unmoved in my conviction that there is a prince of the power of the air, and that he has at his command malignant legions who are desperately concerned with what is transpiring in our world today. We are not wrestling with flesh and blood. There are principalities and powers, a hierarchy of rebel spirits cast out of heaven because of anarchy. There are world rulers of darkness. There are malicious spiritual forces in the heavenly places. They operate according to the strategy devised by the evil one, responding to his orders and commands.

The war which resulted in defeat for the insurrectionists in heaven has been transferred to earth. We are engaged in it, wittingly or unwittingly. No one who is rational escapes involvement. No one can “sit this one out.” Jesus took upon him the form of a slave and was made flesh, that by means of death he might destroy him who had the power over death, that is the devil. He laid down his life that he might take it again.

Although the ultimate decision is certain, the struggle goes on in unabated fury. Only man has a low estimate of it. The angels know the stress and the strain. The demons also know. It is war to them, war to the hilt, war in all of its stark reality, war in all of its destructive power and force and tragedy. The prince on the black horse is a master strategist, capable of plotting the end of a world made by the Creator himself. His slavish minions follow unquestioningly in his train.

I have neither the time nor the inclination to set down here all of the means which I believe are employed by the forces of the Dark Brigade. But I do want to mention a few things of which all of us should be made aware “lest Satan take advantage of us.” We must know something about the tactics of the foe if we are to acquit ourselves with honor in the struggle.

After the second great world war it was revealed that Germany had printed millions of pieces of counterfeit currency to be bootlegged in the allied countries and placed in circulation. This is a device which has been utilized many times in the past. It is intended to demoralize the economic structure of a nation and create panic by destroying confidence in the government.

This ruse is also applied in the spiritual realm where Satan’s emissaries upset values by alteration of the terminology used by the Spirit. Language is the currency which is the medium of exchange in the domain of thought. To attach meanings to words which are foreign to their original implications is to undermine God’s purpose. When God wanted men to scatter in order to populate the earth they sought to remain together in defiance of his purpose. It was necessary to bring about a confusion of tongues to separate them.

It is now the desire of God to gather his people, but Satan, taking a cue from the episode at Babel, has kept them from all speaking the same thing by again causing a confusion of tongues. There is hardly a word of any significance which was coined or employed by the Spirit that has not been counterfeited or devalued. One of the most essential things in our day is the recovery of the vocabulary of the Spirit. This means more than merely speaking where the Bible speaks. It also entails speaking as the Bible speaks. Such words as church, faith, repentance, baptism, predestination, atonement, bishop and priest, have all been warped or twisted and made to represent a different set of values than that intended by God. They should be recaptured and restored to their proper place. Instead of that, well-meaning individuals contribute to the confusion by their injudicious usage of expressions which are alien to God’s word.

A CASE IN POINT

A good example is found in a practice which is all too common. In some youth camps a highly emotional setting is created and while the embers of a campfire are dying down, a special appeal is made to Christian boys and girls to step forward and volunteer for “full-time Christian service.” Those who do so are given special commendation and are designated as “life recruits.” It is expected that they will study to be missionaries, “local ministers,” or special functionaries to be supported by the rest of their brethren.

It is not my intention here to examine the wisdom of bringing pressure upon those who are entering puberty and are beset by strong internal feelings involving doubt, fear and developing idealism. To take advantage of pliable and plastic minds which are under the trauma of turmoil and force upon them a grave decision of vocation which they are not prepared to make does not appeal to me. One reason that it does not is because I have talked to too many who have grown older and feel that they were “conned” into something by undue persuasion.

Some of these have come to suffer a guilt-complex because they found that they were not temperamentally or otherwise equipped to carry out an impulsive decision made in immaturity. And this is intensified by the thought that their emotional response constituted a covenant with God and they do not want to “go back on God” by entering another occupational field for which they are much better adapted.

However, my chief concern here does not relate to the personal or psychological angle, important as I consider it to be. I am rather disturbed by the false concept of the kingdom of heaven exhibited by those who promote such things. To imply that Christians must do something additional to being born again to become “lifetime recruits” is to imply that those who do not do that something else are not lifetime recruits.

The fact is that every child of God is a recruit for life and the initial pledge of allegiance to Christ, validated by baptism inducts all who obey into “full-time service.” To have some Christians step forward and “enlist for full-time service” is to leave the impression that those who do not engage in such a public demonstration are not obligated to serve the Lord full time. I can think of nothing which will create more apathy in the hearts of the majority than to relegate them to the status of second-rate Christians by such methods as are employed.

Every psychologist is aware that there are always some who will come forward at any appeal and volunteer for any task. Sometimes these are the least qualified. Others more modest and unassuming may have greater potential, but will shrink from any exhibition. But this is not the chief objection. It is simply that every Christian surrendered his life to Jesus upon acceptance of him as Lord and Christ. It is harmful to the life of the body to make it appear that some members only function on a part-time basis. Indeed, such a thing would disrupt bodily functions and paralyze the organism.

To this it is objected that the call is only made for some to volunteer for full time “church work.” And I answer that there is no such thing. What we call “the church” is the community of saints, and whatever I do in word or deed as a member of that community in the name of Jesus, is a response to the Spirit. Not only is the expression “church work” not found in the sacred scriptures, but there is nothing equivalent to it. The very idea is pre-Christian and stems from Judaism, under which one tribe constituted the priests who ministered unto God while all others were limited in service.

Jesus died to remove such differences and distinctions. In Him we are all members of a royal priesthood, a chosen generation, a holy nation, and a purchased people of God. There is no distinction between clergy and laity. The word for clergy means “lot, or portion,” and all of us are God’s lot or portion. The word for laity means “people,” and we are all God’s people. All of God’s laity are his clergy, and vice versa.

It is true that we have varied talents and functions but one is no more important than another. The man who goes to Africa to teach black children to become literate, and to bring glad tidings to native villages, is no more valuable to God’s purpose than one who labors all day at desk or lathe to support his family, and spends a night each week in the inner city ghetto teaching school drop-outs how to read and bringing the Presence into such an environment of dark despair and abject hopelessness.

I know women who teach all day in a school room, and men who work many hours in service stations, and who take a part of what they earn from tiring and exhausting labor and contribute it to the support of families on mission fields. The apostle calls such assistance “a lovely fragrance, a sacrifice that pleases the very heart of God.” He designates it as “the fellowship of giving and receiving.” Those who give are “fellow-workers whose names are in the book of life.”

There is an idea extant that God calls men to the pulpit or to mission fields, and that this is “the high calling.” Such an idea is without scriptural foundation. It was to the whole body of “God’s people at Ephesus, believers incorporate in Christ Jesus,” that Paul wrote, “I entreat you, then, as God has called you, live up to your calling.” Our call is to be reconciled to God, to pledge allegiance to Christ. How we implement that call is up to us. All of us are called.

We cannot all do the same things because we are not all adapted or gifted to do the same things. But whatever we do in honor to his name is part of our calling and we all need each other. Priscilla and Aquila were serving God as much while making tents as while teaching Apollos. Paul wrote to the Thessalonians, “Let it be your ambition to keep calm and look after your own business, and to work with your hands, as we ordered you, so that you may command the respect of those outside your own number, and at the same time may never be in want.”

This instruction is sandwiched in between an admonition on brotherly love and a brilliant revelation about the resurrection from the dead. It is evident that manual labor and gainful employment occupies a high priority in heaven’s thinking. The point is that all of us are God’s ministers and we are ministers all of the time. A man who operates a garbage truck all week and speaks to a little country congregation on Sunday is not just a minister on Sunday. He is a minister every day and may actually contact more people out of Jesus while on his route than while in the pulpit.

We make a mistake when we think that the only way to reach men for Christ is to deliver “a sermon.” The word “sermon” is not in the Bible. Origen was the father of “the sermon” and the president of the first theological seminary. We overlook the fact that people may be won simply by observing how we behave. “In the same spirit you married women should adapt yourselves to your husbands, so that even if they do not obey the Word of God they may be won to God without any word being spoken, simply by seeing the pure and reverent behavior of you, their wives.”

It is true that the wife has a more constant and intimate relationship with her husband than one has with other clerks in a store, or with other mechanics in a shop, or with customers on the route. But the pure and reverent behavior can be observed anywhere and it is affirmed that men may be won to God by seeing it, even when no word is spoken. We are to be as lights in a crooked and perverse generation. Lights do not make a noise or call attention to themselves. They simply shine.

Peter puts it this way, "After all, who in the ordinary way is likely to injure you for being enthusiastic for good? . . . You need neither fear their threats nor worry about them; simply concentrate on being completely devoted to Christ in your hearts." To be enthusiastic for good is the real need for our day, but this is not necessarily the same as going all out for some specific method or program of doing good. Let me illustrate the point.

In these days of organized activity a special "calling night" may be set up and pressures brought to bear to get as many as possible to come to the meetingplace and go out in pairs to call upon unsaved persons in the neighborhood. Often those who feel unqualified for such activity do not show up, and there may be a tendency to think of them as slackers. This may not be the case at all.

It is not my intention to speak derogatorily of such efforts. I rejoice at every person who may be won to Christ by whatever means. Yet it remains that a formal program may not be a proof of faithfulness but an admission of weakness. When men do not assume their responsibility naturally we seek by organization to coerce them into doing something through a sense of duty. However, neighbors may resent being disturbed in the evening by those who come simply because they want to make a report and add them to a statistical chart.

And it is true that those who do not appear for a structured calling program set up by the chairman of an organization designated for the task, may do more good by simply being a neighbor all of the time. When a lawyer asked Jesus, "Who is my neighbor?" the answer in the form of a human interest story was simply that it was one who helped another along the road when he was helpless. It is possible that more good may be done by sharing in the burdens and problems of others than by calling on them because you drew their file card and they unwittingly became your clients by remote assignment.

It is the very essence of our life in Christ that we be constantly concerned about humanity and the needs of those about us, regardless of race, creed or color. This concern cannot be turned on one night per week because that is the announced time for calling. Instead of setting up a program for a few who are already overworked why should we not rather instill in the whole company of the saints an unselfish commitment until they will automatically and spontaneously respond with compassion to every need in whatever way they can? In one place of which I know the man who had charge of the calling program would not speak to one of his fellow-elders.

Certainly there is nothing wrong about a systematic canvass of a neighborhood to solicit opportunities to talk with others about the meaning of Jesus in our lives, nor is there anything wrong about having a calling program. But to go reluctantly to engage in such work simply because of a fear that one will be thought disloyal, and to regard as unworthy those who may seek to influence others in a different way and at other times, is not an especially Christian attitude.

We need to be cautious about activities dreamed up and drummed up by men in authority and saddled upon all of the saints without their previous knowledge or consent. It is very easy for men who are extroverts to promote a scheme which they think will “enhance the image of the church,” and to make those who are not qualified to push it, feel like second-class citizens of the kingdom if they do not actively participate. Some of the most effective service is rendered to our Lord by those who simply go on quietly sharing daily with those who are burdened by the demands of life.

As I view it, one of the most unspiritual manifestations of the institutional church is its crass manipulation of human beings in such a manner as to promote the ends of the organization. Man was not made for the church, but the church was made for man. Too often this is reversed and men are valued according to what they contribute to the power structure. The “church” forgets that it is on earth to serve, and becomes imbued with the idea that it exists to be served.

We live in an age of rivalry and competition. We are part of a success-oriented society. This is a time when that which counts is limited to the data which can be fed into a computer. We are caught up in “the numbers racket.” In such a culture men are reduced to statistics. The nose count becomes more important than the heart throb.

PLAYING GAMES

This is seen in the attendance games which “churches” play. One challenges another to see which one can get the most bodies inside the door for Sunday School during a given month. The promotional material goes out and publicity releases are mailed. When the whistle blows for the start of the game there is a flurry of excitement. Announcements are given from the speaker’s stand after long distance calls have been made to see which one is setting the pace. The box score is published each week. If it is close the “world” stands still until the winner is announced and the horseplay is ended, after which a return can be made to the plush-lined rut.

We are becoming accustomed to the pranks played by those on the college campus who seek to overcome their boredom by devious methods involved in getting “the most” into something. Once it was seeing who could swallow the most live goldfish, then who could pile the most persons into a telephone booth, and finally who could cram the greatest number of people into a Volkswagen. It is apparent that our own image-formers are not wholly anti-intellectual. They are willing to learn at least some things from those on the college campus.

Along the same line may be noted the current procedure in holding what one segment calls “revivals” but which another carefully designates “gospel meetings.” A good case may be made out that both are mistaken in their designations. It is a frequent procedure to engage in an intensive visitation program a week or more in advance and get the prospects to commit themselves to “go forward” at the invitation on the first day. This “saving up” of converts creates a mass appeal and makes the visiting preacher look good.

Actually this amounts to skillful manipulation of men for whom Jesus died in order to adorn the organizational image. There is some indication in our day that people are tired of being pawns. In our age of increasing knowledge they can see through the schemes devised to make the church and the preacher appear to be something which they may not be. I am not a prophet but I predict that it will become increasingly more difficult to get people “down the aisle.” For those who become discouraged at such a prospect we point out that this has no real relationship to getting them into the Christ.

The burden of our message in this article may be summarized in the following points.

1. Almost every word employed by the Holy Spirit through the envoys of Christ has been abused and given a misleading connotation in our generation. It should be one of our tasks to rescue the terminology from error and restore it to its proper place so that it will once more communicate the thought of God.

2. We need to emphasize that every Christian is a life recruit in real service for Jesus. Every one is a member of the body, a living part of a vital organism, in whatever circumstances he finds himself. Jesus was the Son of God while attending weddings, visiting friends, presiding at a fish fry, walking through a wheat field, or riding a donkey into town. And we are God’s children wherever we are.

3. We must abandon our unscriptural and misleading distinctions which perpetuate the idea that life is compartmentalized into tidy little boxes called “secular” and “spiritual.” No labor is secular labor when performed by a Christian, for God is there. And his presence sanctifies the place. A man who works with his own hands is obeying God as surely as one who spends his time preaching, supported by those who engage in manual labor.

4. The “high calling of God” is not to a special few to enter a pulpit and talk down to those who sit in orderly pews before them. Instead, it is the call to all to come into Christ and then go into a disorderly world of sin and shame as He did. It is not to shut ourselves off from all temptations, but to be tempted in all points as he was, and yet to be without sin.

Our “churches” are too often “heavens” of our own construction where we imagine that we can dwell with God aloof from the world. But Jesus left heaven to penetrate the world of mankind. If we will follow him we must get the salt out of the shaker, the dynamite out of the box, the heaven out of the refrigerator, and the bushel off the lampstand.

5. There must be a recognition that we cannot all do the same thing in the same way, but that whatever we can do we must do, and we are all important to the body. The hand cannot do the work of the foot, nor the ear the work of the eye. We tend to emphasize and even glorify the speaking function, but Paul might ask us, “After all, if the body were all mouth, for example, where would be the sense of hearing? Or if it were all tongue where would be the sight?” He would no doubt remind us that “God appointed each limb and organ to its own place in the body, as he chose.”

6. We must avoid the conclusion that the only way men can function is through organized activity or by a program conceived in the minds of a few and then “sold” to the congregations. A program is a tool, and it may or may not be a good one. It always appears good to its inventor for one loves a brain-child as he does a natural child. But programs, like all other human expedients and devices, are expendable. They are not absolutes. The essential thing is to get the job done for the Master. No one else can do the work which I am obligated to do, nor can I do the work of any other. We can plan and work together in many areas but one need not join me in every enterprise to be faithful to God's design for his life. We must allow freedom for all to work as they are able to do so under his authority.

7. We should examine our hearts constantly and very carefully to determine if we are motivated by a spirit of sectarian rivalry. This is one of the most subtle weapons in the arsenal of Satan. There is ever a danger that we will use the church, the gospel, or even the souls of men, to elevate ourselves into positions of prominence. I am sure that this temptation gripped me during a lot of my earlier life. I rationalized that I was serving Jesus when really I was concerned about my own image in the faction which constituted our miniature universe and which we conceived of as exhausting the possibilities of the kingdom of heaven.

I have come to realize that the sectarian spirit breeds dishonesty and cowardice. The party elevates one into prominence because it can glory in his ability, which often is very insignificant when seen objectively. Most of us are egocentric and selfish, and we can be easily led to prostitute our talents if others fawn upon us. We deceive ourselves and project a false image, even concealing our real feelings, in order not to jeopardize our standing. Our braggadocio and strutting may serve to conceal our own emptiness and insecurity.

What a thrill it is to be knocked down by the light and arise to realize that all of your past values are flushed down the drain by a crimson stream of blood. When the scales fall from your eyes and you can see men as God sees them, you are free from your crying human need to be sure that your mask is on straight and that your halo rides at the right angle. You do not even need to smile if your heart is breaking. You can cry and not be ashamed.

One of the greatest things we can do for our brethren is to lift from their backs the yoke of sham and pretence which the factional spirit with its masquerade and mummery forces them to wear. Let us free men to be real, to love and cherish as their hearts yearn to do. “Why do you now provoke God by laying on the shoulders of these a yoke which neither we nor our fathers were able to bear?” I want to dedicate my life to lifting and smashing yokes hewn by men to saddle as burdens upon their brethren, for “God who can read men’s minds, showed his approval of them by giving the Holy Spirit to them, as he did to us” (Acts 15:8). Turn God’s people loose!

8. Finally, we must cease to think of our brethren as cogs to keep the wheels turning. While it is true that by love we are to serve one another, it is not true that God intended for men to become serfs or vassals of a mere institution. There is no indication that service is to be commanded under threat. We are not puppets dangling on a string which can be yanked from a remote office. We are not expected to dance to the tune of self-appointed pipers.

The fact is that the welfare of man is the chief concern of heaven. All ordinances, orders and arrangements have been given, not as ends in themselves, but because they contribute to this greater end. Man was not made for the sabbath, but the sabbath was made for man. And the Son of man is Lord even of the sabbath. This means that we must think of the body of Christ as having come to serve and not to be served. Jesus did not suffer to create an institution to provide authoritative positions for a chosen few. He died for men, for sinners. And whatever offices and functions are among us must be utilized for the common good.

The apostles were first in God's arrangement, yet Paul wrote, "Do not think we are dictating the terms of your faith; your hold on the faith is secure enough. We are working with you for your own happiness." He asked the question which all of us should ask. "For what point is there in my depressing the very people who can give me such joy?" (2 Corinthians 2:2).

The Planned Experience

Mission Messenger (April 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

“We want our transitory life to be absorbed into the life that is eternal. Now the power that has planned this experience for us is God, and he has given us his spirit as a guarantee of its truth” (2 Corinthians 5:4, 5).

There are some thrilling bits of literature, both ancient and modern, which deal with the meaning of death, but for sheer beauty of expression and encouragement to hope, none of them can hold a candle to the words of Paul as written to the former pagans at Corinth. Probably I am impressed by them because I am aware of what a change they wrought in the lives of those who were slaves to superstition. But they are timeless words and they also penetrate my consciousness like a stray sunbeam in an attic.

To wonder about pain and suffering, and of what lies beyond their reach is as universal as death itself. If death is all there is, if it is the ultimate, the end, then there is no sense at all to existence. It is a nightmare which ends not in an awakening, but in oblivion. But if suffering and death are part of a plan leading to a transcendent experience, they are at least understandable. And that is the thesis of the apostle.

Paul begins by saying, “We wish you could see how all this is working out for your benefit,” and immediately involves God's grace in the whole scheme of things. He affirms that, "This is the reason we never collapse." It seems evident that if one can grasp the significance of grace and come to rely upon it, he has a foundation for a sane evaluation of self and destiny. Grace supports us in every trial and the greater the suffering, the more grace God gives.

One must not be naive, nor should he generalize beyond reason, but is it possible that one reason why there are so many who fold up under the strain and tension is because there is so little comprehension of grace? Has our legalistic approach which makes God a police judge instead of a Father, unfitted us for a life free from worry and concern for self? Are we moving about with inner doubts and fears until we are actually "haunted houses?" Do the ghosts of our past transgressions pour out of the darkened crannies of our hearts?

Grace frees us from inner dread. It also enables us to endure suffering, to be reconciled to a life of pain. And it all comes about because we are empowered to see the things that are invisible. This is the secret of abounding Joy. If one sees only the things that are visible— poverty, dirt, filth, squalor, crime, wounds, and putrefying sores— he may actually lose his balance. If he envisions war, agony, lacerated flesh, and the pallor of death, he will grow bitter and become disillusioned.

But if he sees beyond these into the unseen, he will be strengthened with might in the inner man to press on untiringly. Somewhere there is a place where the rivers are not polluted but a clear stream flows pure as crystal. Somewhere there is a city whose heart is not a decaying ghetto and where sin cannot corrupt. Somewhere there is a fadeless day and the sun does not go down by night, because the glory of God is the light. If one believes this he can then freely admit that he lives on earth as an exile and foreigner. And the things that happen to him are natural for one who is not in his native land.

Of course, we can always get hooked on the problem of whether this is literal or figurative, but this does not bother me one bit. I am not always sure of what I can see, when it comes to classification and interpretation. A few generations ago what was classed as science fiction is now known as reality by every schoolboy. With faith in God I can proceed in hope and allow him to work out the details. It is only when I am tempted to play God and get everything on the shelf and properly labeled that I get into difficulty. Not everything in the universe fits the labels prepared in advance and handed out by science.

So “these little troubles (which are really so transitory) are winning for us a permanent, glorious and solid reward out of all proportion to our pain.” One may even choose pain if he realizes that it is the road to a better life. Thus, a cripple with a twisted foot is willing to subject himself to surgery and weeks of discomfort if he knows that at the end he will be able to walk straight. Pain is only intolerable when it seems aimless and pointless. One who would never enter a tunnel when it is endless has no reluctance to enter one which terminates in a bright and beautiful valley on the other side of the mountain.

Life on earth is likened to living in a tent. This is an apt figure, because such a dwelling is adapted to a nomadic existence. But we have the promise that when the tent is taken down, we have a permanent house in heaven, made by God. Death actually does the Christian a favor, freeing him from a body of pain, and preparing him for a life of closeness with Christ. A Christian does not leave home when he dies, he goes home!

I am a believer! I believe that this transitory life will be absorbed into eternal life. I believe that this experience has been planned by God’s power. I believe that the Holy Spirit personally dwells in me as a guarantee that the divine purpose will be carried out. I’m standing on the promises. I’m resting on his grace. I’m leaning on the everlasting arms. And that’s the reason I can say with the apostle, “This makes us confident, whatever happens.”

In distinguishing between security and joy, C. S. Lewis writes, “The security we crave would teach us to rest our hearts in this world and oppose an obstacle to our return to God: a few moments of happy love, a landscape, a symphony, a merry meeting with our friends, a bathe or a football match, have no such tendency. Our Father refreshes us on the journey with some pleasant inns, but will not encourage us to mistake them for home.”

The Complete Eclipse

Mission Messenger (April 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

“And while it is true that the former temporary glory has been completely eclipsed by the latter, we do well to remember that it is eclipsed simply because the present permanent plan is such a very much more glorious thing than the old.” (2 Corinthians 3:10, 11).

Our more immediate fathers in the faith, when dealing with the evolution of revelation, divided history into three eras which they designated Patriarchal, Jewish and Christian dispensations. In order to show that God’s light was given on an increasing scale of intensity, they spoke of the Starlight, Moonlight and Sunlight Ages. The Moonlight Age began with the covenant announced at Sinai, the Sunlight Age with the covenant at Mount Sion.

In the chapter from which our initial statement is taken, the apostle Paul refers to these two as the old covenant and the new covenant. His purpose is to show the superiority of the latter as compared to the former, and provide for us an incentive to fulfill our role in the significant reflection of the glory of God. He did not write to provide “sermon material” for a formal address on the subject, nor to furnish argumentative fuel for debate. The design was to enable us to translate into life “the ever-increasing splendor” which comes from seeing the glory with unveiled faces.

When God directly steps into the arena of human affairs, that splendor which accompanies the ultimate purity dazzles those mortals who catch even a glimpse of it. I use the term “catch a glimpse” to imply that if one were suddenly to see it in its fulness he would die. God appeared on Sinai to announce the terms of the covenant which he made with liberated slaves. He identified himself by saying, “I am the Lord your God who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage.” When Moses asked to see God’s glory, he was told that to look upon God’s face would result in death. The Lord said, “Behold, there is a place by me where you shall stand upon the rock, and while my glory passes by I will put you in a cleft of the rock, and I will cover you with my hand until I have passed by; then I will take away my hand and you shall see my back; but my face shall not be seen.” This is another way of saying that Moses could see the receding glory of God, or behold the afterglow of divine radiance.

The reflection of this glory in the face of Moses was so great that it was necessary for him to put a veil on his face while talking to the people. The apostle writes that, “The administration of the Law which was engraved in stone (and which led in fact to spiritual death) was so magnificent that the Israelites were unable to look unflinchingly at Moses’ face, for it was alight with heavenly splendor.” He reasons that if a transitory system had such heavenly splendor, even though destined to end in condemning men, surely “the new administration of the Spirit of life would be a much more glorious thing.”

It is at this juncture he states that “it is true that the former temporary glory has been completely eclipsed.” This means that the moonlight age has been blotted out or obscured. It is very difficult for most people to concede that this is true. They prefer to think of a merger rather than a complete change of economy. They want a little moonshine mixed with the sunlight.

But the language employed will not justify such an interpretation. We are said to be free from the law and dead to it. It is affirmed that the law has been done away, disannulled and abolished. It is distinctly said that we are not under law, that we have been redeemed from its curse, and that it was a yoke of slavery from which we have been freed.

It is not, however, merely the law given by Moses from which we have been freed, but law as a means or hope of justification. It was the old economy of legalism, the idea of a written code as a basis of righteousness, from which we have been set free. “For Christ means the end of the struggle for righteousness-by-the-Law for everyone who believes in him” (Romans 10:4). That is what was completely eclipsed!

The glory of the law was temporary. It was given until faith should come. We are now subjects of a “present permanent plan” much more glorious than the old. It is unfortunate that among the Jews “to this day whenever Moses is read a veil lies over their minds.” But it is even more unfortunate that a veil lies over the minds of many who read the scriptures growing out of the new agreement.

These epistles of love are changed into a written code to be interpreted by judgmental men whose interpretation must be regarded as final. The honest souls who dissent are subjected to threat and excommunication by the arrogant usurpers of power. Their hearts are hardened like those of the Jews who cannot realize that Jesus did away with the veil.

When a man turns to the Lord the veil is removed. “For the Lord to whom they could turn is the Spirit of the new agreement, and wherever the Spirit of the Lord is, men’s souls are set free.” Let us remove the veils from our faces so that we may see clearly that we are not under law but under grace. The glory of the Lord in grace has completely eclipsed the glory reflected by the law.

“Now that we stand clear of the Law, the claims which existed are dissolved by our ‘death,’ and we are free to serve God not in the old obedience to the letter of the Law, but in a new way, in the Spirit” (Romans 7:6). The eclipse was total. It was complete.

The Cultural Challenge

Mission Messenger (May 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

Every new truth which has ever been propounded has, for a time, caused mischief; it has produced discomfort, and often unhappiness; sometimes disturbing social and religious arrangements, and sometimes merely by the disruption of old and cherished association of thoughts. It is only after a certain interval, and when the framework of affairs has adjusted itself to the new truth, that its good effects preponderate; and the preponderance continues to increase, until at length, the truth causes nothing but good. But, at the outset there is always harm. And if the truth is very great as well as very new, the harm is serious. Men are made uneasy; they flinch; they cannot bear the sudden light; a general restlessness supervenes; the face of society is disturbed, or perhaps convulsed; old interests and old beliefs have been destroyed before new ones have been created. These symptoms are the precursors of revolution; they have preceded all the great changes through which the world has passed.— Henry Thomas Buckle, in “History of Civilization.”

It doesn't require a great deal of ability to be an “armchair general.” Any mediocre field captain can sit in the plush lounge of the Officer's Club and say, “He should have ordered an attack on the right flank.” The same is true of a “grandstand quarterback.” It is one thing to call the plays while shrouded in a warm blanket with a thermos bottle of steaming coffee by your side, but a totally different thing down on a soggy field with a throbbing black eye and an ear full of mud.

I'm saying this to let you know that I'm not seeking any praise for "calling the shots" after the game is over. A lot of us are like lightning-bugs. We have our headlights on the tail end and cannot see anything until we are already past it. One does not deserve particular credit for saying, while floundering through swamp-muck up to his belt buckle, "We should have taken that other road."

All of this leads up to the fact that I am again going to deal with a ticklish subject in this issue. Once more I'm casting myself as a critic of our status quo. Really, I have no aspirations to be a gadfly, which the dictionary defines as "an irritating, bothersome individual." It takes a philosopher like Socrates to make a genuine gadfly and I'm not qualified to be a philosopher. I even have difficulty spelling it. Moreover, I do not like hemlock. I've never quaffed a goblet of it, but I have a sort of prejudice against strong drink of any kind.

So I am not taking the part I would deliberately choose. I am simply moving into it because of conscience and inner compulsion. I do not consider it particularly daring but I am going to challenge our whole general approach to the life and needs of this latter half of the twentieth century. I am going to affirm that in many respects it is irrelevant, out-moded and ineffective.

Whether you like to admit it or not the Enemy has us "punch drunk" and "hanging on the ropes." Some of the combatants who talked a lot bigger fight in college than they put up in the arena have already climbed through the ropes and staggered groggily up the aisle to watch some of us who have no intention of quitting, from a relatively safe distance. If all goes well and we reverse the tide, they will return in time to be in on the final banquet celebrating the victory. I'm not bothered too much by their "voices of concern" echoing from the twenty-fifth row of seats. I'm so busy flailing away that I haven't got time to count the spectators or to try and identify them. That's a good way to get knocked into the next county.

No, I am not ignorant of the fact that my thesis is wholly discounted in some areas of the great southland, notably the two T's— Tennessee and Texas. The information services from these two command centers indicate that we are winning on every sector and it is just a matter of time until every knee shall bow and every tongue shall confess that “the Church of Christ is right, and instrumental music is wrong.” We are the “fastest growing church in America,” and last year two Christian Church preachers were converted and are now working with “the Lord's church.” A few more crusades, a few more exodus movements, and all that will remain will be little mopping up actions. Then we can move on to the conquest of the Jews, Muslims and Chinese Communists. All of this would be quite encouraging were it not for the credibility gap in “Church of Christ” reporting, and our proven ability to juggle figures, a talent which has landed some of our folks in prison when they applied the gift in the political and economic fields.

I am by nature as optimistic as a high school freshman on her first date, but in this case I am too much of a realist to paint a rosy picture of our prospects if we continue to track along in the safe and comfortable rut we have worn down while the rest of the world zips by on its way to the moon or Venus.

Let me here inject a candid admission that what we do now was once very appropriate and was adopted for that very reason. It was not original with us and we can claim no credit for discovering it. We developed it spontaneously because it satisfied longings and assuaged hunger. That is why the Baptists and Methodists also fell into much the same format. But we now live in a wholly different world. What amused our fathers as science fiction has now been relegated to a scrap-heap of discarded realities by surpassing knowledge. And we face problems of which our sires never dreamed even while riding their wildest nightmares.

If I can revert, like Paul, to the vernacular of the ring, we must either “roll with the punches,” or we will be battered into oblivion. We must adapt our strategy to the style of our opponent or we will be sent into orbit, to land in the lap of the timekeeper, to the tune of imaginary birds twittering in our ears, and galaxies of stars floating past our glassy eyes. For quite awhile we have been “beating the air” and mistaking the training dummy which we created and stuffed with straw, with the real foe.

THE NECESSARY CHANGE

The body of Christ must change as human demands change, if it remains alive. Of course, we can embalm it and exhibit the corpse like they do that of Lenin in Moscow. It would not require too much alteration to change some of our meetinghouses into morgues. The atmosphere is already there, and a lot of our preachers have developed “the undertaker tone” and handshake, and like morticians, they regard every one who comes as a future client if they can get in good with the family.

But the one body was not intended to become a cadaver. The one, who at the time had the power over death, tried that on its Author. He swathed Him in grave-clothes, rolled a stone over the door of the sepulcher, and set a watch. But angels rolled the stone aside while He was folding up His wrappings, and Satan lost that important encounter. He also lost the power over death.

I can already hear the hue and cry which will be raised over the statement that “the body of Christ must change.” Our brethren are notorious for reporting things that others neither thought nor said, so I must take a little precious time to explain. Obviously the body must never sever itself from the head nor cut itself loose from the Spirit. Either of these would bring about its demise, and our argument is that it must live— vibrantly, powerfully, irresistibly. Somehow I think it is fairly well off as long as it holds to the head, and is motivated by the Spirit.

The change must come in our approach to life and the environment in which destiny has placed us. We are still acting and reacting as we did fifty or a hundred years ago. It may or may not be a sin that we do so. It is not a sin to continue to drive a horse and buggy down the highway as do some of my good Amish friends, but it may encourage those who have to follow in automobiles to sin in word and in deed when they cannot get around them.

And yet we cannot ignore the fact that moral issues may be involved. For instance, if a child is choking to death, it might be a sin to take it to the hospital in a horse-drawn vehicle when a high-powered automobile stands ready to perform the task at our bidding. So it is with the institutional church. When life and death are involved it may be criminal to plod along in a “business as usual” attitude when means are available to get the job done and relieve the crisis.

Our hang-up stems from the fact that we are still part of a relatively new movement, although we divided into more factions in a century than did the Roman Catholic Church in a millennium. Of course they only had one pope at a time, with few exceptions. That makes a great difference. We had our inception primarily as a rural movement and we have not outgrown our bucolic background. But our world has shifted to an urban culture, and this makes some of our methods as outmoded as a scythe in a thousand acre wheatfield.

A RURAL SCHEDULE

A good example is our three meetings per week used as a thermometer to test the spiritual temperature of the institutional membership. In pioneer days meetings began at ten of the clock on Lord's Day to enable the folk who arose at daybreak to get the hogs fed and the cows milked, and eat their simple breakfast of sausage, fried potatoes, gravy and hot biscuits, and drive the team to the hitchrack around the meetinghouse.

Generally whole families went home with others for dinner and after the visitors had helped with the evening chores, and the youngsters were worn out from playing "Anthony Over," they gathered back at the community center to talk and visit and have another meeting. This provided a good chance to sing lustily together and listen to someone who was able to read. Many of the attendants were illiterate. They needed such outlets.

Since there were few newspapers or telephones, and no radios or television sets, it was a long time between Sundays to go without news, so a midweek meeting was scheduled. Most families lived in small cabins and cramped quarters. They saw no one but their own circle day in and day out. They needed respite from the family, for they often worked, ate and slept together in a couple of rooms. Wednesday evening broke the monotony and the religious structure became the social center. Women exchanged recipes, talked about their gardens and compared statistics on their laying hens. Men discussed crops, farm implements and current events. They also had "religious services." It was a change from the quiet, uneventful life.

Unfortunately, this became a fixed and formal pattern. It is now a wee bit ridiculous in a lot of places. Take for instance, the Wednesday night meeting in a large city. Men drive to work on crowded highways, inching along in bumper-to-bumper traffic. They work all day in a tension-laden atmosphere which saps human vitality and sets nerves on edge. Then they battle the traffic back home where they have to hurry to change clothing, gulp down their evening meal and rush "back to church." Those who attend are frequently those who least need to listen again to what they have heard a hundred times and knew before they left home.

They do not need the stimulus of the crowd as did our pioneer ancestors, for they are a part of a shoving, pushing mass of humanity all day long. They work in crowded factories, eat in crowded cafeterias, and drive on crowded thoroughfares. They do not need to get the news by word of mouth, because the happenings of the world are brought into kitchen, bedroom and livingroom by radio and television. They need not go and listen to a preacher because he can read, for many of them can read with greater skill than the preacher.

Actually, what men need to do in our day is to stay at home more and become better acquainted with their families. Our fathers were almost constantly with their families. All of them ate together and worked together. Now, in a shift work economy, the family is seldom together as a unit. Instead of drumming up more meetings to further exhaust “the faithful few” we ought to eliminate every such meeting with no relevance to real life and urge members to stay home and do things together as a family. I know of a preacher who attended so many meetings to save others that he lost his own son.

Do not think me sacrilegious when I say that God may be as pleased when fathers stay at home on Wednesday night to help the children with their homework, or aid the boys in making model cars or airplanes, as when they go to midweek services reluctantly, out of a sense of duty or fear, and answer such questions as how many times the word “the” occurs in the first chapter of John. The fact is that we “go to church” so much we haven’t time to serve God. There is nothing else quite as meaningless as some of the Wednesday night meetings I have attended— or conducted— when worn out physically and so tired I could hardly move.

I wonder how long men will tolerate being censured and condemned for not coming thrice weekly, by a man whose house is furnished by the very ones whom he lambasts, and which house joins “hard by the synagogue.” It isn’t too difficult to walk next door and judge those who have to drive twelve miles through a snowstorm to come and sing “O Happy Day,” and listen to what you have prepared to hand out to them about “the Patriarchal Age.”

Why do we perpetuate that which is so incompatible with our need? There are several reasons. One is that we have come to assign undue importance to what we do inside of so-called “holy places.” Too, we have done certain things in a certain way for so long we are afraid to change. Because we have made thrice-weekly attendance a criterion of loyalty, we would prefer to drag ourselves out of our homes and into our cars and go maintain our little rituals, than to have other congregations question our faithfulness, or imply that we have “gone modern.”

I know of an elder who moved to a large northern metropolitan area from the south, and who insisted that the brethren have what he called “a prayer meeting” like “we do down home.” As he put it, “I’d rather meet on Wednesday night with a dozen loyal souls than to have people think we had forsaken the house of God.” He missed the very first night because a long train blocked the main thoroughfare and the Diesel engine broke down.

Do not misinterpret what I am saying. I am not opposed to brethren getting together any time they want to and can serve a real need. They can do so on a regular or sporadic basis, and that is fine. What I am saying is that dragging weary people across a city to demonstrate their faith by a nose count in a “hallowed structure” is not at all a vital fulfillment of our pledge of allegiance to Him!

CITY REVIVALS

And this goes for “revivals” in large centers of population. When I was a lad we worked with little respite from early spring until late autumn. We arose before daybreak and labored in the fields until dusk. When we had finished the chores, and had eaten late at night by the fitful glow of a kerosene lamp on the oil-cloth covered table, we finally fell into bed thoroughly exhausted. There was no opportunity to read and little encouragement to increase knowledge.

But with the coming of the fall months and the gathering in of the harvest there came a surcease from rigorous labor and there was time to think life through again in its broader aspects. There was a great round of gospel meetings involving all of the surrounding congregations. Every night there was some place to go. It was made to order for visiting, courting and spiritual growth. There was an air of excitement and intensity in the community. A “big meeting” might last for three weeks. Every day groups of people gathered at the home which was host to the preacher for the day. There were discussions, questions, and even sometime interesting political arguments.

In our humble home the only books were the Bible and the Sears-Roebuck catalog. Our only source of information of the wide world was Grit or Copper’s Weekly. Anyone who had been a hundred miles from home was regarded as an authority. We lived and planned for the occasional visit to the county-seat. In such a social structure, the preacher who came from another state by train was regarded as a man of stature and renown.

Now that we are in a complex situation for which we have coined the word technopolis, such an approach is ineffective. Why is it necessary to move two or three hundred people across the city every night for a week in order to get two or three unsaved persons into a house to tell them about the love of Jesus? Each one of the three hundred saved ones will pass ten thousand unsaved ones on the way to the meeting. If each one just “peeled off” out of the traffic pattern and stopped to tell one person about Jesus they would reach more people in one night than they would in a month of “protracted meetings” as we used to call them.

I have attended a good many “gospel meetings” conducted by my brethren the last couple of years. I go to all of them when I can regardless of which clique, clan or circle arranges them. But I confess that I have been utterly astounded at the caliber of the messages. Men from “down home” have been brought in to conduct meetings and have been given a build-up in the “church bulletin” and it is apparent they are wholly oblivious of the problems we face in the city.

It is difficult for me to believe that in this enlightened age so fraught with major crises that men will be imported from a thousand miles away to deliver childish, inane addresses so completely out of tune with life all about us. I watch those brothers and sisters who are paying for it, sit stolidly and sleepily through these exercises in futility, and I have a deep compassion for them. It is no wonder that educators and professional men tell me that the only way they can remain “in the fold” is to tune out a lot of what goes on and become so busy personally they do not have time to think too much about the inutility of the average sermon.

As the “down home type of revival” loses its appeal for even the country folk who have migrated to the big city, there is a frantic effort by the preachers to promote something which will salvage a little of the former influence. I have known them to rent a lavish ballroom in a big hotel and put on a drive to secure the huge sum necessary to broadcast or televise the services. A “big name” preacher is brought in, but his name is big only to the party. It means nothing even in the theological realm of the city. Every cooperating congregation sends a delegation to help fill the space and yellow buses with the inscription “Church of Christ— Romans 16:16” are seen in unfamiliar places. There may be a dozen or more “responses” (a newfangled word for additions) from among those who were hauled in from the suburbs by friends and relatives, with several of them being baptized.

But outside the ballroom, in the foyer, the lounge, the restaurant and the street, life flows by untouched, untapped and unaffected by the revival which does not revive. And a few blocks away a baby screams out as the fangs of a tawny rat sink into the flesh of its tender cheek, a drunken man grunts and gasps as a switchblade tears into his vitals, and a woman screams obscenities in a room filled with half-crazed addicts. "The land is full of blood, and the city full of injustice; for they say, 'The Lord has forsaken the land, and the Lord does not see.'"

The fact is that the preacher is no longer an authority. In almost every aspect of life which is throbbing through the world's arteries today, the preacher is a layman, if you will pardon my borrowing the expression. He is often ignorant and uninformed about the subjects the world is discussing. He cannot communicate. In our simple rural life he was on a pedestal. His word was law. People who could not read brought him the letters which they received, and he deciphered them and answered them for their recipients. He knew more about what was going on in the world than anyone else except the schoolteacher. Often he was the schoolteacher.

Now the "located minister" may have an inferior education to many in the congregation. Before him may sit men with advanced degrees in sociology, history, linguistics, medicine, science or microbiology. There are brilliant and erudite men and women who are active in the educational or business administrative fields. Some are psychologists, counsellors, or medical doctors, daily working with human beings with problems. They are able to detect the trite and shopworn sermon outlines which enable men to talk without saying anything. And it is all they can do to stay with it. Many of them come on Sunday morning to remember the Lord's death and return home to forget the preacher's platitudes.

A PROPOSED REMEDY

Here we are, a people of rural heritage set down in an alien culture, a world of crisis and revolution. What shall we do? What can we do? Shall we call it quits and “toss in the towel”? Shall we confess that it was all “a big mistake” and that we do not have what it takes? Not me! Instead of sitting around bemoaning things we need to get up and get with it. There is a lot to be done. We must pitch in with both hands, and you can’t do that while wringing them in despair. Here are some recommendations which seem appropriate to me. You may not agree with them. That’s fine, I will love you just the same.

1. We need to re-evaluate our meetings to determine if we are simply maintaining a tradition which is no longer meaningful. Holding meetings for the sake of holding meetings, or to secure celestial “brownie points” or “heavenly merit badges” for the number of times you show up, is unworthy of the name we wear or the cause we espouse. Our real task is not to get our brethren into our monasteries but to get them out of them. If you wear soldiers out going to lectures until they are too tired to fight, they become “sitting ducks” for the enemy.

It might be very helpful in our day to turn Wednesday night into “home night” and urge everyone to stay at home and have a family devotional sharing period. In such a setting the time spent at the evening meal might be extended with everyone who is old enough saying a sentence prayer at the table. Each family might think of someone who is lonely or bereaved, and compose a letter to that person with each one signing it. Think what it might mean to an aged person in a convalescent home, or to a widow in affliction, to receive a letter from a family, signed by every member including the youngest.

Of course, it is very important to avoid a rigid structure or program for such a family night. It need not always be on Wednesday night. Sometimes another family might be invited to come over and share in it. It is not necessary that the Bible always be read. Occasionally, a stimulating contemporary article, or poem can be read and discussed. Room must be left for spontaneity. The Spirit must not be stifled or smothered.

2. We must play down the idea of church and recapture the idea of a divine family. Of course, the word “church” never did translate ekklesia, the called out ones. Now it has a flavor about it which makes it almost impossible to convey the nature of the body of pilgrims who are sojourning in an alien world. The institutional church is often cold and aloof, preoccupied with forms and structures, interested in its own image.

The term “family” speaks of warmth and acceptance, of understanding and compassion. A good illustration of the difference between church and family is seen in the attitude toward the grievously ill and hospitalized. When announcement is made to the “church” that an aged sister is in the hospital, it hardly registers on the consciousness of those in the pews. They forget all about it before they get to the parking lot. It is taken for granted that “the minister” will keep in contact. He is the “hired hand” to carry the charity of the church and dispense it where needed. He is the front man, the organizational representative. The motto is, “There he is, Lord, send him!”

But when a member of the family is ill, every other member is concerned. Work becomes secondary, recreation is forgotten, and all seek means of ministering to the needs of the stricken one. A canopy of personal love (the only kind there is) is thrown about the sick one, which is probably worth more than all of the drugs prescribed by the doctor. The family would not think of ignoring the one who was ill. They would not go about their routine business and send the chauffeur to the hospital, “because we have him hired to run our errands.”

Nothing is more important in a large metropolitan area than to again become “the household of God.” Only by this means can we alleviate loneliness and heartache. We must once more realistically enter into a state where “the body should work together as a whole with all the members in sympathetic relationship with one another. So it happens that if one member suffers all the other members suffer with it, and if one member is honored all the members share a common joy.” We must come to literally bear one another’s burdens and so fulfill the law of Christ.

How can we recover this sense of family in the organizational church of our day? The answer is that we probably cannot do so. Our very structures defeat any such attempt. Our meetinghouses are not family gathering places. No one would think of lining up chairs in straight rows in the living room at home so that most of the children were doomed to see only the back of the heads of the rest of the members of the family. No one would think of putting a raised platform to be mounted by the father or mother while “laying down the law” in matters of discipline.

If we recover the family concept we will have to do it in a family context or environment. Large congregations will find it impossible to function as a household so they will be forced to organize as business concerns or big industrial plants. But there is an answer to their problem. Let them break down into cell groups where the members have a sense of closeness and intimacy. All may gather on the first day of the week at a central location, but they may meet from house to house in their various areas, districts or suburbs. There was but one congregation in Jerusalem and the brethren met together in the Temple, but they also shared in their homes. “Day after day they met by common consent in the Temple; they broke bread together in their homes, sharing meals with simple joy.”

3. The meetinghouses should be put to use to serve real needs. They are tools to get a job done, and they are expensive tools. They can be used as food and clothing depots for distribution of needed commodities to the helpless. Here women volunteers can sort and repair the clothing contributed, and here application can be made for it.

Facilities can be provided for counselling so that distraught adults and young people can find a sympathetic ear into which to pour their problems. There can be tutoring classes for those who otherwise would become school drop-outs, film sessions dealing with alcoholism, dope addiction, and other problems of society. To these the people of the community should have welcome access. In a rural society the meetinghouse was actually the social center, although this would probably have been vehemently denied. It should become a life clinic in our day rather than just a place for the membership to assemble for its own satisfaction—or dissatisfaction!

4. We must stop the brain-drain and the talent waste by drawing upon the intellectual resources of the whole body of believers. If a justifiable case could be made for one man addressing a group all of the time in a pioneer culture, because he was the only one in the community who could read or who had a meager library, the argument breaks down in an intellectual age such as ours today.

It is unrealistic to have one man speak month in and month out, filtering his thinking, prejudices and predilections to those who are just as perceptive and brilliant. Our gatherings should be devoted to sharing actual experiences and showing how Christ helps us to meet them. This is what happened in the primitive community of believers.

“After their release the apostles went back to their friends and reported to them what the chief priests and elders had said to them.”

“Peter, however, made a gesture to them to stop talking while he explained to them how the Lord had brought him out of prison. Then he said, ‘Go and tell James and the other brothers what has happened.’”

“When they arrived there they called the church together and reported to them how greatly God had worked with them and how he had opened the door of faith to the Gentiles.”

“These words produced absolute silence, and they listened to Barnabas and Paul while they gave a detailed account of the signs and wonders which God had worked through them among the Gentiles.”

Notice that the key to these passages is found in two statements: “tell what has happened,” and “how greatly God worked with them.” These must all have been interesting sessions. Why should not a returning Vietnam veteran report to the saints on the situations he faced and the conclusions he reached? Why should not college men from the congregation speak on the campus rebellion and the witness for Christ, when they are home for special holidays or at the semester break?

Why should not school administrators or teachers share their thinking about the Christian role in education? Or attorneys and brethren elected to public office discuss our relationship to the powers that be? Why muzzle sociologists in the family who can help us all to understand the problems of population explosion, hunger and poverty? Why not listen to our black brethren describe the feeling of those who grow up to realize that they are regarded as “different” in a country which affirms that all men are created equal? In short, why not take advantage of the great reservoir of knowledge which is tapped and utilized everywhere else on earth except “in the church”?

Of course one reason for our tragic waste is that we have been made victims of a concept which promotes an institutional image at the expense of individual spiritual initiative. We have emasculated the great majority of Christians and forced them into a sterile spectator status. We have urged men to go away and “prepare for the ministry” and have succeeded in convincing those who do not that they have no right to intrude upon this “sacred function.”

Nothing can be farther from God’s design, or more drastically opposed to the very essence of the Way. It is argued by the ignorant that when one is sick he should call for a graduate physician, and when he has car trouble he should secure a factory-trained mechanic. On the same basis it is contended that when he needs an exposition of scripture he must seek a factory-trained theologian who is a professional gospel dispenser or a diplomate didactic.

All of this overlooks one thing. The revelation of God is given to all and all are expected to digest it and witness to it. The word of God is the bread of life and you cannot arrange for another to eat for you. Truth is as the air which expands our lungs and you cannot turn your breathing over to another. The Christian armor is for every soldier to wear. It is not designed to fit only an elite corps. The sword of the Spirit is not a fencing foil, to be waved and swung about by a professional in an entertaining demonstration of dexterity. It is to be gripped by every soldier and employed in constant warfare.

It is not the purpose of God that some saints prepare to be doctors, others mechanics, others nurses, others university teachers, others truck drivers— and others ministers, that is, servants of God. Instead, it is His design that doctors, nurses, teachers, garbage collectors, meter readers, lawyers, farmers, fishermen, mechanics, and truck drivers, prepare to minister. Of course, not all are qualified to minister in the same way, but all can do so in some way!

Now we have to be very realistic about our predicament. We are simply not going to get anywhere by suddenly demanding that professional preachers resign as “the ministers” and allow all of the saints to start in functioning in edification of the one body. In the first place, some ministers are still jealous of their position in spite of the fact that it is wholly unknown to the new covenant scriptures. They resent others intruding upon the “sacred desk” and usurping the functions for which they are paid. They do not realize yet that the very system we have devised usurps the privilege of the other saints.

Moreover, the saints have not been trained to edify one another. Instead, they have been taught not to do so. That is why men with doctoral degrees in vital disciplines are forced to sit and listen to a mere stripling whose inexperience often shows through his homiletics. It would not be to our credit in trying to regain the ideal of God to destroy the faith of many and plunge the congregations into a welter of confusion and disgust. It took Rome a long time to convince the saints that they were not priests of God and it will take us a long time to convince them that they are.

PARENTS AND COACHES

What we must do is to place the preachers in a scriptural context and relationship. We must free them from being mere congregational flunkies and errand boys, and utilize their skills and gifts for the good of all. They have abilities which are desperately needed. We must take advantage of these for training our soldiers to become militant fighting units. We must stop thinking that we “own” preachers because we support them and start treating them like men instead of draft horses. When some people speak about “our preacher” they mean it literally.

Fortunately we have the example of Paul as a guideline in working with a congregation. At Thessalonica he said that he adopted the dual role of a father and a nursing mother. As the latter he exhibited gentleness and tenderness. Again, he wrote, “You will remember how we dealt with each one of you personally, like a father with ‘his own children, stimulating your faith and courage and giving instruction.”

The first goal of a nursing mother is to bring her children to the point of weaning. One who would refuse to wean them would be considered eccentric. Good parents are those who work themselves out of a job. They train their children to stand on their own feet and to become independent. That Paul fulfilled his task is evidenced by his words, “Wherefore comfort yourselves together and edify one another, even as ye also do” (1 Thess. 5:11). He wrote to the Romans, “And I myself also am persuaded of you, my brethren, that ye also are full of goodness, filled with all knowledge, able also to admonish one another” (Romans 15:14).

In a more modern frame of reference the preacher should be a coach, with the congregation regarded as a team. The coach does not carry the ball. He trains and disciplines each member until he responds automatically to the openings and opportunities which are presented. The coach inspires the players, provides incentive, and makes an aggressive force marching toward a goal. He does not do the running for the whole team.

But what happens if the preacher is successful and trains the whole body of saints until they can carry on the regular activities without the necessity of his presence? Must he leave the congregation and move on? Of course not! He may remain there for life and should be supported by the brethren to do the work of an evangelist. Actually, this is the work of the preacher.

He is not expected to be a pastor or shepherd, but a proclaimer. One cannot evangelize saved persons. The evangel is for the lost. You cannot proclaim the gospel to the saved. You can remind them of what you did proclaim unto them and urge them to live up to its implications in their lives and the commitment they made to it. Preaching the gospel is not for the church but for the world.

The problem is that we have called the evangelists from the field into the church. We have tied them down with detailed administrative work and record-keeping in the packing-shed until they have no time to labor in the vineyard. We condemn them to the thankless task of threshing over and over the same grain. Let the preachers become recruiting agents and take them off of “kitchen police” duty.

If it is argued that this will require a complete tactical change as to the nature of the ekklesia, the argument is correct. It will, but we must someday choose whether we can afford to continue interminably as we are or become what God intended for us to be.

It is rather ridiculous to follow a system of force-feeding babies who are never allowed to exercise and have no intention of ever growing up. God never intended for us to tend a perpetual incubator. How long will we continue to lecture enlistees who are never entrusted to use their weapon? We can never fulfill our mission on earth by our present procedure.

We must either change our approach or we will continue to produce inept and helpless brethren who, in spite of their eagerness and sincerity can never defend the faith. We are not so much bringing people to the new birth as we are hatching out birds which will never grow beyond the fledgling or pin-feather stage. Please permit me, in closing, to share with you this lengthy quotation from Alexander Campbell, taken from page 77 of The Christian Baptist. It was very unpopular when first written and the passage of time has not increased its popularity.

This everlasting sermonizing! What good is in it? It resembles nothing that is rational in all the compass of thought. A. B. professes to teach arithmetic; he gets a class of forty boys from 12 to 15 years old, we shall say. He tells them to meet once a week and he will give them a lecture or a sermon on some important point in this useful science.

The first day he lectures on the cube root for an hour. They sit bookless and thoughtless, heedless, and, perhaps, often drowsy, while he harangues them. He blesses them and sends them home, to return a week hence. They meet. His text is arithmetical progression. He preaches an hour, dismisses as usual. The third day of the meeting up comes vulgar fractions: the fourth, rule of three; the fifth, addition; the sixth, notation; the seventh, cube root again.

Now in this way, I hesitate not to say, he might proceed seven years and not finish one accountant. Who ever thought that a science or art could be taught this way? And yet this is the only way, I may say, universally adopted of teaching the Christian religion. And so it is that many men have sat under the sound of the gospel (as they call it) for forty years, that cannot expound one chapter in the whole New Testament. And yet these same Christians would think it just to prosecute by civil law that teacher who would keep their sons four or five years at English grammar or arithmetic, and receive their money, and yet not one of their sons be able to expound one rule in syntax or arithmetic.

They pay the parson— they are of maturer minds than their children, and they have been longer under his tuition, and yet they will excuse both the parson and themselves for knowing just as little, if not less of the New Testament, than their striplings know of grammar or arithmetic . . .

They can never be taught the Christian religion in the way of sermonizing. Public speeches may be very useful on many occasions; but to teach a church the doctrine of Christ, and to cause them to understand the Holy Scriptures, and to enjoy them, requires a course essentially different from either hearing sermons or learning the catechism.

God's Man Yes

Mission Messenger (May 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

“Jesus Christ the Son of God . . . is himself no doubtful quantity, he is the divine ‘yes.’ Every promise of God finds its affirmative in him, and through him can be said the final amen, to the glory of God” (2 Corinthians 1:19, 20).

This interesting statement as to the nature of Jesus, like almost every other apostolical declaration, has both a written and a life context. The letters written by the envoys of Christ did not just happen. They grew out of a need to solve human predicaments, and explain human problems.

In this case the situation is quite clear. Paul had signified his intention of visiting Corinth enroute to Macedonia, and of again stopping on his return “to give you a double treat,” as he explained it. In the meantime he received word from an unimpeachable source that the congregation was in an unholy mess, created by schism, immorality, and civil suits in pagan courts.

Accordingly, he changed his plans and wrote them a letter. He justified his action by saying, “I declare before God that it was to avoid hurting you that I did not come to Corinth . . . And I made up my mind that I would not pay you another painful visit.” Unfortunately, there existed in the congregation a small clique of vocal critics of the apostle, of whom he said they “profess to be God’s messengers on the same terms as I am” (2 Corinthians 11:12). These seized upon the situation to declare that Paul was not a man of his word and could not be trusted.

So the apostle wrote, “Because we had to change this plan, does it mean that we are fickle? Do you think I plan with my tongue in my cheek, saying ‘yes’ and meaning ‘no’?” He then made an appeal for them to recall the original proclamation of Jesus Christ as brought by Silvanus, Timothy and himself. He used the language with which we head this article. So much for the background. Our real interest lies in the implications of the statement for those of us who have accepted Jesus on the basis of the apostolic proclamation.

1. Jesus is not a doubtful quantity. Faith in Jesus must be established on the basis of human testimony, and that testimony must be subject to the same guide-lines and criteria which govern all establishment of fact by witnesses. If there is a sufficient number of witnesses, if it can be shown that they had ample opportunity to ascertain the facts to which they testify, and if their veracity cannot be impeached or their motivations be successfully impugned, the honest mind has no alternative but acceptance of the fact of their testimony.

One knows what he experiences through the function of his own senses. He believes what others experience, upon the basis of valid or credible testimony. There are witnesses to the life, teachings, death and resurrection of Jesus. No one can deny these facts. To do that he would have had to be present at the time and prove that they did not happen. The only recourse now is to attack the witnesses and demonstrate by established rules of jurisprudence that they were either honestly mistaken or that they were deliberate deceivers.

I have examined the witnesses. I have subjected their testimony to the rules of evidence. I am convinced beyond doubt that Jesus lived and that he was the Messiah, and God’s Son. I am staking my life on it. If I did not believe in Jesus I could not believe that any person lived who died before I was born. It is either faith or prejudice, and I choose faith. I don't want to bet my life on a prejudice.

2. Jesus is the divine "yes." This at once spells out the difference between existence under law and life in the Son. A system of law requires a codified compilation of "dos and don'ts." It fails on two important counts. It cannot make men good and it cannot give life. Law has the built-in power to justify but man does not have the potential to achieve it, so law actually brings the sentence of death. It is negative!

But Jesus is positive. He is the expression in personality of the power which made the universe. He is creative. The tragedy of our day is that we have tried to cramp the Way into a legal system and by so doing we have emasculated it and destroyed its virility. It is no longer creative or transforming. The spirit of adventure and of conquest has departed and we have settled down to the long grind. We were not so much born to live as we are bored to death.

Man was made for adventurous and imaginative living. He must search for transcendent experience, and the greatest experience of all should be the plugging into the power source of the universe. When he is shut off from this by false theological concepts he will turn to something else for a thrill. It is for this reason we need to investigate carefully those things to which men turn for relief from boredom and seek to determine the reason for their popularity.

Now there are two things to which modern man looks for a thrill— gambling and drugs. These have always been prevalent in some parts of the world, but until recent times they were to be found as a way of life principally for the non-Christian parts of the earth. This is no longer true. They are actually more pronounced in our own country now than in the Far East. Why is it that, in a world where Christianity once dominated the thoughts of men, they are turning in increasing numbers to gambling and drugs?

The answer seems to be that man no longer conceives of himself as a worker together with God. His job is slavery because he is chained to a desk or production line with only a paycheck as an incentive. He seeks for excitement in artificial ways, risking his money, which is now equated with his life, upon the horses or at the gaming-tables in Las Vegas. Religion, which is actually intended to cause us to lose our lives in order to gain them, has been turned over to professionals trained for the job. We are bored with it because, as a spectator sport, it cannot begin to compare with pro football with its actual crunch of direct encounter with the opposition.

Those who turn to drugs are seeking to penetrate a world beyond the sensuous, to lift themselves out of the humdrum existence and soar into a realm of the “out yonder.” Both gambling and drugs appeal to men because they offer exactly what relationship with Jesus was intended to offer. Indeed, early Christians were actually called “The Gamblers,” because they literally risked their lives in a way that pagans did not dare.

The church will have no real effect upon gambling and drug addiction by sitting in cushioned pews and listening apathetically to a polished preacher condemn them. Indeed, it is just such unrelated actions which cause some of the professed Christians to turn to drink, unlawful sex, or drugs. Our task is to put the element of risk or gambling back into life with Christ, and to demonstrate that the Way can put us into orbit in a manner which makes psychedelic drugs as tame as aspirin tablets. Jesus must again become the divine “yes”!

3. Every divine promise finds its affirmative in him. There never was a promise given or a prophecy made by God that was not directly or indirectly related to Jesus. He is both the center and circumference of God's relationship with us. So true is this that we are told, "The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy" (Revelation 19:10).

Every promise God ever gave is validated by the resurrection of Jesus. Upon this event, Jesus hinged the proof of his divine Sonship. Before his death he affirmed that God would raise him from the dead, and since God would not raise an impostor, the fact of his resurrection was the positive proof that he was who he claimed to be. But it also was the certification of the genuineness of all of the divine promises.

4. Through Jesus the final Amen can be pronounced on all of God's purposes in the universe. The "amen" is the sanction or agreement which recognizes the truthfulness of that which is so attested. Man was made to glorify God and will find his ultimate in spiritual enrichment in sharing that glory. It is only through Jesus that such attainment is possible. Amen!

Living Letters

Mission Messenger (May 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

A great deal of confusion exists in our world because men confuse the covenants, or testaments, of God with the scriptures written to a covenant people. God exhibited himself as a covenant-making God, having chosen this method by which to establish relationship with the rational beings of his creation who inhabit the earth. He announced numerous covenants, but there were two of such importance as to be designated the first and second testaments, or the old and new covenants.

Both of these were designed to create a people for God, and both began with a signal deliverance, the first from a nation which had its own gods; the second from the shackles of sin. The initial one was made at Mount Sinai in Arabia, the second at Mount Sion, a symbolic name indicative of the heavenly Jerusalem which represents a redeemed state rather than a geographical site.

Both were written covenants, but neither was written by man. The first was written upon two tablets of stone, by the finger of God; the second upon fleshy tables of the heart by the Holy Spirit. There was no difference in the writing instrument, because “the finger of God” is simply another designation for the Spirit. When the Egyptian magicians failed to reproduce a miracle by their enchantments, they said, “This is the finger of God” (Exodus 8:19). Matthew says that Jesus attributed his miracles to the Spirit of God (12:28), Luke says he attributed them to the finger of God (11:20). Both were talking about the same event.

Not one word of the new testament was written with pen and ink, as Paul points out in a wonderful chapter dealing specifically in a contrast between what he designates “the old testament” and “the new testament” (2 Corinthians 3:3).

He affirms that the new testament was written with the Spirit of the living God in living men and women. And he asserts, “We dare to say such things because of the confidence we have in God through Christ.”

It is that very same confidence which makes me dare to say that there are not twenty-seven books in the new testament. The new covenant is not a written code as was the old, because “a written code leads only to death, it is the Spirit alone which can give life” (2 Corinthians 3:6). The new testament is the glorious new agreement, announced by God, and inscribed on the sensitized heart of every recipient of grace. It is personal, enabling us to “reflect like mirrors the glory of the Lord.”

This glorious relationship is actually a new birth, introducing us into a new humanity through a process of inner transformation. It cannot be described in mere words. Peter says, “At present you trust him without being able to see him, and even though he brings you a joy that words cannot express and which has in it a hint of the glories of heaven; and all the time you are receiving the result of your faith in him— the salvation of your souls.”

Then what is the purpose of the new covenant scriptures? What end is served by the epistles of Paul, Peter, James and Jude? The answer is quite simple, but it depends upon the metaphorical relationship which you have in mind at the time.

If you think of the disciples of Christ as citizens of a kingdom, the epistles are directives from the king providing instructions for the development of responsible citizenship. But there is as much difference between the new covenant and these epistles as there is between the oath of allegiance before a federal judge which changes one from alien status and a textbook on civics.

If you think of disciples as members of a family, the epistles are love letters from the Father, regulating conduct and behavior. But there is as much difference between the new covenant and these epistles as there is between the orgasm in which one is begotten and the letters he receives when he is away at college.

If you think of the saints as soldiers, the epistles are the manual of arms, but there is as much difference between the new covenant and these epistles as there is between the swearing-in ceremony and the daily training schedule or the orders of the day.

In short, our relationship with God is created not by conformity to a written code or a legalistic system, but by personal surrender to the claims of Jesus as heralded in a message called “the Good News.” The agreement is carved into the heart by the Spirit, so that each of us is a letter written by the finger of God. God’s new testament is not a compilation of letters bound together in a book, but a collection of ransomed lives bound together in a body!

The apostle says it better than I can. “You are an open letter about Christ which we ourselves have written, not with pen and ink but with the Spirit of the living God. Our message has been engraved not in stone, but in living men and women.” It is my prayer that we may be always reverent, righteous and readable!

Commandos I Have Known

Mission Messenger (June 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

Today I am going to write about some commandos for Christ whom I have met. It may be easier for you to grasp what I mean by commandos through learning of actual examples. But first, I must mention that I am spelling commandos differently than I did in January. Then I spelled it “commandoes.” The change is not an accident. It is an illustration of how we may help one another.

Our daughter, Sue, who lives in Denver is a critical reader of what her father writes, and not long ago she wrote that she wished I would not spell the word “commandoes,” because the preferred spelling was without the e. I have long ago learned that I can profit greatly by listening to my children and grandchildren. Besides that, I checked in my own dictionary and found that Sue was correct.

Commandos are soldiers who often fight apart from the regular army, but always as a part of it. They may drop behind the lines and have to fight their way out singlehandedly. They are where the action is! They must be versatile and inventive, adapting their strategy to the changing tides of the conflict. Sometimes they are misunderstood by the regulars, and frequently are under criticism by “the brass” who want to run “a spit and polish army” careful of its image.

Commandos are rugged in-fighters who must stand up and slug it out with the foe. With them it is “do or die.” They either win or perish for there may be no rescue squad when they are hemmed in and cut off. There can be no “gold-bricking” or “goofing off” because all that they hold dear is at stake. They are not rocking-chair soldiers or front-office generals.

One of the first such soldiers of the cross whom I remember was a man with very little formal education. He was born in a rude cabin in the Missouri Ozarks to humble parents who were also illiterate. He grew up in a community where the settlers spent much of their time in drinking and fighting, but even as a boy he believed there was something better beyond the hills. As a young married man he came to know about Jesus in a backwoods campmeeting, but when he sought to become a preacher for the group his answers were too Biblical for the examining committee.

Eventually he came in contact with the restoration movement and was intrigued with the possibility of being a Christian only. By this time he was a lead miner laboring each day for meager pay in the bowels of the earth. But each night in the glow of a kerosene lamp he hungrily read and studied the sacred scriptures. He was obsessed with the idea that he must share the good news with others. Soon he had the neighbors in the village coming to his primitive home every evening, sitting in the yard and listening to him as he spoke from the porch.

So fervent was his proclamation, and so honest were his rough hearers, that one after another of the hard-rock miners gave up drinking and swearing to be immersed of him in a clear stream which flowed nearby. All day long he talked to his fellowhelpers underground and they enlisted under the banner of the King. At first these humble folk met in an open grove, but as the chill nights of autumn came they pooled their meager resources and purchased an abandoned saloon and converted it into a meetinghouse.

Here men of little education, but caught up by a sense of urgency, exhorted one another and testified of the grace of God in their lives. Years went by and the one who began it all grew older. His spirit was never quenched. Congregations were established in the hill country and in villages. He walked hundreds of miles with the message. Always poor in this world's goods, his home was still ever open to the needy. The latchstring hung on the outside.

In the closing months of his life, though retired from gainful employment, he labored almost singlehandedly to erect a meetinghouse where there had never been one before. Here he gathered a small handful of saints together and taught and shepherded them as he had done with so many other little bands in the past. With a firm resolution to visit every home in the town, he started out one morning on a task expected to cover many weary weeks of walking and knocking on doors. Before he had gone the first block, he threw up his hands in a convulsive gesture and fell in the street. A massive hemorrhage had exploded in his brain. His body hardly twitched where it had fallen in the dust. He died doing what he loved to do, with his armor buckled on and his face toward Jerusalem's walls.

I know another man, who still lives, and who has been an inspiration to me. When I first met him he was a cotton farmer with a very meager education, laboring hard and long to eke out a living and educate his children. There were but few books in his plain home, and his vocabulary was limited, but he read the Bible with such avidity that he actually began to talk in the lovely cadence of the English of King James.

In a home where hospitality ruled and no stranger was ever turned away the conversation soon turned to a discussion of the word of God, and it became so interesting that those who came for a few minutes lingered for hours. There was never an opportunity overlooked to share insights in the revealed truth of the ages.

Finally, circumstances came about so that the little farm was sold, and the farmer began to work with a road-repair group. These men represented various shades of religious belief and opinion, but the one of whom we speak taught and shared constantly while working with the crew. One rainy day when the men sought shelter in a country schoolhouse he took advantage of the opportunity to go to the blackboard and lead a study for those who sat in their mud-stained overalls. His theme was the priesthood of all believers, and he illustrated with a crude chalk diagram as he talked.

I cite these two cases to show that commandos for Christ are not necessarily drawn from the ranks of the intellectually elite. An uneducated lead miner and a humble cotton farmer, with hearts aflame for Jesus, have done more than thousands who have advanced degrees in some scholastic discipline. They labored without acceptance or encouragement because of their commitment to Him “whom having not seen we love.”

A FEMALE COMMANDO

I have a sister in Christ Jesus who is married to a very successful salesman. For several years they were nominal members of a congregation which met near the apartment in which they lived. They attended on Lord’s Day morning and the rest of the time gave themselves over to the pleasures of this world. Eventually they moved into an attractive house in an affluent suburb ten miles from the meetingplace of the congregation which they continued to attend.

Then something happened. One night when the husband was in a distant city at a sales convention, the wife found herself strangely troubled and depressed, and unable to sleep. She arose and put on her dressing gown and went into the living-room. She felt an irresistible urge to pick up the Bible and read. She selected a copy of The New Testament in Modern English, and opened it at random. By sheer coincidence, she began at Matthew, chapter twenty, which records the parable of the farmer who went out early in the morning to employ workers for his vineyard.

Although she was reading in a detached manner, a certain sentence seemed to leap out of the page and burn itself into her consciousness. "Then about five o'clock he went out and found others standing about. 'Why are you standing here all day doing nothing?' he asked them?" When she read this she could not erase it from her mind. A horrible feeling of emptiness and futility swept over her soul, bringing with it a gushing flood of memories.

She saw again her childhood home in the country and the little rural meetinghouse where she had made her confession of faith in the Christ. She remembered the surge of joy which enveloped her when she was baptized and she thought of how far she had come to be able to dwell in such a beautiful home. All of a sudden the things in which she had shown so much pride seemed like ashes in her sight. She began to weep uncontrollably. She returned to her bedroom and got down upon her knees, placing her head on the edge of the bed as she used to do when a child. She prayed as she had never prayed before, confessing her guilt and failure, asking forgiveness and pleading with the Father to show her the way He would have her go.

Finally she made a vow that she would not draw back but would accept any work in the vineyard without doubt or quibble. When she had said this a burden lifted from her heart and a feeling of peace came in to take its place. She lay down and slept beyond her regular waking time. The very next day the preacher called her and asked her if she would teach a class of little children in Vacation Bible Study. He explained that the church was going to make an all-out effort to improve its image in the community and see if they could offset the influence of the Baptist Church two blocks away, which had always enrolled a majority of the neighborhood children.

Even as the preacher was talking there flashed over her being a feeling that she did not want to be a part of a political power struggle, in which little children were the pawns to project a partisan image. She would not give an immediate reply, but promised to pray about it. True to her word, she began to talk aloud to God while she was doing the luncheon dishes. She found this was strangely easy to do, although she had never done it before. And even while she was praying in this informal strain a thought struck her like a bolt out of the clear blue. Why should she drive twenty miles each day to teach a class of little boys and girls to enhance a “church image” when there were scores of boys and girls, Jew and non-Jew, playing in the streets of the very subdivision in which she lived?

Immediately she dressed for calling and went to the homes of her neighbors and told them she would like to have their children come to her home each morning for two hours. She was going to convert her family room into a schoolroom where she would teach the children songs and choruses, tell them Bible stories and have them do memory work and present little skits and plays. Because there was no sectarian organization involved she found Jewish, Catholic and Protestant mothers willing to send their children.

Soon these mothers were taking their turns coming and bringing cookies for refreshment, and listening to the recitations. The daily studies lasted during the entire school vacation and when the children returned to school the mothers requested a study period one afternoon per week, and they met to probe the Bible for the meaning of life— women who had been poles apart only a few months before.

I must not leave this account without mentioning that the sister whose prayers had launched this invasion “behind the lines” was criticized by the preacher. She was told that she should have brought a carload of children ten miles to the church building where the teaching was under the supervision of the elders. The question was raised as to what would happen to the church if everyone began teaching somewhere else than at the “proper location.”

INDUSTRIAL COMMANDOS

I want to relate the story of a brother who was employed in a large industrial complex as a fork-lift operator. Although the company provided an employee cafeteria, a good many men brought their lunches from home to save time and money. Several of them began to eat together because, while they were of different religious backgrounds, the language was more wholesome than with others.

One day the brother of whom I write suggested that they each bring a copy of the new testament scriptures the following day and begin studying together thirty minutes daily while eating. Several opposed the idea because of a fear that it might lead to arguments but five agreed to participate. The next day nine men were in the group sitting on boxes in the warehouse, but four were mere listeners.

They started with the gospel according to John at the suggestion of one of the men and when they begin sharing their views about miracles the group of onlookers grew until there were about twenty in the circle. More and more of them began to show up with testaments and the daily studies increased in interest. A sub-foreman who had scoffed at the idea at first began to edge closer and finally became convicted of his sin and privately asked the brother to baptize him. Others began coming to his house at night to talk with him further and eventually he had baptized seven men. In turn these influenced their wives and children for the Lord, so that families were united in the Christ.

I know a man who operates a gasoline service station on an excellent corner who became convinced that Jesus had placed him there to witness of his faith, and that selling gasoline was merely a way to pay expenses while he was doing so. He had a very attractive little folder printed with the caption on the front page, "I'd Like To Have You Meet My Best Friend!" On the inside he told the story of how he once drank and lived an immoral life, and of how he sought the help of psychiatry to no avail, and then, when contemplating suicide, he was introduced to Jesus, and how this made the great difference.

When he fills the tank and the customer signs the credit card slip, the brother says with a kindly tone and a gentle smile, "I do not know how you feel about things like this, but I'd like to have you read this little folder when you find time." Literally scores of people have returned to talk with him about it and his business has grown beyond expectation.

Then there was the college student who resolved to take Christ's claim upon his life very seriously. He needed a job for the summer in order to secure funds to go to school in the autumn. He prayed very earnestly for God to have his way in the matter and to lead him into a situation where he could testify of his faith. He drove his car to the filling station as soon as he had finished praying, and while the owner was filling the tank with gasoline he said to the brother, "Do you know where I can find a young man who would like to work for me this summer?" Although he could not see how this would provide the opportunity he wanted the Christian student decided to accept the job and trust in God.

He also resolved to take advantage of every opportunity to speak of Jesus and many openings were given. While repairing a tire one day he began talking with the owner and ascertained that he was the Presbyterian clergyman from the largest congregation of that denomination in the area. The preacher invited him to come and address a youth meeting, and as a result of his Biblical knowledge, asked him to speak to his whole congregation one Sunday while the preacher was on vacation. When young people with special problems came to the Presbyterian clergyman they were sent to the young man at the service station, and he taught them the way of truth more perfectly.

I must not leave this part of my theme without mentioning another brother who owns a filling station and automobile repair business in a community of black residents. He talks to his customers about the Savior at every opportunity and with such effectiveness that he has been invited to speak at their several denominations to huge crowds on special occasions. These men are waging the battle where the action is. Their pulpits are grease racks, gasoline pumps and car fenders. They are being heard because they are fighting on the life front!

GHETTO COMMANDOS

A few years ago a young white man who came of Mennonite stock but who had identified with the Churches of Christ was working as a pharmacist in a metropolitan hospital. Here he met a young black Christian who had come from a broken home and who had a deep compassion for children who were tossed like flotsam and jetsam on life's sea. As they talked they decided to do something positive to help. The young white man moved out of his apartment and rented a frightfully dilapidated house in the very heart of the worst tenement district. Enough cast-off furniture was scrounged from members to make the place habitable on a minimal basis and work began with black boys and girls. Some of these were homeless waifs, gathered off the streets, dirty, unkempt and smelly. They were given baths, furnished with used clothing and shoes, taught the Bible and how to pray. A recreation program was started by the black brother, and boys who were potential gang fodder were channeled into constructive enterprises.

Women from different congregations began to take hot subsistence meals and serve up to fifty or more children each Saturday. The run-down facilities were soon outgrown. A congregation of white saints purchased a condemned building and spent a great deal of money and hundreds of hours of hard labor before it would pass city inspection for use as a teaching facility.

Meanwhile the white brother married an outstanding girl who was dedicated to the frustrating task of working in the black ghetto, and they were able to expand their efforts. They found it necessary to defend their neighbors from political exploitation by City Hall, and this threw them into definite involvement in opposition to the white structure downtown. They learned from bitter experience the manipulation of depressed and downtrodden humanity by the government hand-out programs.

They have now won the confidence of the black community and are the elected representatives on self-help projects such as "Operation Bootstrap." They are concerned with one of the most outstanding and rewarding programs in our nation to train men for needed labor, to rebuild the community without direct government aid, and to bring in industry to provide jobs. Through all of this, they have never lost the sight of their chief objective which is to bring a knowledge of the Christ to culturally deprived human beings.

It has not all been smooth sailing— but incredible as it may seem, the greatest opposition has come from some Churches of Christ. In spite of the fact that the work is under the supervision of the bishops of an autonomous congregation, vigilante committees composed of elders from other congregations have felt called upon to investigate it. Some of these have withheld support on the basis of a species of bigotry which seems almost unbelievable even among some of us who used to make a specialty of it. The charge is that some of the workers who volunteered to help are from congregations which use instrumental music.

Of course the Spirit of God will triumph over this kind of provincial and factional thinking, but one finds himself saddened by the thought that in a world writhing in crisis, where human needs are an engulfing flood, that there are those who would prolong human misery and suffering in the midst of abject squalor while they stand afar off and debate their doctrinal differences. It is apparent that there are two classes which we shall have always— the poor and the Pharisees!

I salute a group of young Christians in another city which I shall not name who have established a store-front oasis manned by a young brother who became hooked on dope while yet in high school. He was not a believer at the time and was being reared by his mother who had been deserted by the father. The lad drifted from bad to worse. He began by smoking reefers or pot, and soon went on to become an acid-head. He became a police character and spent a good deal of time in the lock-up. Twice he was institutionalized for “the cure” but it did not last. Then one evening someone took him to a crusade conducted by Billy Graham and he felt an uncontrollable desire to surrender his worthless existence unto Christ.

The counsellor assigned to him was a young man from the Churches of Christ and he met with him every evening for a week, and finally immersed him in the name of the Lord. The two of them decided they would penetrate the gray world of mental fog where frightened men and women fight the “monkey on their backs,” and bring a ray of hope to that world of despair. They rented a storefront building and with the help of a group of college young people, scrubbed and cleaned and painted the inside. They furnished it with cast-off furniture, refusing the offer of new equipment as being out of place in such surroundings.

Now a coffee urn stands always ready for those who drop in. There is good wholesome reading material. There are impromptu prayer sessions which are unstructured except by human need and agony. The members of two congregations help support the work with their money, although some have expressed the hope that not all of those who are reached will start attending with them because it might hurt their influence in their suburban communities to have converted “winos” and former street-walkers among the membership.

One cannot help but think of the worn-out story of the old colored man who made application to affiliate with a white congregation. The “somewhats” in the group suggested that he not be too hasty in pushing for membership recognition, but rather pray about it for awhile. Three weeks later, when one of them asked him if he had prayed about the matter, he replied that he had, and the Lord had told him not to worry, that He also had been trying for years to get into that congregation and had not been successful either.

It is not always a ghetto area where such commandos operate. I know of a couple who were so thrilled when the Shepherd found them and rescued them from the pit, that they decided to turn their home into a rescue mission. The very informality of their approach has made possible a tremendous success. They have had boys who were adjudged delinquent paroled to them by the courts and have introduced those who were “turned on” and “tuned out” to Jesus.

These have brought other young people in dire need. The family room has been turned into a place of open conversation and confession. Each night of the week a prayer session is held and all seek to draw near to God, although the words addressed to the Father may be in the jargon or argot of “junkies” and drifters.

It is amazing what has happened in the lives of those who feel that they are understood and accepted in spite of bizarre dress and unconventional hair lengths. All of us need to learn that Jesus never got any one out of where he was to love him, but he loved him to get him out of where he was. It makes a difference if our love reaches in to taverns, dives and off-beat places, because light always shines brightest on the darkest nights.

POLITICAL COMMANDOS

Recently I have been in contact with several young men of high ideals and tremendous dedication who are resolved to infiltrate the political spectrum and bring the claims of Jesus into the very halls where laws are made and debated. They are fully aware of the fact that the general cry is the rottenness of politics, and they know the risk that they take. But they hold that if a nation is saved it must be saved by the leaven of the righteous and that this leaven must touch the heart of the corrupt mass.

It is their theory that they should actively seek justice, relieve the oppressed, defend the fatherless and plead the widow's cause. They hold that this cannot be done by men who put their official standing ahead of principle. They are sick of bribery and chicanery. So these young men are studying civics and sociology, and probing into the science of government with a sense of commitment which is seldom seen in our day.

There will be opposition to their planned invasion of the political field. Some of it will come from the cynical "city hall crowd," and some of it from gang leaders who call the political shots and control the political "big shots." But a good deal of the opposition will proceed from Christians who hold the idea that to mess with politics is to forfeit your character. It is their view that, regardless of motives, one will be contaminated if he takes an active part in the making or enforcement of laws. He should limit his efforts to criticizing officials.

I do not share this rather morbid view and I cannot help but wish that Christians were in every office in this land. The men of whom I speak, who are majoring in the field of jurisprudence as a high calling, are of high caliber. If they maintain their ideals they can and will make a difference. I know a number of brethren who are serving in the political arena as the elected servants of the people and they feel that they are ministers of God called to perform a great task.

I do not wish to prolong this article unduly. For example, it would take much time and space to describe the faithful men and women who are teaching the various disciplines on the college and university campus. They are bringing a sense of The Presence into the seething, fermenting academic complex of today. I hold that the field of higher education should belong to Christ and we should bring its very thought processes into subjection to his sovereignty.

It would please me if we could develop a strategy of penetration by which we could infiltrate and secure the entire domain of education for the advancement of the principles of that righteousness which is found in Him. I am not talking about making it the tool of any party or sect. This would be disastrous. I am simply saying that all education should be slanted toward perfecting the skills and abilities of men according to the ideals exemplified by him. All truth is one truth, whether arrived at by revelation, experimentation or rationalization. No one ever teaches any truth without teaching God's truth! The God of ethics is the God of mathematics. He is also the God of my salvation!

This is my Father's world, and every good gift comes from him. It must be channeled into his service. Whether one has a talent for teaching psychology, biology, history, science, literature, or home economics, he must realize that in its exercise he is a servant of the Most High. God is concerned with every person on earth “from him that sitteth on the throne to the maidservant behind the mill.” There is no area of life that is left untouched by our witness. To go into all the world means much more than simply putting a missionary in the capital city of every country. The world is more than a shrinking ball spinning thru space. “All the world” is not simply a geographic expression. The concern of God is not alone with land or cities or oceans, but with human beings and human hearts—the world of reason and will and conscience. The commandos for Christ are the fearless fighters who are even in advance of the well-drawn and recognized front lines of battle.

They parachute into dark asphalt jungles where the foe lurks in every dark corner of the stinking streets and alleys, they invade the ranks of the sophisticated where the sword strokes are parried with keen scintillating mockery, they drop from sight in the suburban world where sin is refined and distilled into a product of tantalizing aroma appealing to the languid and sensuous culture of our day. But wherever they choose to fight, the commandos never forget their allegiance unto him. One of the best of their number put it thus: “It is our aim, therefore, to please him, whether we are ‘at home’ or ‘away.’ For everyone of us will have to stand without pretence before Christ our judge, and we shall be rewarded for what we did when we lived in our bodies, whether it was good or bad. All our persuading of men, then, is with this solemn fear of God in our minds.”

[Abstract]

On the afternoon of April 7 it was my privilege to address a distinguished group of men and women assembled in Braun Room, in The Divinity School, Harvard University. The meeting was opened by Don Clark, who presented Barry Willbanks as moderator. Three reactors to my thesis were then introduced: Dr. Krister Stendahl, Dean of the Divinity School and John Lord O'Brian Professor of Divinity; Dr. William Robert Hutchison, Charles Warren Professor of History of Religion in America; and James Valentine Fisher, Ph.D. candidate. The last named was of special interest since he is the son of my good friend and brother, G. C. Fisher, Retired Chaplain of the Air Force, through whose kind invitation I conducted a Week of Spiritual Emphasis upon the largest air force base in the United States.

My theme was "Toward A Conservative Ecumenism," and I had resolved to present a positive alternative rather than a negative approach to the ecumenical drive in our generation. Accordingly, I broke the prayer of Jesus down into four components, and analyzed these on the basis that any form of unity which did not answer this prayer could not be called Christian unity.

My first point dealt with the extent of the unity for which we seek. Since the prayer for oneness was to include all who believed in Jesus through the apostolic proclamation (kerygma), it was my contention that any approach to an answer must be based upon two considerations— the centrality of Christ and the instrumentality of the apostles. My thought was that both occupied a unique place in the kingdom constituency and to overlook or negate this uniqueness would be abortive of the will of God.

As to the nature of the unity, I suggested that it was personal, rather than organizational or institutional, and that it stemmed from possession of the divine nature, thus was a work of the Holy Spirit, transforming the individual from within. Such unity cannot result from plans, programs or projections, nor be produced by concordats, creeds or conventions. Men are powerless to either create or destroy it.

As to the place of the unity, my contention was that it was in the fellowship with the Father and the Son. It is useless to unite all men if, in the process, you separate them all from God. In dealing with the purpose of unity I pointed out that Jesus made belief in himself contingent upon the oneness of his disciples. The world will not be won to believe in Christ, until those who believe in Christ in the world are one.

In summation I stated that renewal is not the creation of something new, but the recapture of the ideal of the new creation. Renewal can only result from recovery of the apostolic proclamation, purpose and power.

The first reactor was Dr. Stendahl, a recognized leader in the World Council of Churches who presented a position paper at the Uppsala Convention. He concurred in the emphasis upon recovery of proclamation, and referred at length to the apostolic directive on division and fragmentation as found in First Corinthians. He dissented from that part of my thesis which dealt with structural or institutional unity, and felt that I might be muddying the ecumenical waters so that my own would appear clearer. He posed the question to me of whether the ongoing Spirit might not create new structures more valid for our age, and produce unity within such structures.

Dr. Hutchison, a former Presbyterian turned Quaker, proved why he is ranked as one of the top-notch scholars in American religious history. Having been born in the vicinity of Washington, Pennsylvania, he knew as much about the Campbell movement as those of us within that heritage. But his question got to the “gut issue” as it relates to us. He wanted to know, in view of The Declaration and Address what we proposed to do about making an impact on ecumenical circles today. It was apparent that this perceptive theologian felt that we must either find a definitive role in the twentieth century or “fold our tents like the Arabs, and as silently steal away.”

Jim Fisher concerned himself primarily with who has the Holy Spirit and how we may know who possesses the Pneuma. He questioned the restoration principle upon the basis of our limited application and suggested that if we were going to use it as a basis we should not go back and stop at a fixed historical point like the apostolic era, but back to Adam, and restore the principle of the brotherhood of man, for all men on earth.

Following a brief break for refreshments and a get-acquainted period, I replied to the questions of the reactors and then accepted questions from the audience for the remaining time. The entire colloquy lasted for two hours and fifteen minutes. The attendants included faculty members, divinity students, preachers from Christian Churches and Churches of Christ, the secretary for the Catholic Archdiocesan Council of Boston, and a reporter for the Boston Globe. This personable young feature writer did a rather lengthy article, but unfortunately made it appear that I was engaged in a debate with Dr. Stendahl, an impression which I diligently sought to avoid.

What we did may have been “a first,” for no one could recall ever having heard of exactly this kind of encounter at Harvard during our generation. I am indebted to those who made it possible and to those who participated. I remained in the Boston area for a week, attending cell meetings of the saints in homes for four nights, and concluding with a rally conducted in the Junior High School Auditorium at Bedford, Massachusetts. It was an unforgettable experience.

One feature of our final meeting will interest “the fellowship of the concerned ones.” Brethren came from four states and from various segments of the restoration heritage. Although the gathering was arranged by and was under the auspices of a local Christian Church, a brother from the non-instrument congregation nearest to them directed the singing, the preacher of the congregation led in prayer, and a choral group sang a medley of spiritual numbers. The attitude shown by all who attended, both black and white, was commendable and bespeaks a lessening of tensions and gives hope for a brighter day. We have found the same spirit of brotherly love exhibited in almost every community where it has been our privilege to work recently and we thank God and take courage!

Meeting an Author

Mission Messenger (June 1969)

[Abstract]

Several months ago I resolved to do a series of articles on “the new morality.” It seemed to me that, as commandos of Christ, we ought to face up to the questions being raised a little more honestly than most of us had been doing. I decided that I would especially analyze two books— Christian Morals Today, by John A. T. Robinson, and Situation Ethics, by Joseph Fletcher. At the time I had no idea I would ever meet either man personally, but while I was at Harvard, an opportunity was presented to go to Episcopal Theological School, in Cambridge, and sit in upon a two hour discussion on “Verbal Tools in Christian Ethics,” by Dr. Fletcher.

When I was introduced to him I learned that he already knew about my presence in the city, and he welcomed me to the seminar. I had supposed that I would meet a relatively youthful professor of “the swinging type,” scoffing at the mores of traditional Christianity and whittling opponents down to size with a rapier-like wit, while making a play for the girls in the class. Imagine my surprise to be confronted by a genial, almost gnome-like gentleman, more than sixty-five years old, dressed in a conservative gray suit and wearing a subdued blue-striped shirt with a rather unevenly knotted polka dot bow tie. He possessed a cheerful smile and radiated good cheer which endeared him to the students.

The theme had to do with what Dr. Fletcher called “Pauline ethics,” and followed the familiar route traversed by most liberal theologians, postulating a difference between the ethical teachings of Jesus and those of the apostle to the Gentiles. It was suggested that the gospel writers were not concerned with a theological approach, but simply with narrative. They collected the ethical teachings of Jesus and from them compiled “the sermon on the mount.”

Paul’s ethics cannot be understood at all, according to Dr. Fletcher, without understanding his idea of salvation. In dealing with the matter the professor conceived it was his task to point out the problems, and not resolve them. He confessed that he had not found a satisfactory answer to all of them, but because of his age he had no time left for messing around with non-controversial issues.

I shall not bore my readers with details, but will mention a few items of interest to me. It was argued that Paul faced the problem of how to avoid legalism on the one hand and antinomianism on the other, or how to transcend the letter and preserve the spirit, that is, the intent or value concerns of Christ. Paul concluded that Christ was “the end of the law for righteousness,” but by law here is meant merely “rules for righteousness.” This was superseded by the law of Christ, which is love, and not codal prescriptions to be swallowed like medicine.

It was suggested that the new covenant invites Christians to accept the vulnerability and jeopardy of freedom, never obeying any law simply for the law’s sake. Grace was set in the Torah’s stead, but many preferred to stick close to a custodian or tutor and be children. Here they took no risk and accepted no blame. But to avoid such irresponsibility, God wrote the new law in our minds, internalizing it so that now righteousness is incorporated in our persons rather than in a code.

In contrasting Jesus and Paul it was suggested that Jesus assumed the moral capacity of men, and took them seriously as men, laying blame on them and holding them responsible for not hearing the prophets. On the other hand, Paul took man's incapacity more seriously than did the gospels. Man can will what is right but cannot do it. Jesus said men were responsible and should be challenged and judged. Paul regarded men as helpless and said they needed help.

It was further said that Paul was concerned with sin generically, that is, with root sin. Jesus was concerned with sin specifically, dealing with acts of sin, rather than the condition of sin. Paul regards sin as something given in the human situation, something inherent. Jesus regards it as something chosen. Dr. Fletcher denied that Paul set faith over against works. With Paul it was not a question of faith or works, or even of faith and works. Rather it was the simple proposition that faith works!

I asked the professor if there was a difference in the way Jesus regarded love (agape), and the way Paul regarded it, seeing that Jesus said the law and the prophets were suspended from it, while Paul said the whole law was fulfilled in it. He thought that both might have regarded it alike. This seemed to me to lessen any supposed area of divergence as to ethics.

I further asked Dr. Fletcher to define love as he used the term. He said that philosophically agape was a radical divine and human commitment, but for a working definition he preferred to think of it as concern for persons. He insisted that it was an act of will, and thus was rational and volitional, rather than emotional.

He graciously asked me to explain my personal view of agape to the students and I did so. I suggested that if Jesus and Paul were present and could be questioned any apparent difference in their view of ethical behavior might melt away. We are always limited in an attempt to understand even those with whom we can converse and even more so when we examine what was written by or about them.

It was noticeable that the students were very penetrating in their questions and did not hesitate to pursue their investigations even to the point of embarrassment for the teacher. They showed every evidence of wanting to search for truth, and were not inclined to accept any theory or system without carefully scrutinizing it from all angles. After the two hour session was finished I made it a point to meet some of the future candidates for the Anglican clergy and found them very interested in our own approach to the Christian faith.

My analysis of situational ethics will be made available in this paper later on. I am meeting the problem everywhere I go and I do not feel that we can either ignore it or set up a straw man and annihilate him under the guise of handling the issue. We trust that you will continue to read MISSION MESSENGER this year.

Student Revolution

Mission Messenger (June 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

It was my fortune, good or bad, to be at Harvard University during the inception of the student revolt and strike. On April 9 a group of activists almost two hundred strong, led by members of the Students for a Democratic Society, occupied University Hall and ejected the deans and other administrators. A list of grievances and demands was drawn up and sent to Dr. Nathan Pusey, president of the venerable ivy league institution.

The charge was made later that the occupation forces sacked the private files and some of the confiscated secret documents began to appear in Old Mole, the student newspaper of the campus revolutionaries. In any event, before dawn on the following morning several hundred police assaulted the bastion and ejected the trespassers. A few were injured in the melee and many were arrested and hauled away in buses which had been converted into oversize paddy-wagons. This served to electrify the campus and in the afternoon a capacity crowd gathered in the famous Memorial Church auditorium and called a strike.

I was especially concerned with the Divinity School, which voted on Thursday evening to support the strike. The next morning I sat in on a meeting of faculty and students called to determine the direction of the revolt. Richard Niebuhr represented the administration until Krister Stendahl could come from another meeting. Harvey Cox and other members of the faculty were present.

The student president is an avowed revolutionary, thoroughly committed to overthrow of the existing order. The proposal was made to seize the Divinity School building, Andover Hall and the World Religion Center. When the conservatives carried through and defeated the motion, confusion resulted, and the meeting was like a deflated balloon. It adjourned without reaching a consensus and we went to Harvard Yard.

Several thousand people were milling about, some putting up signs and others tearing them down. Two hundred of the more raucous were marching in a parade up one street and down the other, shouting in a rhythmic but monotonous chant, "On Strike! Join Us!" They did not attract too much of a following.

Every conceivable kind of bizarre dress was manifest. Some Harvard men were as seedy as tramps, and a convocation of these looked like delegates to the National Hobo Association. Others were neatly attired. Women from Radcliffe were present in force, many of them wearing micro-mini-skirts, and some of them looking like accidents going somewhere to happen.

The Communists had moved in to take advantage of the unrest and these were passing out some of the rankest and rawest propaganda to be found this side of Cuba. The brand in predominance seemed to look at Chairman Mao as the epitome of all wisdom, and were lauding Fidel Castro on the sly. One could not help but believe that the strategy for conquest originated in Cuba.

A rock band, The Albatross, set up for business on the steps of Memorial Church, and the electrical amplifiers drowned out everything else for a block. We have come a long way since the poet wrote, "Music hath power to charm the savage breast." The frenzied players with thatches of long hair like unruly stacks of hay dumped precariously upon their heads, blew and pounded out the beat. They gave the impression that Harvard had discovered some of the missing links in the evolutionary chain and had placed them on public exhibition.

Everything seemed to hinge on an afternoon faculty meeting. The president was jeered as he walked through the milling mass to the place, but never lost his cool. Photographers from the news media were everywhere. Inside the hall the various angles of the revolt were recalled and discussed. Witnesses were heard. When a vote finally came after several hours of tension, the faculty decided by a big majority that the act of occupying University Hall was a serious error and breach of trust. But they also censured the action of calling in the police.

When I flew out of Boston the ferment was still seething. A school probably never fully recovers from the effect of such an action. The students were protesting against ROTC and other military installations on campus, the expansion of the campus through wreckage of a subhousing area occupied by poor blacks, and the authoritarian power structure of the school which is alleged to be aloof and unapproachable.

I have been asked several times recently to voice an opinion as to our current travail. I am reluctant to respond because most of us are still living in the dreamy past, in an era of the easy answer philosophy. We still want to stroll down the violet-bordered lanes of childhood, in a world where everything was either black or white. In spite of our longing for "the good old days," we cannot go back. And if we did we would find only a filmy illusion.

And so we have revolution! We plaintively ask why people cannot be satisfied with the good life of ease and comfort. We have worked hard for what we have and now why can we not enjoy it? We point to our gleaming automobiles, our sparkling appliances, and our shiny gadgets. But we have reared a generation which sees these things as symbols to hide sham, pretence and hypocrisy. They do not equate life with things, and in their idealism, they renounce things to seek for life, or for what they think of as life.

They are not unaware that there are millions on earth who are starving, nor do they forget that often our foreign policy is quite selfish, carried out either to purchase favors or freedom from attack, or to increase our trade abroad and further enrich our coffers. There is sometimes the feeling that the government uses education as a means of enslavement and even of exploitation. There is also a feeling that the church is sometimes concerned only with its institutional image rather than with the basic needs of suffering humanity.

On the huge sprawling campuses of our day, students feel they are part of a faceless mass. The professors whom they see only at a distance, often seem to regard them as cogs in the machinery. Disillusionment frequently sets in and the result is that more college students die of suicide each year than by any other means.

I do not think most of us condone the principle of civil disobedience as a legitimate means for attainment of goals in our society, but we are faced with the fact that there are those who do. And they are not all ignorant rabble-rousers and hell-raisers. So we must enter into dialogue and discussion with those whom we would like to ignore, hoping they will disappear as a mere symbol of our times. They will not!

I think it is important that we keep our lines of communication in repair. There's no use of talking into the telephone if no one is on the other end of the line. And a good conversation requires that both listen occasionally. I beg parents in times like these to listen to their young people. We must not be "bugged" by lengthy sideburns, moustaches and long hair, until we forget the humanity of our sons. These young people are saying some vital things. They are impulsive it is true, but they have proven their willingness to suffer for their ideals. They are not apathetic. They are not coldly indifferent to the needs of the world.

I trust, too, that the family of God will not drive out our young people or set them adrift. All of us need a shelter from the storms of life. If we are unwelcome in one we must construct another. If the community of saints is to provide the shadow of a rock in a weary land it must not exclude from the shade those who most need a haven. The status quo is not perfect. We can stand correction in many of our attitudes. Let us hold on tenaciously to our value judgments, but let us not turn a deaf ear to others.

We can have a very great impact upon our contemporary world if we can work together in compassion and understanding. If we fight among ourselves and divide into rival camps on the basis of age and youth, we will lose one group and perhaps lose them both. We must prove that there is room in Christ for all of God's precious children.

About Our Buildings

Mission Messenger (July 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

From time to time in recent months I have been delivering a lecture which I entitle “Strangled By Structures.” In the course of it I take a quick rundown on the book of Acts to learn where the Good News was announced. I point out that it was proclaimed in the Jewish temple, on an outdoor colonnade, in the Sanhedrin court, in a vehicle traveling on the main highway, in private homes and in Jewish synagogues. It was preached by a river side, in a jail, in the inner city of a university town, in a heathen courtroom, a Greek lecture-hall, a third story tenement, the stairs of a military barracks, in a Roman judgment-hall, and in a dwelling rented by a prisoner.

The only place it was not preached is about the only place we do proclaim it— in a house owned by the congregation of saints, and kept for that purpose. The primitive saints owned no “church edifice.” They knew nothing about what is today termed “religious architecture.” They had no idea of a material sanctuary, a pulpit or cushioned pews. All of these were as foreign to their minds as a cathedral or a basilica. The fact is that the Christians constituted an underground movement, flexible and not tied to earthly sites. This was one source of their strength.

A candid survey of contemporary society forces us to realize that we are being herded into a corner because of the traditional approach we have developed. It is not easy to admit this and most of us will die without doing so. We have equated spiritual strength with real estate holdings, and frequently have gauged the success of a congregation, not upon its service to humanity, but upon the size of the pile of brick and stone which has been cemented together in a strategic spot.

Now we are faced with areas where it is unwise to erect “church buildings” as we have come to quaintly refer to them. And these are precisely the places where the penetration of the Presence is most desperately needed. It is a little bit ridiculous to move into the stark poverty of the ghetto and purchase a lot for a fancy sum and erect upon it a shining edifice attesting to our affluence elsewhere.

But when I mention this it “bugs” the brethren no end. Warnings go out that I am dangerous and fanatical. Folks keep a wary eye upon me for fear that I have a hatchet under my coat and may start hacking away the pillars which support the arched roof of “the sanctuary.” Few such complaints come from the ghetto where the brethren are too busy spraying for cockroaches and putting out rat poison to pay much attention to what I say. But brethren who do not have to worry about lice invading the hair of their Sunday School children allow some of the things I say to get in their own.

Be of good cheer, brethren! I am not going to set any of our monasteries on fire. I’m simply trying to spark a flame in the hearts of those who are stacked in our glorious woodsheds and turn them into kindling wood for the Lord. I am as neutral toward buildings as I am toward a claw-hammer or monkey-wrench. I do not get a passion about tools, but I do hate to see some of our mechanics vainly wrestle with a lug wrench that will not fit, and skin all of their knuckles. And I am arguing that the institutional church concept which is hooked on worshiping God “in temples made with hands” is often as inappropriate to our day as a country store with a hitchrack in front of it. Both have had their day and the heyday is over!

I do not recommend that we abandon our structures to the moles and bats. Enough of the brethren are already evacuating them without a planned strategy of retreat, and if some of the black saints show up and “place their membership” the white sheep in some areas will knock the gate down trying to get away from those who will not “stay in their place” and hold the line—the color line, that is.

All I am suggesting is that we re-examine our structures and their purposes and convert them into meaningful units in the service of the Master. As places for reaching the world of the lost they are becoming less effective with each passing year. In great inner city structures which once were packed with proud and aloof worshipers, the small minority which remains rattles around like a handful of dried peas in a gallon sirup bucket. They bask in their former glory and hang pictures of yesterday on the fading walls, but the word “Ichabod” can be written above the portals.

In our day of radio, television and mammoth Sunday newspapers with their colorful supplements, the neo-pagans are not going to sit in front of a wooden stand and listen to someone orate from a borrowed sermon outline on the grave sin of contributing to the Herald of Truth program, or of using individual cups on the table of the Lord. If they are going to be forced to yawn they will just remain in bed where they will not have to fumble in a pocket when the plate is passed. If it keeps on and the men of our age become more complacent we are going to be forced to go into all of the world and reach them. That will be a new wrinkle for some of us!

What can we do? One thing we can do is to “zero in” on the world by regarding our buildings, not as fortresses, but as mobile bases from which to attack. Our problem will then reverse itself. It will not be a question of how to get more in who are out, but of how to get more out who are in. If the early saints had been trapped as we are the Way would never have gotten one foot off the ground. But those saints permeated, penetrated and pierced the culture because they were “Go” oriented instead of “Come” organized. Here is what I think our buildings need to become.

LAUNCHING PADS

We are God’s ballistic missiles and communications satellites. He has made available to us the same dynamic of the Spirit by which he caused the planets to go into eclipse, the earth to rock and reel like a drunken man, the graves to be blasted open, the bodies of the saints to arise from the dead, and his own Son to be resurrected. It is the dynamic which freed the Son from the gravitational pull of the earth and the whole material system, and provided the thrust by which he returned to the glory sphere to take his place at the right hand of the Majesty on high.

The purpose of a pad is to place us in orbit. It is not a squatting place for duds or a showplace for “mock-ups.” Unfortunately a lot of us have been “gutted” of our “works” by the Enemy, and although we have a dynamite Message we are living firecracker lives. Even then we sometimes just sizzle and splutter. We only fizz in the fuse and pop off in the pack. Let’s get ignited and set this world on fire! The most sophisticated missile on earth is as useless as a broken crossbow as long as it is merely sitting on the platter.

Our problem is intensified because we have sold tickets to a lot of spectators who have come to hear a lecture on “the way that is right and cannot be wrong,” and they don’t want to be missiles. They will come up missing if they are expected to get on with the job. It will not take much to “get them up in the air” but it will take a lot of thrust to keep them there. I am serious when I say that the devil probably does not care how many we get into the church if they act like a lot of those who are already there. It is time we turn on the heat and open up the flame jets!

FILLING STATIONS

It is not being too facetious to say that those who speak to the saints should be pumps dispensing high octane fuel into the “think tanks” of those who are parked on the ramps before them. But they must also be road guides and tour directors and get the customers on the way. The real purpose of a filling station operator is different than that of a parking lot attendant. The first provides power to go, the second a place to stop.

It is obvious that few people in their right mind would choose to spend their vacation on the service station apron. Indeed they are generally upset if delayed. Unfortunately, there are many who never use their spiritual fuel to do anything except to go from home to the filling station. Since they never use anything but the “regular grade” they do not have the “no-knock” additive, and frequently expend their only energy in complaining and bickering. They rust out rather than wear out. After a lifetime of routine they end up as “clunkers” filled with bitterness and resentment. We must somehow “get the show on the road” and go where the action is!

ARSENALS

Soldiers who are under fire and who are expending their ammunition must have a periodic replenishment or they will be helpless. The Enemy who engages us is clever and adroit, changing strategy constantly and using maneuvers adapted to divergent circumstances. We must keep abreast of the techniques or be hopelessly outclassed. If we are simply kept penned up or pinned down in the barracks we will make no effective contribution to the struggle.

Part of our problem today is that we have confused standing firm with standing still. As a result we are not being furnished the firepower essential to meeting the attack buried against us in our day. Because the way we said and did things a century ago seemed effective then, we conclude that to be faithful we must perpetuate the method. Many of our brethren are involved in polishing up our flintlock muskets and developing gadgets to make them easier to wield, but we have left the age of the blunderbuss and even the “buzz bomb.” It is one thing to walk in the old paths, but a wholly different thing to wallow in the old ruts!

There is little to be gained by making breathless assaults on positions which are no longer occupied and drumming up fervor for an attack on abandoned fortresses. Frequently men become fervid in decrying the position of “liberal theologians,” when no theologian, liberal or otherwise, has espoused the view for many decades. It is obvious that we do a better job vanquishing the foe when he is not present. One who is cock of the walk in his own chicken yard may be merely a plucked rooster when he flies over the fence.

The point I am making is that we should stop our simplistic approach and equip our brethren to cope with life as it is and where it must be lived— in school, office, shop and neighborhood. We must stop passing out a list of hand-me-down answers which force us to tailor and trim the questions to match and meet our solutions. We live in a complex world. Everything is not in apple-pie order and cannot be settled by supposing that it is and covering it with frosting. You cannot fight the devil with cream-puffs.

All of this points up the fact that we must consider our buildings in new perspective. They must not become monasteries to house a cult of the withdrawn, but radiation centers from which power reaches out to touch life where it is and as it is. We must not enter them to hold a service, because service is to be rendered and not held. Service is what we do in the world, not what we do in a “church building.”

We must also realize that there are places where such buildings are not feasible. It is absurd to reason that there can be no ekklesia where there is not a communal-owned structure. Small bands meeting in tenement living-rooms or ghetto apartments are as precious to our God as those who sit in cool comfort with the filtered light of stained glass windows casting colorful reflections on the clean pages of new hymnbooks. In many areas the money which would be poured into vaulted edifices might well be used to purchase food for starving frames suffering from malnutrition.

Jesus was standing in the shadow of one of the most magnificent structures in the world when he declared, “A greater than the temple is here.” And that greater thing was the principle, “I will have mercy and not sacrifice.” I thought of this recently when brethren conducted me through a beautiful temple made with hands where the rug alone cost thousands of dollars. As I passed by the bulletin board I saw the picture of a little skeletal lad with eyes looking out of cavernous depths— a starving Biafran child. A typewritten note pasted on the picture read: “Help us raise fifty dollars for Biafran relief.”

In our day we must again become militant and mobile. We’ve allowed ourselves to become mired down and entangled with reams of red tape. It is time to start marching. We must put the “go” back in the gospel and take the “miss” out of our concept of mission. We are building as if we were going to stay here always. Our struggle is no longer in the battlefield but on the parking lot. Let’s go forth unto him without our camps, for here we have no continuing city, but we seek one to come!

Our Real Purpose

Mission Messenger (July 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

“And ever since the Reformation, when or where has existed a Protestant or dissenting sect who would tolerate a free enquiry? The blackest billingsgate, the most ungentlemanly insolence, the most yahooish brutality, is patiently endured, countenanced, propagated, and applauded. But touch a solemn truth in collision with a dogma of a sect, though capable of the clearest proof, and you will soon find you have disturbed a nest, and the hornets will swarm about your eyes and hands, and fly into your face and eyes.”— John Adams, Letter to John Taylor.

I do not want my readers to forget that the purpose of this journal is to plead for the unity of all believers in the Lord Jesus Christ. Whatever else we write about is subsidiary to our real goal. This is not to say that unity is the ultimate end of our faith. The end is to lead the whole world to believe that God sent His Son. The unity of believers is the means by which this end can be accomplished. Jesus made conversion of the masses contingent upon our unity.

The reason why our present emphasis is upon oneness is because we are divided. If we were united and working together we could get on with the paramount task. As it is, our condition contradicts our contention. Unless we can demonstrate that we have a unitive principle which is magnificent enough to hold us together we will labor in vain to influence those about us to think in terms of the one body and the one Spirit.

We have been the victim of certain fallacies. As long as we equate these with God's will and seek to bind them upon others we will only confound and confuse. We must face up to these erroneous views honestly and sincerely, and we must openly renounce them, or we will foster schism and disunity. Our fathers were not infallible. They made mistakes. It is no honor to us to adopt and perpetuate their errors. We should divest ourselves of them and heal the breaches which were caused by those whose zeal ran far ahead of their knowledge.

I am not inclined to speak in glittering generalities and allow my readers to guess at my meaning. The time for ambiguity and equivocation is long past. Let me specify some of the perversions of the truth which have splintered and fragmented us until we have been made a laughingstock in the eyes of perceptive people who know that our divided status belies our words.

1. We have abused God's revelation by applying scriptures designed to separate us from pagans and idolaters to our relationship with other children of God. A good example is found in the misuse of 2 Corinthians 6:15-16. The command, "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers," has been deliberately used by factional promoters to break the tie that binds believers. The context plainly shows that "unbelievers" are those who do not recognize Jesus as Lord. They are heathen. "What has a believer in common with an unbeliever? What agreement has the temple of God with idols?"

The word of God consistently distinguishes between brethren in the Lord and unbelievers. A good example is found in 1 Corinthians 6:5, 6. Here the apostle is dealing with litigation between brethren. "Can it be that there is no man among you wise enough to decide between members of the brotherhood, but brother goes to law against brother, and that before unbelievers?” The unbelievers are the unrighteous (verse 1). They are heathen judges.

No one who was in Christ Jesus was an unbeliever in the scriptural context. There were a lot of things wrong with the members of the body at Corinth. Some of them thought that an idol might have real existence. Others were confused about the resurrection, and still others about spiritual gifts. But in spite of their errors they were never designated as unbelievers. They were called saints. They constituted the temple of God. They were Christ’s as Christ was God’s.

There is nothing more calculated to create schism than to apply to citizens those statutes which relate to aliens. This is subversive of all law. It is destructive of all peace. To call upon God’s precious children to come out from among His other children and be separated is to become an apostle of discord. It is immature, carnal and shameful. To create parties of the redeemed ones over personal views concerning instrumental music, the millennium, cups, classes, colleges, radio programs, and such things, is sinful and sectarian.

Every time the Spirit refers to division among the brethren it is condemned. Not once does an apostle even hint that fragmentation of the saints is approved as a means of maintaining purity of teaching. Factions are works of the flesh. They are inimical to the purpose of God, negating the design of the cross, and defeating the plan of heaven for the universe. When men quote those passages intended to build a barrier between those who follow Christ and those dominated by Belial, and use them to erect barriers between those who are brethren in Christ, they are frustrating the work of God.

I care not how sanctimonious such men appear, or how couched in scriptural terminology their pronouncements may be, they are still profane and unspiritual, using the sword of the Spirit to carve and chop into bits the very body it was intended to defend and protect. The purpose of God is to gather together all things into one body, to unite us to each other by uniting us all to Christ. What species of arrogance and bigotry causes men to think they have uncovered a malignant mystery and that the real purpose of revelation is to set us at odds with one another, rending the body into bits?

It is time to repudiate the philosophy of those men and papers dedicated to the inglorious task of widening the chasms and deepening the cleavages between God's children. Let men of courage rise up and batter down the walls of senseless division. Let us challenge every attempt to misuse and misapply the words of the Holy Spirit to justify that unholy spirit which rips and ruptures the body of which we are members. Let us resist every ignorant application of God's word intended to alienate, separate and estrange members of the family from one another.

2. We have been guilty of propagating the inconsistent and untenable view that fellowship in Christ Jesus is contingent upon conformity of opinion and interpretation of doctrinal matters. I use the term "inconsistent" because there is not a single party among us, regardless of how extreme and exclusive it may be, that does not make some provision in its unwritten creed for differences of opinion within its constituency.

Every faction allows for latitude upon many points and while the members may differ seriously upon such matters they do not divide. There is no other basis for any kind of community action than a recognition of and a provision for men to differ. We can no more all think alike than we can all look alike. To set up an accepted mental standard for the new humanity is as ridiculous as to formulate a recognized physical stature for citizenship in our own nation. Men's thoughts will differ in weight as their bodies do. The only unity possible for rational beings is unity in diversity, and every sect among us proves it even while loudly denying it.

This very fact makes it imperative that every faction arbitrarily select and elevate to prominence some point upon which agreement must be absolute in order to be deemed faithful and loyal. It is this point which calls the party into existence and becomes its breath of life. It is the creed of the party, the thing which must be believed in order to be accepted. For its defence the party lives, moves and has its being. On other matters you may be free to differ, but on the “root issue” you must swallow your doubts, shackle your thoughts, and warp your mind into submission. Otherwise you become a traitor, a renegade, and an apostate.

Suppose, for example, the party standard around which “the loyal brethren” are to rally and encamp is opposition to the present method of support for a television program, Herald of Truth. The banner is unfurled over the gates of the party bastion. All who enter must salute it and pledge allegiance to the segment for which it stands. Once inside, they can differ about the morality of war, contraception and birth control, the work of the Holy Spirit, the qualifications of elders, and a hundred other things, including divorce and remarriage. But these do not count in the world of pious pretext where casuistry conceals the duplicity of the factional attitude. None of these things affect the “loyalty” of the partisans so long as they are “sound” on the real issue.

But who authorized fallible beings, including editors, to sort out the issues, and decide which one would mould the Procrustean bed upon which to measure men to see that all of the zealots reach the same height— or depth? Who prescribed this species of pharisaism which regards all of the geese in one’s own party as swans, and all of the swans in other parties as geese?

Who authorized men to interpose themselves and their thinking between other men and the kingdom of heaven? Who gave them the right to beatify and canonize one issue and damn another? Shall our faith stand in the wisdom of men? Will we allow ourselves to be herded and driven into one corral or another by self-appointed whip-cracking guardians of the faith? Let me serve notice right here and upon all who feel inclined to rope and brand me with their partisan irons that I shall not become the pawn of any sect or faction. I belong to the great Shepherd of the sheep. I shall never wear the stigma of another! Never!

The simple truth is that fellowship in Christ Jesus is wholly unrelated to our differences of opinion and interpretation in the one body. Not one passage in the new covenant scriptures urging us to be at peace or to live in harmony was written to bring us into the fellowship. Every such injunction was addressed to those in the fellowship, and precisely because they were in it. Harmony is not essential to fellowship, but fellowship is the foundation for attainment of harmony. We do not come into the fellowship because we have achieved harmony, but we strive to achieve a greater degree of harmony because we are in the fellowship.

Men who make tests of fellowship out of either the pro or con of such matters as instrumental music or the millennium are schismatic and sectarian. Children of God may hold diverse opinions about such matters, and they always will. They can and should discuss them at any length they deem profitable, but to elevate them to tests of fellowship is to make them more important than the cross. It is an effective testimony of the little regard men have for the cross, that they permit such secondary and inferior issues to destroy the relationship secured by the blood of God's dear Son.

Jesus did not die to purchase an instrumental or non-instrumental party. This is not to be the culmination of the plan conceived in the divine mind before the foundation of the world. It was not for this that myriads of angels waited and prophets suffered and died. No man is true to the Lord who predicates a communion upon such a flimsy basis and trumpets it loud and long as God's will for the redeemed of all the earth.

It is time to recover the majesty and might of the kingdom which Jesus came to proclaim. It is time to recapture that sense of oneness in the divine family which is kept inviolate in spite of human failings and misunderstandings. Let the men of God arise and assert their faith in the eternal values and refuse to dabble longer in the puddles of trivia which besmirch all who splash in the muddy shallows.

Let us answer the prayer of Jesus in our generation. Why should we postpone that answer until future ages through our timidity and fright? It is as valid for us as for our posterity. Our fathers were wrong when they divided and created factions and parties. We will be wrong if we perpetuate them. Let us cease the sectarian double-talk and forego the weasel-words and let the world know that we are for unity— not unity at any price, for the price has already been paid. He paid it at Calvary.

To the promotion of the divine program of unity in Him, and in Him alone, we dedicate this paper and our lives. Will you dare to join with us in welding our warring brethren into a unit “according to His purpose set forth in Christ”?

The Magnificent Concern

Mission Messenger (July 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

“Now, my brothers, we must tell you about the grace that God has given to the Macedonian churches. Somehow in most difficult circumstances, their joy and the fact of being down to their last penny themselves, produced a magnificent concern for other people” (2 Corinthians 8:1, 2).

It is an interesting fact that many times those who are the poorest in this world's goods are actually the most generous in helping share the burdens of those who are distressed. There seems to be a willingness to give which acts in inverse ratio to the amount of possessions. What is true of individuals frequently becomes true of the congregations which they constitute.

All of us have known of groups of saints who struggled to get started in rented halls or storefront buildings, with a spirit of love and compassion which was unsurpassed. But we have seen the same communities of believers come unglued and fall to staves, when they became wealthy and moved into imposing structures in an elite neighborhood. It seems to be easier to handle poverty than to manage affluence.

Paul was concerned about collecting funds from the Gentile world to relieve the serious needs of the poverty-stricken saints at Jerusalem. When he reached the compromise with the other apostles by which it was agreed that they would continue to take the Message to the circumcised, while he went among the uncircumcised, he promised that he would not forget the poor in Judea. There is no indication that he ever forgot or evaded the promise.

Corinth was in Achaia, the southern province of the Grecian peninsula, of which Macedonia was the northern province. Corinth was a bustling transfer point for cargo ships and a place of wealth. When Paul wrote the congregation there to urge them to collect a sum to be carried to Jerusalem, he mentioned that the community of saints in Macedonia had been urging him for a year or more to take their contribution to relieve the suffering ones whom they would never see.

In the passage under consideration here he mentions the state of the saints in Macedonia, pointing out their generosity in the midst of abject poverty. This spirit he calls the grace that God has given. We seldom think of our sharing in this fashion. Sometimes we regard it as a sacrifice that we make, or a drive that we put on, or a concern that we feel.

When we are touched in the depths of our being about the report of starvation in Biafra or India, and we feel an impulse to send the small sum which we have been saving for something special, do we ever think of this feeling as grace which God has bestowed upon us? When we are reminded of the squalor and destitution in the ghetto, and we empty our pantry shelves of the cans which we have collected and contribute them to the food drive, do we recognize our desire for what it is?

We may feel that the recipients of our gifts are fortunate enough to share in grace because they share in our things, and all too often we look upon ourselves as the dispensers of grace rather than the receivers of it. There is the danger that we may feel that we are essential to God and that grace could not come without us, when the fact is that we could not go without grace.

The purpose of life is to glorify God and we do this when we share unselfishly with others. The achievement of empathy with others in their straitened circumstances is the magnificent concern. It is this which makes us more Godlike and heavenly. The Macedonians were in difficult circumstances. But they were not defeated by them. Instead, the surging joy which bubbled up within, coupled with their almost penniless state, caused them to react in such a manner as to give generously and freely. Like the widow who cast in the two mites, they gave their living, and in doing so found the secret of life.

Student Attitudes

Mission Messenger (July 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

It is becoming ever more evident that there is a growing state of student discontent in the liberal arts colleges maintained by members of the Churches of Christ. Much of it takes the form of a seething inner revolt against the parochial stance and dogmatic attitude so frequently reflected by administration and faculty. There is a general feeling that the student body is walled in from real life with its multitudinous problems, and is subjected to over-protectionism more adapted to juveniles and scholars on a junior high school level.

A good example of this is found in the lectureships which feature speakers who are “safe” and “sound” by establishment standards, men who will say what they are expected to say, or who can couch their message in such language as to render it fairly vapid and nebulous. Students would like to hear controversial figures and be able to openly question them. They would prefer dialogue to monologue, especially when the latter specializes in repetition of old cliches and stereotyped expressions.

The administrators are generally dedicated to maintaining the status quo and regard as the first and greatest commandment, “Don’t rock the boat.” But while they can regulate who may speak to the students they cannot police the conversation of the students among themselves. A great deal of vital thinking is being done by some brilliant young men and women, and they are no longer “buying” all that is dished up by professors who want to “make their calling and election sure” with the source of income.

Students find themselves relatively helpless when a teacher is summarily dismissed because of a depth of spiritual experience or a developing breadth of fellowship reaching across our nonsensical walls, but they lay these things up in their hearts, and some day they will be in a position to make a difference. They are not unaware of the fact that often it is the one most dedicated to Christ who is filtered out while those who are willing to parrot the party line are lauded as the hope of maintaining our factional future.

We do not share the feeling that college men and women ought to sit supinely and gulp down all that is fed them without question. We believe that it is healthful to challenge whatever is said. Some of our traditional interpretations are pretty childish and a wee bit silly. If we have become the most ardent challengers of the whole religious world, we ought not to object when we are asked to sup from our own spoon. Socrates was right when he said that “the unexamined life is not worth living,” but I should like to add that “the unexamined faith is not worth having.”

It is too much to hope that we will regain our integrity as a religious movement overnight, but it is comforting to know that there are those who are willing to work for it. I welcome the questioning attitude when turned inward upon our own views and interpretations. Each generation must honestly face up to its own errors in thinking if it will eliminate rather than perpetuate them. Truth needs no buttressing of false rationalization. Let men be free and let the truth be known!

“Our colleges” are making their pitch for public recognition and support by causing it to appear that the students are a docile lot who will remain properly curbed and harnessed. That may not be exactly “cricket” because there is more than one way to have a revolution. It isn’t necessary to carry a supply of Spam and soda crackers into the administration building and settle down for a spell until the police arrive and clobber you and toss you out into the yard. Nor is it essential that you set the library on fire with gasoline-filled Coke Bottles. The really effective revolution occurs in the hearts and minds of men who seek for truth regardless of obstacles, and who will adopt it regardless of cost. It is here that many of our younger brethren will measure up to the best of men.

Men and Morals

Mission Messenger (August 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

Morality is not properly the doctrine of how we make ourselves happy, but how we make ourselves worthy of happiness.—Immanuel Kant, Critique of Practical Reason.

As one grows older and becomes more serious about the problem of how he must order the remainder of his life, he seeks for some expression which will provide for him a guideline, or a point of reference, to which he can refer for measurement of his attitude and accomplishment. Since my own life has been so Biblically oriented, it is not strange that I would select from the sacred pages the motto which hopefully is engraved upon the walls of my inner consciousness.

I must confess that the choice was not the result of diligent search. Rather, it seemed to capture my mind upon an occasion when I was casually reading the speech of Paul which was made one Saturday to the attendants of a synagogue in Pisidia. He was, as usual, reasoning with them out of the law and the prophets, and having made reference to David, he said, "After he had served his own generation by the will of God, he fell asleep." At once it occurred to me that this best summarized my personal responsibility— to serve my own generation by the will of God, and then fall asleep to be laid with my ancestors.

With this philosophy I can never be passive, for service by the will of God makes one an activist. It will also deliver me from that tragic fate into which so many drift as they age, grumbling because they are not served by others, and whining and complaining that they are laid on the shelf. No one is laid on the shelf, but many crawl up on it and call down maledictions upon the heads of others, including their own flesh and blood.

If I meaningfully serve any generation it must be my own. I cannot serve the generation preceding. My fathers served it, sometimes well and sometimes not. I dare not scrap the values they discovered, nor perpetuate the errors which they made a part of their legacy. It would be a disservice to my generation to do either. Nor can I keep fighting the battles of yesterday as a retreat from the conflicts of the present, for there are new foes to be met.

I know a veteran of the first World War who delights in recounting every facet of his life in the military in 1917-18. He has told the tales so often and embellished them so gradually that they are vastly more interesting than the facts must have been. But he knows nothing about the war in Vietnam, except that “they don’t make soldiers like they use to make them.” No doubt he served a past generation of men well, and he is still serving that generation, but it is no longer here.

A lot of good brethren are still part of a nineteenth century restoration movement. They are storming positions long since abandoned and flogging dead horses which will never be revived except in their imagination. As an exercise in futility this might be harmless if it were not for the fact that while they are battering at walls no longer defended a vigorous enemy is pressing in upon us from other quarters.

I cannot serve the next generation directly, because I will not be here. I am not so foolish as to think I am indispensable, and I am quite content to believe that God will raise up men much more qualified than myself to fulfill his purpose. I will be thrilled if I can pass on to my posterity a sense of freedom in which they can serve without my skeletal hand reaching from the grave to restrain or restrict them. I want them to make their decisions, not in the light of relationship to a fallible progenitor but in the love of God.

It seems to me that one small contribution which might be made is to face up honestly and unflinchingly to issues being raised in my generation. I am not certain that we rate very high on the scale of integrity when it comes to dealing with contemporary problems. This is especially true when those problems relate to controversial matters. We sometimes indulge in “the easy answer approach” which dismisses a thing without really dealing with it.

A CASE IN POINT

I think this is true, for example, of our glib treatment of what has come to be called “the new morality” or “situation ethics.” This is such a loaded proposition that one risks his standing if he even suggests that facetious remarks and ridicule do not adequately answer the questions raised. College young people are perceptive enough to see this and we make the chasm between them and ourselves wider by our demonstration of ignorance of what it is all about.

I know preachers who profess to speak learnedly and authoritatively about the subject and have never even read Situation Ethics, by Joseph Fletcher; Christian Morals Today, by John A. T. Robinson; or Ethics in a Christian Context, by Paul Lehmann. University students cannot stand sham or pretence. They can see through fake scholarship like looking through a window-pane. And one who does not know what he is talking about is soon dismissed with contempt by youthful intellectuals.

Perhaps I am wrong, but I do not believe we can sweep such things under the theological rug much longer. We must meet them eyeball-to-eyeball and on their own ground. I propose to give them some notice because I think we will be forced to do so eventually. I want to have my say before circumstances drive me to the place where I must act under compulsion instead of voluntarily. And I want to be open and above board in my analysis and evaluation. This will not be easy because I confess to a natural bias in the matter.

There are at least three factors about situation ethics which cause many of those who register a wholesale condemnation of the concept to have an uneasy conscience. I say “many” because it is obvious that a number of brethren who make such an arraignment know nothing at all about the matter. They are simply opposing something because it appears to them to be new and modern, or because they have heard a preacher who knows no more about it than themselves, inveigh against it. Such people are like a jury which prepares its verdict when sworn in and before hearing the evidence. They are guilty of a breach of trust, wholly unethical, and are therefore unqualified to judge any approach to ethics.

But those who have studied what is being said, not merely to discover what is wrong, but simply to discover what it is all about, must face up honestly to the fact that all of us have practiced situationalism in some degree. And to compound the problem most of us somehow feel that it was precisely by doing so that we attained to our kindest and noblest moments in life. We have been confronted with poor unfortunates caught up in a web of exigencies, and we have said, “Circumstances alter cases,” and instead of cracking the whip which we flourish in the pulpit, we have pleaded for mercy in spite of “our laws.” That is really the basis of situation ethics.

Secondly, we have the uncomfortable feeling, the more we read about Jesus, that he exemplified this attitude, and that he felt that people were more important in the long run (and also in the short run) than legalistic pronouncements or propositions.

He seemed to be always in hot water with the lawyers because he emphasized the spirit which was behind the law, instead of the law which conceals the spirit. And this is the foundation of situation ethics.

Those who deeply immerse themselves in the new covenant scriptures soon come to see that they were never intended to be an inflexible law, wholly unconcerned with backgrounds, tension and pressures, but that they actually grew out of human situations and predicaments and are (as I believe) God's response to such conditions, telling us how Jesus would react under such circumstances. Even then, they not only allow, but actually urge the employment of our best judgment in handling cases which arise. All of this I will document when the time appears proper.

Why do I raise these issues at all? The answer is quite simple. I am a commando for Christ, and am constantly infiltrating areas of opposition in which I must seek to bring every thought into captivity to my King. I work in the black ghetto where revolt is seething and where, upon one memorable occasion, a young militant got up while I was speaking and yelled out, "Take your damned blond-haired, blue-eyed Jesus and get the hell out of here!" I am in dialogue sessions with brilliant Jewish men, eminently successful in business and professions, who publicly question my whole basis for belief in Jesus. And I purposely meet with young revolutionaries on the university campus, shrewd and perceptive, who sometimes demand in language formerly reserved for latrine walls, that we quit feeding them mental fecal matter and "tell it as it is."

Once upon a time this did not concern me. I "went to church" three times per week, and often much more than that. It was a wonderfully comforting experience, with no danger or excitement. It was soothing to the spirit to be able to assemble with nice clean middle-class white Americans, in such a chummy spirit of glorified camaraderie. Then something happened to upset the spiritual apple-cart which had been hauled so smoothly along the highway of life. And when it occurred the fruit was spilled all over the surrounding landscape.

Of course what really happened is that I met Jesus. He wasn't hard to recognize. I had been talking about him and describing him to others most of my life. But the strange thing is that when I met him he said "Follow me!" I thought I had been doing that for years, and I conjectured immediately that he meant I must "go to church" more frequently. Instead he turned his head on where I had been going and led me out into the world which I thought I had forsaken for his sake. And there wasn't anything comfortable about it.

I was on the defensive at once. I had to fight or go under. But I was amazed to find how sharp and keen was the sword which the Spirit had furnished. All of a sudden it came to me that I had never really been in battle before. I had engaged in sparring sessions with brethren in the same company upon such breath-taking issues as to whether it was a sin to plunk on a piano while singing, or as to whether Jesus was going to show up before or after the millennium, but we used the flat side of the weapon to clobber one another. We had never really intended to kill one another, for then we wouldn't have had anyone left to fight, and a majority of our best sermon outlines would have become obsolete.

But when Jesus called me out of "the church" (not the body of which he is head), to go into all the worlds, life took on a wholly new perspective. The things we had been fussing about for years— cups, classes, colleges, etc.— suddenly became very inconsequential. When pirates are attacking the ship the crew cannot continue to argue over who gets the next move in a checker game. And when someone is bombing the house with incendiaries, there is no time to fuss with your wife about which tie you will wear to meet the fire engine.

One reason why we have elevated our pusillanimous issues out of all proportion is because we have been lured off the main road and into a nice family picnic ground on a side road. If we get back in the traffic on the turnpike we will not have time to argue about how to pass the bread. There isn't anything wrong with a picnic unless it wastes time that should be used in going somewhere. And we have "miles to go before we sleep," as Robert Frost put it.

I think that before I go on I had better explain the bit about meeting Jesus. That kind of talk makes our brethren as uncomfortable as a society matron with poison ivy on the evening of the big ball. I am not implying that anything mystical took place. I did not go into a trance or have a vision. There was no speaking in tongues or getting the shakes or weak trembles. My hair did not stand on end and I did not have goose-pimples. I am too pragmatic for that kind of thing. Instead, I contacted Jesus personally in the only way and place that I could meet him — in the consciousness of my own heart. It was like coming home in the evening and turning a key in the lock and opening the door to find an old friend sitting there, as big as life, in the living-room.

FACING UP TO LIFE

After this little diversion I am prepared to say that I am convinced that if we plan to make any impact upon our culture we must deal definitively with the moral questions now being raised. We cannot continue to engage in indiscriminate wholesale charges, lest we end up doing an injustice to our own position and ideals. As a poet of yesteryear so quaintly expressed it.

Full many a shot at random sent,

Hits mark its sender never meant;

As gun when aimed at duck or plover,

Flies back and knocks the hunter over.

What is meant by the term “new morality?” It was first employed by the pope of Rome in a document issued on February 2, 1956. It related, in its inception to existential ideas, which were confused with situational ethics by Pius XII on April 18, 1952, and because it was feared that it would be used to defend birth control such an approach to ethics was barred from Catholic seminaries. The tag “new morality” at once became suspect and guaranteed that it would come under attack. Immediately men began to brand it as the old immorality in modern dress, with Lord Shawcross of Great Britain being at the forefront, calling it “the old immorality condoned.”

John A. T. Robinson, Bishop of Woolwich, introduced the subject of situational ethics in his popular volume Honest to God, and thus tied it in with the nature of Deity. This created such a furore that he felt obliged to publish another work called “Christian Morals Today” and consisting of the text of three lectures delivered in Liverpool Cathedral. He expressed a deep concern for mutual understanding and communication and urged his detractors to credit him with an equal passion for Christian truth and integrity. He denied that he was “primarily impelled by the pressures of the contemporary situation and by the impossibility of ‘selling’ the old medicine because it is unpalatable.”

The bishop divides his thesis into three parts, plugging for freedom over fixity, love over law and experience over authority. I have never seen a very careful analysis of his position by any of our brethren. Probably there are two reasons for this. A great many have not read it and those who have do not want to get their heads into a hornet’s nest. They have been stung by “brotherly hornets” before and they prefer to let sleeping dogs lie— and lying dogs sleep! But I have yet to meet with a university group of any size whose members have not read the treatise and are anxious to discuss it.

I doubt that we can much longer continue to brush it aside with a wave of the hand. And to take a haughty, supercilious attitude in which we profess that such a thing is beneath our dignity goes over like a lead balloon. Modern college students are a pretty irreverent lot who delight in pricking pomposity and knocking the wadding out of a “stuffed shirt.” If you attempt to soar above them on waxen wings, and look down from lordly heights, they will turn the heat on and melt your pinions.

It is true, as many contend, that we do not necessarily have to enter into direct confrontation with the intellectuals. We can stay in our own structures and behind our barricades and talk to one another about what they must be like. But there are two things wrong with that. First, we will eventually be beaten by attrition. We live in an intellectual age, and with the rapid expansion of knowledge we must either go into the intellectual world, or there will be no world into which to go. God has just not promised to keep enough people ignorant so the Churches of Christ can survive. Either we capture the intellectual world for Christ or we’ve had it, so far as our generation is concerned.

Secondly, we cannot serve our generation according to the will of God, by ignoring either that generation or God’s will. One cannot escape the feeling that if Jesus were still here in the flesh he would be “sitting among the teachers, listening to them and asking them questions.” We cannot move the battle to our ground where we can conduct it according to a timetable from prepared positions. We have to go where the action is, and we might have to ride “into the Valley of Death” and “into the jaws of hell” if we are really the Light Brigade!

Moreover, we face another possibility which has concerned me a good deal lately. Our brethren are still contending for law in a loveless fashion, while blasting away at the hippies for advocating love in a lawless fashion. But it remains that love is the ultimate dynamic of transformation for the simple reason that God is love, and God is absolute. If we continue to “lay down the law” while others start “living up to love” we will be hanged on our own gallows. I am sure it must be humiliating to an eagle to be shot down while soaring in the wild blue yonder, but it must add insult to injury when the arrow which does the job is tipped with his own tail feathers, plucked while he was asleep on the perch.

Probably it will not make much difference to the Bishop of Woolwich whether I deal with his thinking or ignore it. He will probably never hear of me, and he appears to be a pretty independent kind of chap who does not worry too much about criticism. That is one thing we have in common. It does make a difference to me, however, whether I face up as honestly as I can to the issues being raised. I have learned to live with the castigation of others but I confess that I have not yet found a way to silence my conscience or inner compulsion.

It seems to me that there are three approaches I can take to the body of thought called “Christian Morals Today.” The first I shall call the “coroner-mortuary approach.” I can simply pronounce the whole thing dead and decaying and take it out and bury it with my solemn (and relieved) blessing. But what happens when a mortician has duly interred a corpse, and drives back home to find the chap sitting on the back steps of the mortuary whistling, and honing a switchblade knife?

The second approach I refer to as the “dissecting-room approach.” Here the body is assumed to be dead and is placed on a sanitary table, with the tools for taking it apart laid out in proper array. The white-coated attendants gather around prepared to find out the congenital weakness which resulted in early demise. But what is the appropriate reaction if the cadaver suddenly sits up and winks at the doctors? There isn't room under the table for all of them.

I have decided on using the "diagnostic technique." I recognize the body as being alive and energetic, but I propose to examine it to see why it cannot walk a straight line. As I make a chart on my findings I shall expect to set down with approval what I consider to be normal, as well as to list deviations from the norm. I fully expect to get into heated arguments with the patient over what is normal and whether my line is straight or not. That will not make me nervous, because the whole medical fraternity in which I interned has been fighting over these matters for years. As a matter-of-fact we now have more than two dozen schools of thought, although that may be using the word "thought" a little loosely.

I would hope that I might be able to state the position of Dr. Robinson in language and terms which he would approve as accurate. If I did otherwise I would be quite unethical. "What doth it profit a man to overcome an approach to ethics, and lose his own ethic?" However, I am not sure I can do so. This is probably one of the most difficult tasks one can assign himself. I shall try to retain my integrity, and will be ready to apologize for any unfairness.

First off, Dr. Robinson does not believe there is a Christian ethic, pre-determined for all time and static. It is his contention that as times change Christians must change with them, and that such changes do not make us less Christian in spirit, but actually more so. It is argued that the complex technocratic processes to which we are exposed force us to constantly reassess our values and revise our views as to what is moral and non-moral. The changing stance of the theological establishment in our day toward war, capital punishment, homosexuality and suicide is cited as proof of this.

I am a little reluctant to express my views on some of these things, not because I am afraid to discuss my position with those who accept the “new morality,” but simply because I do not care to argue with those of my brethren who do not. I am not at all sure that the popular position taken on any of them represents attainment to a greater sense of moral values.

THE PROBLEM OF WAR

Take the question of war, for example. I am not a pacifist, a fact which brought me into conflict with some of the finest and noblest saints I have ever met, my brethren in Great Britain. I doubt that anything is really moral which is wholly unrealistic, and it seems to me that nothing is more unrealistic in the present state of the world than to say that war must never be used as a means of thwarting wilful and deliberate aggression.

This position ignores the fact that God employed war as a judgment upon nations, and even upon Jerusalem (Ezekiel 14:21). Surely he was not immoral. This does not mean that God likes war any more than I like it. I did not punish my children because I derived pleasure from the experience but in order to produce “the fruit of real goodness” in their characters. I am reminded that William Tecumseh Sherman said that “War is hell,” and I concur, but I do not forget that God also made hell. And it was made as the result of war.

If Michael and his angels had been pacifists, the devil might have taken heaven over, and if this had happened those who went to heaven would have gone to hell. I do not concur with the view that the coming of Christ changed the nature of God and reformed the Father. This would have had to happen if all war is now sinful. Certainly war is an evil, but it is not necessarily a sin. All sin is evil, but not all evil is sin. Obviously not every war is justified, but that is not the question here.

I will be thrilled when the nations beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruninghooks. But it will be necessary for all nations to desist from lifting up the sword against each other, for so long as one learns war with a view to the destruction of others, the others will have to defend themselves. We are not living in an ideal social framework, but in a world of sin. And just as individuals may sin against each other, nations may trespass upon and trample down the rights of other nations. God will turn those nations which hate him and his rule into hell. War is the judgment of God upon such sin here and hell is the judgment of God upon such sin hereafter.

Civil government has been ordained by God and is thrice said to be a minister of God. Civil authority is divinely authorized as God's minister to act as "a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil." When I assist in the work of rewarding good or in striking terror into the hearts of evil men, I am aiding God's minister to fulfill a responsibility to God. I cannot take this into my own hands for it has been given into the hands of the civil authority.

In view of this I do not agree with the idea that we will ever reach the place where we will need to regard war now as being immoral. If nations arrive at the point where this type of judgment is no longer requisite I will rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory. I trust that they will mature so that war will not be necessary just as we hope that our children will grow up so physical chastisement and restraint are no longer required. But when children attain such stature we need not regard the spankings which we once gave them as having been immoral.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

When I ponder the problem of capital punishment I find myself again out of tune with modern psychiatrists and advocates of penal reform. Understand that I am not opposed to reform, for I am sure that administration of many of our institutions is often calculated to make criminals of some and harden others. Sweeping changes should be made in jails and corrective centers. This is especially true of those within the state where I reside.

But it seems to me that those who advocate abolition of all capital punishment ignore three vital factors: (1) The absolute sovereignty of God as the creator and giver of human existence on earth; (2) The malignancy of sin which left unchecked would destroy the universe; (3) The divinely delegated authority to human society to remove from its fabric those who are incorrigibly devoted to the destruction of that fabric by acts of violence against the innocent.

Our modern problem stems from a denial of all three of these postulates. It is here that the theory of evolution may have injected its most fatal venom. If man is simply an animal which wiggled out of the primordial ooze and clambered clumsily up the ladder of social development with a few missing rungs on the way, there is really no debt or obligation owed to God. There is no real reason for loving or respecting God, for there is no real proof that God loves man or regards him with any different view than he would a tadpole or a reptile. Indeed, if God loved “man” at every stage, this is how he would have had to love him at some stages, if the evolutionist is correct.

But if (as I believe) God made man uniquely in his own image, then to brutally assault man is to attack and seek to destroy the image of God. Any theory of the origin of species which makes man merely an animal, regardless of how superior an animal he may be, can only postulate ultimate chaos and return to a jungle existence governed by fang and claw. Certainly the fangs will be polished and sanitized, and the claws be sheathed in silver and gold, but one who is disemboweled by a “cat” in an asphalt jungle shaded by skyscrapers instead of palm trees, will not know the difference.

Men prey upon one another when they have animals for ancestors, but they pray for one another when they recognize God as a common Father. I do not regard it quite so important that man was made a great deal higher than the animals as that he was made a little lower than God. In Psalm 8:5, an answer is given to the question, "What is man, that thou art mindful of him?" In the Authorized Version, the rendering is "Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels," but the word translated angels is elohim, and that is the word used for God in Genesis 1:1.

It is not the distance from animals but the proximity to God which makes man unique. So the next verse (Psalm 8:6) says "Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands; thou hast put all things under his feet." Man abdicates his responsibility when he gets on the animal level or when he seeks to dethrone God. The first shows a disrespect for himself, the second an irreverence for the creator. And he does both when he becomes a wilful and malicious murderer. He attempts to be under what he is over and aspires to be over what he is under.

And it is here that God decrees that man forfeits his right to continue to live with those who remain within the status for which man was made. "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God made he man" (Genesis 9:6). Now there are two broad classes of sociologists who oppose capital punishment in our day— those who deny the existence of God and regard the Bible as a compilation of folklore, and those who accept the existence of God and the concept of revelation, but who think that God has changed or that conditions have altered to such an extent that the original decree has been outmoded or repealed.

Among the non-sociological scripturists will be found varying degrees of knowledge (and ignorance) which do not especially require our attention. Some who are affected by simplistic symptoms, think that the commandment, “Thou shalt not kill,” settles the question by forbidding judicial execution. This is ridiculous because only twenty-seven verses after this command was first recorded, God said, “If a man come presumptuously upon his neighbor, to slay him with guile; thou shalt take him from mine altar, that he may die” (Exodus 21:14). God has always distinguished between murder and killing by judicial decree. All murder is killing but not all killing is murder.

Again, there are those who think that the decree made in the first book of the Bible has been abrogated, yet we read the same thing in the final volume. “He that killeth with the sword must be killed with the sword” (Revelation 13:10). And it is Paul who points out that the civil power is God’s appointed agent to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil, and he does not bear the sword in vain.

It is argued that capital punishment as currently administered is discriminative, with the poor and ignorant the victims, while the well-to-do and shrewd escape. This is probably the case as statistics indicate, but it does not concern the morality of capital punishment. It concerns the morality of administration. The same thing can be said about the political administration of affairs in other areas, but the fact that the tax burden falls heaviest on the poor only indicates that the situation should be cleared up, and not that the tax structure should be abandoned as immoral.

It is also objected that the action is so final and irretrievable, but it is not any more so than the death of a victim shot in the heart by a robber, or the death of a woman choked or bludgeoned to death in her own home by a rapist. Why is it that modern “morality” seems always to be on the side of the criminal aggressor without taking account of the rights of the innocent victim?

The sociologists debate among themselves as to whether capital punishment is a deterrent, but on this basis all punishment will have to be eliminated. It is obvious that prison and parole systems provide no effective deterrent for many criminals commit the same crimes again on the day of their release, thus compounding the offense. It could be that laxity of enforcement and long delays in bringing anti-social characters to justice is the real trouble. Solomon said, "Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil" (Ecclesiastes 8:11).

But our argument is that capital punishment for murder is not to be exacted simply because of its effect upon others, but because it is the divine judgment to keep the land from being drenched in innocent blood. The effect is secondary. The forfeiture of one's right to continue in the realm of the living is conditioned upon his blatant disrespect for the person of one made in the image of God. Certainly we agree that there are variant degrees of responsibility and there are mitigating circumstances. We already recognize these in our categories of first, second and third degree murder and manslaughter. This is for the proper agents of civil authority to determine, but this has nothing to do with the morality of capital punishment.

It is our proposal to deal concretely with some of the questions raised by Dr. Robinson in Christian Morals Today, and to this end we trust that you will read our next issue. Please remember that it is not necessary for you to concur with my ideas and views to be loved and respected as my brother or sister. I do trust that you will credit me with an earnest desire and a sincere intention to face up honestly to the current conflict as a true commando of my Lord.

The Authority Totem

Mission Messenger (August 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

The influence of this little journal now reaches far beyond the limits of the particular religious segment in which I grew up and I am deeply indebted to a kind providence which has lent wings to my words beyond their deserving. However, my concern for our immediate problems is in no sense lessened. As one broadens his acquaintanceship he need not forget those with whom he is more closely allied by choice and circumstances.

I have a deep sense of compassion for those of my brethren who are the constituency of the Churches of Christ. They are heirs of a movement which began as “a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects,” but they were fragmented into so many rival factions and warring tribes that any real witness attempted by them for unity is virtually negated among thinking people. Even the type of approach toward unity by most of them only serves to widen the existing chasms and create new cleavages.

The reason for this is quite understandable. Our brethren have a veil over their faces in the reading of God’s message and they cannot distinguish between the divine revelation and their own human interpretation. They confuse their deductions with his declarations and seek to bind all equally upon the hearts and consciences of those who are willing to be servants of God but are not willing to be slaves of men. Unless our brethren are transformed by the Spirit and renounce their false premise they are destined to become the most narrow and antagonistic sectarians of our age.

At the risk of becoming offensive when my only aim is to be objective, let me be as specific as possible. One of the mainline journals published in Texas in defence of Church of Christism has a very personable and well-informed editor. He is, of course, as all such editors are, caught in a partisan trap which makes it essential for him to trim his sails according to the factional winds, and this means that he cannot keep a straight course but must steer by tacking from one week to another. Thus his editorials must veer from left to right and back again, as the passenger load shifts from one side to another.

This method may eventually land him, or a succeeding pilot, close to the goal, but it is a costly way to travel and makes for a lot of seasick voyagers who are going along for the ride. Recently our fellow-editor has had to take note of other godly, sincere and consecrated brethren in the Lord who are heading for the same goal but who see no harm in using instrumental music in conjunction with their expression of praise unto the Father. How does he justify our fragmentation of God's wonderful family over such an issue?

The answer is made over and over. "It is a question of the authority of God's word." It is just that simple. Our Texas editorial brother respects the authority of the Bible. Those who have instrumental music reject and despise that authority. They do not recognize the Lordship of Jesus over their lives. If they say that they do they are dishonest. If they did they would throw the instrument out, confess their sin for ever having thought it was justified, and then the loyal brethren who have always respected the authority of the word would forgive and receive them, and we would all be one. Unity is that simple! It is just that easy!

Is it really? In order to keep you from becoming more confused I will designate the editor of whom I have here been speaking as Editor Number One, for there is another paper published in Texas, and its editor also opposes instrumental music. But he is equally opposed to the support of Herald of Truth and orphan homes which Editor Number One endorses and defends. Editor Number Two says it is simply a matter of respect for the authority of God's Word, and that division between them is wholly unnecessary and caused by Number One.

All that Number One needs to do is to repent and renounce Herald of Truth and the institutions, and acknowledge his sin in once defending them, and the loyal brethren who have stood for the truth will forgive him and receive him, and unity will follow as day follows night, or better, as night follows day!

In the meantime. Number One calls those who use instrumental music "liberals," and those who oppose Herald of Truth "antis." He brands the first as sectarian and the others as extremists. He calls them hobbyists. Number Two brands those who use instrumental music as "liberals" but he also labels the supporters of Number One as "liberals." He tries to put them in the same boat, but Number One refuses to allow this. He thinks that his is the only boat that has a ghost of a chance of making the crossing. Number Two laughs at this. He thinks that Number One is already on the rocks and doesn't know it!

However, this is just the beginning of sorrows. There is another paper published in Texas by a genial and perceptive editor. He is opposed to instrumental music and Herald of Truth, but he is also opposed to Sunday Schools, of which Number Two is an ardent defender, even to the point of pushing and promoting the sale of literature to perpetuate the classes. Number Three says that it is simply a matter of respect for the authority of the word of God. He concludes that he reveres the Lordship of Jesus whereas Number Two rejects and denies it.

Number Three declares that unity is not a complicated matter at all. It can be achieved very easily. All that Number Two needs to do is to study the Bible without his preconceived prejudice for classes, repent and renounce the classes, and send a letter to the loyal paper asking for forgiveness, and the faithful brethren who have remained sound on the issue will receive him, and together they can labor to help the world see the glorious majesty of the kingdom of heaven and the awful sin of having Sunday Schools.

As the situation now stands. Number Three regards Number One and Number Two as “liberals.” He also regards those who use the instrument as “liberals” but he thinks that Number One and Number Two are more dangerous than those who use instruments because they are more nearly like the genuine, and the counterfeit dollar that is most like the original will fool the most people. The genuine is represented by Number Three and the folks who oppose Sunday Schools. They are the real true Lord’s church. Number One and Number Two are sectarian.

Number One and Number Two both agree on one thing and that is that Number Three is an “anti” and an extremist. He is a hobbyist and would rather oppose the Sunday School than to have peace. They both agree that he does not need to have a Sunday School to be accepted by them. All he needs to do is to keep still about the Sunday School they have and quit trying to proselyte their members by making it appear that the Sunday School is like the missionary society.

Do not become bored or aggravated with my little recital for there are at least two dozen of our factions, all of which deserve mention. Just to say there are twenty-five divisions in the non-instrument ranks doesn’t impress us very much because we are all holed up and hibernating in our own monasteries and we never meet any of the others. Thus we can shrug them off as inhabitants of Never-Never Land. But when we get right down to the nitty-gritty of it, they are all here and must be reckoned with in all of the inglorious shadow which they cast over a once noble unity experiment. They are all alive and kicking—especially the latter!

So let's move along to Number Four who edits a paper in California. He opposes instrumental music, orphan homes and Sunday School classes, but he also opposes individual cups on the Lord's table, while Number Three endorses these. Number Four declares that Number Three is not sound in the faith. He has caused division and offences contrary to the doctrine. He must be marked and avoided. He says that peace can easily be restored. All that is required is for Number Three to begin respecting the authority of God's Word by renouncing individual cups and requesting forgiveness for his sin in countenancing their use. The prodigal simply needs to return to the Father's house and take up life again with his "elder brothers."

Meanwhile, Number Four says that Number One, Number Two and Number Three are all "liberals." But Number Three calls Number Four an "anti" and an extremist. The others do also but they are not "bugged" by him so much, because Number Three is between them and Number Four.

But this has gone far enough! If you don't get the point by adding two and two together, you'll not get it by tacking twenty more on. If you think all of this is funny, you are mistaken. There is nothing more shameful than to see the children of God split up into warring tribes, hacking away at each other with the sword of the Spirit, blunted though it may be by their rashness and ignorance.

What we have done is to carve out a restoration totem pole with a couple of dozen grotesque figures squatting on each other and representing the traditional image passed along to us by our factional forefathers who were just as wrong as they were sincere. We may have inherited their sincerity but we have also adopted their errors. Look up and down the entire pole and every party considers every other either sectarian or extremist.

A sectarian is one who has what we oppose, an extremist is one who opposes what we have. This is unvarying in its application. So here we are, all carved out of the same trunk, and every one of us is a sectarian to some, and an extremist to others. That is, all of us except the one on the top and the one on the bottom. There are no sectarians for the one on top for no one has anything which he does not have. There are no extremists for the one on the bottom for he has nothing which anyone would take time to oppose. The one caught in the middle has an equal number of sectarians and extremists to bother with.

Let not Editor Number One flatter himself that he is better than the others because he is “nearer right” for this would be denied by every other on the totem pole. He would be charged with being ultra-liberal, for what he calls “nearer right” is what they tag as being more liberal. Besides this, the spirit which puts him where he is, is the same identical spirit which puts the rest of them where they are. The Church of Christ in Texas (or anywhere else) which denies fellowship on the basis of an honest opinion regarding instrumental music or the millennium is just as bigoted and intolerant in spirit as the lowest faction on the totem. It does not manifest itself in as many items but the sectarian spirit is not really a relation to things at all, but an attitude toward brethren.

And if Editor Number One were to be “converted” by Number Two he would automatically increase the number of things regarded as tests of fellowship, and decrease the number of those whom he regards as in it. Thus, fellowship has little to do with relationship to Jesus, but is regulated purely by the rationalization of human minds up and down the scale of all those controversial items dreamed up and drummed up by those who confuse being sticklers for opinions with standing for the Lord. In the final analysis this hinges fellowship on the mental meanderings of the most extreme and anti-social exclusivist.

This crazy-quilt pattern results in absurd simplistic propositions for eliminating division. Editor Number One suggests that if those who use instrumental music love their brethren more than they do the instrument they should give it up and thus restore peace by removing the cause of offense. Since he has adopted the policy of peace by surrender of offending items, Editor Number Four now has a tool for effectively removing individual cups from every congregation in the land. Instead of debating the issue, which always intensifies the sectarian spirit, all he needs to do is to plant a brother in every “cups church,” as he comically and quaintly refers to them, and let these infiltrators demand that what the brethren preach on the instrument they practice on the cups. “What is sauce for the goose is applesauce for the gander.”

Seriously though, what is our difficulty? It is not a question of attitude toward authority at all. Our brethren who keep parroting this moss-covered cliché should realize they are divisive. I know brethren who love Jesus as much as anyone on earth and they feel justified in using instrumental music, not because they do not study the Bible but because they do. The point is that they highly regard the authority of God but they just do not acknowledge the authority of Texas editors. And they can tell the difference! They insist on reading the scriptures for themselves. They acknowledge the Lordship of Jesus but not that of men.

Editor Number One does not regard Number Two as the supreme court and both reject Number Three from the same position. How shall we extricate ourselves from our predicament? We can do it by refusing to play God with the consciences of other men. Not one of our petty divisive issues has one thing to do with fellowship in Christ. We are in that fellowship because we are called into it by God. We are children of God by the Spirit, and not citizens of a pro or con party on any of these matters.

Our brethren do not need to accept instrumental music, the pre-millennial interpretation, cups, classes or colleges. All they need to do is to accept brethren. But I am asked, "Shall we accept brethren in error?" Certainly so. There are no other kinds of brethren. No one knows it all. No one is infallible. If brethren accept you they will have to do it in spite of your error. You do not accept the error because you accept the brother, any more than you have to become cross-eyed because a brother in your physical family has such a defect.

And all of this talk about "full fellowship" is sheer poppycock. It is wholly without scriptural warrant and has been conjured up by little minds and dwarfed hearts. God has no stepchildren so we can have no half-brothers. If we are in his family we are in it wholly or not at all. The idea that you can be in partial fellowship is like loving the right side of your wife and hating the left side. You cannot parcel God out and you cannot carve up his spiritual offspring either.

I have some brothers who use instrumental music and some who deplore its use. I have some brethren who think Jesus will precede the millennium and others who think the millennium will precede Jesus. I have some brethren who support the Herald of Truth and never look at it, and others who never support it and always look at it. I have some brothers who attend where there are Sunday Schools and others who could not be dragged to such a place. I have brethren who pass a container of wine to every person, and others who pass every person a container of wine.

They are all my brothers, not because we share the same opinion but because we share the same Father. I was not begotten by a class nor born of a glass, and no position on either will ever affect my relationship in the wonderful family of God.

Nothing will ever blot out for me the cross which makes us one, not even if it is as big as a pipe organ or as little as a “communion cup.” I have a deep sense of compassion for those who are trapped in ridiculous factional positions. I know exactly how they feel. I know their inconsistencies, their vain professions and their empty protestations. And I pray for all of them to be delivered from the dead albatross draped about their partisan necks.

We can never offer anything tangible to a world hungry for peace and serenity so long as we think that because men differ with us over music or the millennium, cups or classes, that they are disowned by the Father. Our fathers were wrong when they made the deductions of men on music a test of fellowship. I do not care how honest and earnest they were— they were wrong!

And I was wrong when I followed their factional spirit and made tests of union and communion out of opinions about music, homes, colleges, and all of the rest of that motley horde of things which we turned into devil’s wedges to splinter and divide the royal family into which we were adopted through grace. No man is wrong when he speaks out against that which he cannot condone in the family, but that man sins who destroys the family ties over matters of difference.

I refuse to continue in the wrongs of yesteryear and perpetuate the consummate folly of factionalism. I refuse to project the arrogant and silly position that we have a corner on “respect for the authority of the scriptures.” I regard all of “our” editors in California and Florida as my brothers. I love all those who squat on our totem pole, even those who detest one another as brothers in error. But I go farther than that— much farther. I receive and accept as my brothers and sisters all those upon this whole wide earth whom God regards as his children. It is not their attitude toward a restoration totem pole that makes the difference, but their attitude toward the blessed cross of Calvary. We carved out the totem pole but God drove the cross into the earth. I have brethren on earth who never heard of Alexander Campbell or Barton Warren Stone. So long as they come to Christ they need not come by any group of men. We are saved by the grace of God and not by the favor of the "Church of Christ."

Let us have done with the silly bickering which has negated our influence and made us the laughingstock of serious people in our generation. Let's remove the stigma of schism which manifests itself in six or seven divisions in some cities, with brethren hurling thunderbolts of wrath and indignation at one another over the air waves. Shall we perpetuate our shame and glory in it? I thank God that our younger men and women are seeing a vision that their fathers have not caught. It is with these that the hope of our future lies. They are sick of the rehashing of the outworn arguments and the dishing out of slanted interpretations which are dishonest and irrelevant.

I pray that our brethren will sing out for freedom and speak up for liberty in Christ Jesus. We can no longer be held down and held back by skeletal hands reaching out of partisan sepulchers. Do we esteem the praise of men in our own little segments as of more value than the praise of God? The fact is that the kingdom of heaven is greater than any of our factions or all of them put together. Let us find the way to unity of the Spirit by rising above the smoking ashes of our hopes, slain and burned by our unwritten creeds.

It is time for a new day to dawn. We have led in dividing, now let us lead in uniting. We have walked the dreary path of strife and left it strewn with the bloody corpses of our slain hopes, now let us resurrect the ideals which gave us birth and unfurl the flag of peace as the rallying standard for the Christians in all the sects. Now is the accepted time. Today is the day of our salvation! It is for such a time as this that we have come to the Kingdom. Let us not fail!

Authority of the Word

Mission Messenger (September 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

This is the text of an address delivered at the Fourth Annual Unity Forum, conducted at the West Islip Church of Christ, Long Island, New York, July 3-5. Previous forums were held at Bethany College, Milligan College, and Southeastern Christian College.

In presenting this little dissertation on the authority of the word of God, to those of my brethren who are gathered for this occasion, I feel like a doctor called upon to read a paper on the symptoms and proper treatment of stomach ulcer, in the measles ward of a children's hospital. There is nothing at all wrong with developing the theme, but it is not directly related to the ills which we suffer and provides no remedy for our current condition.

I say this in spite of the fact that all of our vocal diagnosticians are loud in their insistence that it is an "attitude toward authority of the Bible" which is at the bottom of all of our troubles, and makes us the most divided, strife-torn and fragmented religious movement on the contemporary American scene.

Those of our brethren who think that the fruit of the vine which Jesus blessed was fermented, and to employ unfermented liquid in the Lord's Supper is to trample underfoot "the divine pattern” and count the blood of the covenant wherewith we were sanctified an unholy thing, say it is a question of attitude toward the authority of the scriptures which divides us.

Those who think that we must distribute the drink element in one container and that individual cups are an innovation introduced among us by the machination of Satan to deceive the very elect, say it is a question of attitude toward the authority of the scriptures which divides us.

Those who think that the precepts of heaven must be taught in one undivided assembly, and that division into classes upon the basis of age, aptitude or ability constitutes a grave infraction against heaven and a sin against the eternal purpose of God, say it is a question of attitude toward the scriptures which divides us.

Those who think that the current method of financing our best known propaganda tool, Herald of Truth, by mailing money to a congregation in Texas, is part of a deep conspiracy to rob other congregations of their autonomy, say it is a question of attitude toward the authority of the scriptures which divides us.

Those who think that funds collected and deposited in the corporate treasury of the congregation can only be expended in behalf of those whose names are duly enrolled on one of our rosters, and who regard any use of such money to alleviate the misery and squalor of the world about us as “the social gospel,” say it is a question of attitude toward the authority of the scriptures which divides us.

Those who think that the corporate praise of a community of saints must be rendered only by the vocal cords in congregational participation, and that any accompaniment on any type of mechanical instrument is a defiance of the dogmas and decrees of heaven, say it is a question of attitude toward the authority of the scriptures which divides us.

What is the result of this simplistic rationalization and silly repetition with parrot-like monotony of the statement that, “It is a question of attitude toward the authority of the scriptures which divides us?” The answer is all too obvious. We have splintered the majestic household of God into conflicting tribes, constantly on the warpath against their own brethren, hailing with almost unbridled glee every bloody scalp dangling from the poles which support the scattered factional tepees.

Every child of God among us, without a single exception, is regarded as a sectarian by some and an extremist by others. We are all “liberals” and all “antis” at the same time, not because of where we stand, but because of where others stand as they view us. Every brother and sister in this gathering is both a sectarian and a hobbyist. A sectarian is one who has something we oppose; a hobbyist is one who opposes something that we have. All of you have something that others oppose; all of you oppose some things that some others have.

We have tied the restoration movement into a huge Gordian knot, with divisions over missionary societies, instrumental music, centralized control, colleges, orphan homes, national radio and television programs, leavened bread, unleavened bread, the manner of breaking the bread, fermented wine, individual cups, Bible classes, uninspired literature, evangelists, hired ministers, the pastor system, the marriage of divorced persons, speaking in tongues, divine healing, foot-washing, the hour of meeting to eat the Lord’s Supper, and a host of other things too numerous to mention, as they say on auction sale bills.

How shall we extricate ourselves from this labyrinth which we have created? Must we thresh out every angle of every wrangle before we can realistically recognize each other as brethren? Must we argue to a standstill every action of every faction before we can have the satisfaction of a combined effort in any department of service to a world writhing in crisis? Must we debate until we wear one another to a frazzle, and then wear the frazzle off, before we can join hands in any kind of project?

I reject this immature approach created by a childish attitude toward the problem of schism. After hundreds of others in ancient Phrygia had worked their fingers to the bone trying to untie the original Gordian knot, Alexander the Great came, and with one keen stroke of his sword cut through every snarl and tangle in the rope. And that is the only sane and sensible way for us to approach the mammoth and monumental muddle we have made of this movement which began as “a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects.”

I deny emphatically that we are divided because of a disregard for the Lordship of Jesus or because of wilful disrespect for the authority of the sacred scriptures. I do not deny that there are those in the religious world who deny the right of the scriptures to govern life and conduct, nor do I deny that there have arisen within the ranks of the restoration movement men who have rejected the scriptures as the revelation of God’s will. But I do deny that this is the basis of our fragmentation and factionalism.

Those who use unfermented grape juice in the Lord’s Supper, accept Jesus as Lord, which is the reason they partake of the Supper. Those who use individual cups love Jesus every bit as dearly as those who pass one container to an assembly. Those who employ Bible classes are not seeking by this method of investigating the word of life to crucify the author of those words and put him to an open shame. Those who take part of that which they have jointly contributed as a body and use it to feed starving children in the ghetto, or to reach alcoholics in a coffee-house ministry, are not denying the claim of the Son of God over their lives.

The brethren in Texas who arrange the details relating to Herald of Truth and receive contributions to make it possible, are not engaged in one vast conspiracy to wrest the kingdom from the hands of Jesus and manipulate it for their own prestige. Our brethren who use instrumental accompaniment in conjunction with voicing their praise to our common Father are not apostates from the truth, or irresponsible rebels who deny the right of Jesus to reign over them!

It is absurd and asinine for our aspiring and perspiring theologians to perpetuate the farce that men who have been born of water and of the Spirit, who read the same scriptures, sing from the same hymnbooks, partake of the supper of the Lord on the same day of every week, and seek earnestly to imitate the life of Jesus in their daily walk, reject the authority of Jesus and the Bible. What is the problem, then, if we read the word of God with equal reverence? Why are we divided?

Of course the answer is not always simple and it is made more complex because we allow our traditions and emotions to get entangled in it. But there is one thing basic to it. We are not divided over the authority of the scriptures at all, else we would not appeal to them, even in debate. We are divided over our deductions from the scriptures, and this is a wholly different thing. Revelation is what God has said; interpretation is what men think he meant by what he said. Revelation is perfect. It is the unfolding of a divine and infallible mind. Interpretation is imperfect, because it is the application of a human and fallible mind to what God has revealed.

We do not approach the sacred scriptures, or anything else, with a mental vacuum, or an intellectual void. We must go in the only way we can, caught up in the human predicament, the heirs of our own environment, the victims of our own limitations and shortcomings, and of the indoctrination of others. Our teachers were imperfect in knowledge, and their students are no different.

We examine the word of God upon the basis of our presuppositions. These have been formed by a compilation of isolated and remote scriptures. They grow out of an examination of God's action in specific cases, from which we construct our generalizations. These make up our philosophy of interpretation of the word of God which we regard as authoritative. But the problem comes when we confuse our philosophy of interpretation with the basis of authority, and seek to bind it upon others as the divine will.

Let us take the question of instrumental music as an example. Our brethren who defend their right to use it do not flaunt the authority of Jesus. They are trying to serve him as diligently as those who do not use it. Both sides appeal to the same Bible, and even quote the same passages. It is silly to assume they have no respect for the authority of that which they quote as authority. What is the difficulty? It lies in the divergent philosophies with which they approach the question.

One postulates that whatever is not specifically authorized in the scriptures as an expression of worship is forbidden, and its introduction or employment constitutes a sin against the authority of Jesus. But where does the Bible say this? Nowhere!

The other postulates that whatever is not specifically forbidden in the scriptures as an expression of worship may be allowable and permissible, provided that it does not violate some other clearly stated principle of divine revelation. Where does the Bible say this? Nowhere!

Both of these rules of interpretation attempt to measure what God has said by something he did not say. Each is a pair of spectacles donned by men to aid them in reading the word of God. Each contains lens ground according to criteria which have been deemed to be correct. But spectacles are put on before men start reading. In both cases men have searched the scriptures in an endeavor to understand the basis of authority and they have selected and tied together various scriptures which seem to substantiate and lend credence to the position they have adopted. But they are still spectacles and not the word of God. That they may help us even as do spectacles, goes without saying, but we need to be careful lest we fall into the error of thinking we can best exemplify the spirit of God's Word by arguing about the respective merit of our spectacles.

Both rules are conclusions resulting from deductions and these deductions are themselves attempts to interpret the scriptures in order to determine a proper basis for interpreting the scriptures. Thus they actually stem from an attempt to peer behind the scriptures—to look through them by looking into them—and understand the intent and motivation of God, although using as tools in the process his various acts and words. We have fostered schism by imposing our deductions upon our brethren, and by laying down the law instead of living up to love.

Our problem is not that we do not speak where the Bible speaks, or remain silent where the Bible is silent, but that we approach the speaking and the silence from different positions, neither of which is dictated by the Bible. But why do we need a philosophy of interpretation at all. Why not just go straight to the Bible without interpretation? The answer is the same as if someone asks, "Why not go straight to the moon without fooling around with space capsules and vehicles? If it is there, just land on it and forget all about the expensive in-between stuff." The reply is that we cannot do this because we are human beings. An angel might make the trip without the tedious process, but we cannot. And neither can we obtain God's meaning without thought vehicles as do rational creatures. Our brethren have been "just obeying the Bible without interpreting it" for years and we have more than two dozen faithful churches now which have nothing to do with one another!

Does this mean that it was a sin to divide God's family over instrumental music? It means exactly that! Our fathers were wrong in fracturing the saints into rival parties, pro or con, over such a matter. Regardless of “who split the log” in the factional terminology of yester-year, I unqualifiedly affirm that he who makes a test of fellowship, or a term of union and communion, out of an opinion such as this, is guilty of formulating another creed. Whatever a man must believe in order to be in my fellowship is my creed and it takes precedence over the cross of Christ.

I refuse to be guilty any longer in heaven’s sight of perpetuating a narrow, bigoted and arrogant attitude, which can only continue to splinter us until we divide ourselves out of existence as we have already divided ourselves out of effective influence in many areas of the world. Our brethren do not deny the authority of God’s word. They simply resent our self-appointment as a supreme court to interpret it for them. They insist upon reading it for themselves without benefit of clergy—even “our clergy.” They can distinguish between the revelation sent down from heaven and the explanations handed down from Texas. They are willing to be governed by theocracy but not by partisan editorocracy. We need to quit playing God with one another and start praying to God for one another.

The monotonous repetition by all of the sectarian champions in the restoration movement, of the statement, “It is a question of attitude toward the authority of the scriptures,” has served no real purpose. It has been turned into a schismatic slogan and a conflicting cliché. It has become a rug of many colors, woven by factional looms, and used as a cover under which to sweep every responsible attempt to bring order out of our chaotic condition. It has served to erect walls and barriers behind which men may hide to snipe at their brethren who ride by in different party vehicles.

Why is it that those who chant loudest and longest about the authority of the scriptures, ignore what those scriptures plainly teach about the sin of “setting at nought a brother”?

Why do they misrepresent those scriptures by quoting what God said about our relationship to unbelievers and applying it to our relationship to other believers? In view of the fact that the scriptures unvaryingly condemn all division in the family of God as sinful, how does it happen that we could not be more divided if the scriptures commanded it?

I know not what course others may take, but my own course is clear. I shall receive all whom God has received, and upon the same basis that he received me. Wherever my Father has a child, there I have a brother, and if I can get to where he is, I will demonstrate my love for him. I shall ignore the artificial walls which men have erected to separate and segregate themselves from others. Love makes walls transparent which once were opaque, and because of it one can see brethren on both sides.

To me, the majestic kingdom of heaven is manifestly greater than any of our groups, and greater than all of them put together. It transcends any movement sparked by men, even the restoration movement. God has children on this earth who never heard of Alexander Campbell or Barton Warren Stone. The sheep of God are still a scattered flock. No partisan corral holds them all. It little matters whether they ever hear me speak or not, it is the voice of the Shepherd which calls them out!

I am united with all of my brethren in that unity of the Spirit which, in its human aspect, must always be unity in diversity. Some of my beloved brethren use one container, and others individual cups; some have many classes for study, and others have none; some contribute to orphan homes from their treasury and others do not; some support Herald of Truth and never see it, some refuse to support it and never miss seeing it; some use instrumental music and do not advertise it, some do not use it and advertise their place of meeting with signs proclaiming "Vocal Music."

I have brethren who claim to speak in tongues, and others who have difficulty with English; I have brethren who believe in divine healing and go to the doctor; and others who believe in doctors to whom their wives cannot get them to go. No two of God's children are alike, any more than my own were alike, but I love them all in their unlikeness as I loved my own in theirs. If there are those who hate me I love them also. If they are good enough for the Father to receive, they are not too bad for me to accept. I shall allow them to stand or fall to their own master, and shall not try to dominate their thinking or lives. His love is an umbrella for all of us, and my love, although too meager, is at last great enough to embrace all who are with me under that umbrella. I have found that the umbrella which God created is a lot larger than the one I once helped to manufacture, and I feel a lot happier now that I can sit on the love seat and allow God to sit on the judgment seat.

I believe that God exists. I believe that he has communicated to man what is essential for man's wellbeing. The idea of a non-communicative God is incongruous. I also believe that the divine communication is contained in the sacred scriptures. It is a wee bit ridiculous to think of a person who would accept this as factual and then deny the authority of the scriptures. And I have found few of our brethren indeed who do not recognize the authority of the Bible over their lives.

We are not divided over the place of God's word in the divine order. All of us freely confess its importance, and regard it as containing our rule of faith and practice. We are divided because we ceased to love our brethren as much as we loved our ideas and interpretations. By making it appear that they did not respect God's authority when they disagreed with us we were able to rationalize our divisive spirit and justify our exclusivistic attitude.

When we start loving men because they are in Christ and not because they are in conformity with us, we will transcend our differences and be able once more to walk in peace. We will never see every point alike. There will always be differences, but they will be occasions for discussion and not excuses for division. This raises several questions and I would be derelict in my duty if I did not pay some attention to them.

1. Will this not place us in fellowship with brethren in error? That is the only kind of brethren with which any of us will be in the fellowship, for there are no other kinds of brethren. None of us know it all. We are all in error on some things, and if anyone denies this he is in greater error than anyone else. But one need not embrace the error of another in the family of God any more than he needs to become cross-eyed because a brother in his physical family suffers from this affliction. We are in the fellowship through an act of God by the Spirit and we can no more choose our brothers in the Lord than we can choose our brothers in the flesh.

2. Is not one condemned who brings another gospel, or perverts the gospel of Christ? Certainly so, but our divisions are not over perversions of the gospel. Our brethren have all obeyed the gospel. That is what makes them brethren. The gospel is the good news of justification by faith in Christ Jesus. It consists of historical facts, seven of them in all— the life of Jesus, the death of Jesus, the burial of Jesus, the resurrection of Jesus, the ascension of Jesus, the coronation of Jesus, and the glorification of Jesus.

All of our brethren accept these facts and the implication of them for their lives. When the apostle wrote about the perversion of the gospel he had in mind the tacking on to these facts of circumcision as an additional term of admission to the grace of God. One might practice circumcision, or he might deplore it, and still be in Christ. "In Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but faith which works by love." But anyone who made either circumcision or uncircumcision a test of acceptability into the fellowship perverted the gospel of Christ.

It is those of our brethren who are so trigger-happy in gunning down everyone who does not conform to their legal demands who are really in danger of perverting the gospel. If I tack on to faith in the Lord Jesus which works by love, any additional criterion of loyalty such as a special position on music, missions or the millenium, or on cups, classes or colleges, then I preach another gospel, another means of access to God, for I confuse his grace with the favor of the faction.

Our problems are generally not related to the gospel at all, but to matters of doctrine. The gospel is the seed by which we are begotten. The doctrine is the bread of heaven upon which we feed after we are born. Some of our doctors and dietitians cannot distinguish between conception and digestion, and they think that every time some one makes a mistake in judgment they should collect his birth certificate. Since theirs is the worst error of all they should turn in both their birth certificate and their spiritual driver's license.

If God's children are not free to make mistakes they are not free at all, and anyone who denies this has already made a big mistake. But mistakes in judgment or understanding do not cancel the family relationship. When we were little, and misunderstood the directions of our parents, they did not return us for a refund, or put us out in the woodshed until we learned better. In spite of the fact that we exasperated them and got on their nerves, they kept us around in the hope that our association with such nice folks as themselves would eventually straighten us out. That is what love does!

I think that we are very unfair. We are even a little dishonest. We tell people that our only creed is Christ until we get them in, and then we lower the boom on them and drag out of our toy box all of the other things which they must believe in order to play ball with us. We've got more fine print in some of our unwritten creeds than a Philadelphia lawyer could discover in a crooked insurance policy. This enables us to bring people in at the front door on one basis, and throw them out of the back door on a score of different reasons.

If we want to deal justly, we should type up a list of a hundred or so items of controversy among us, and when someone comes forward to confess his faith in Jesus, we should hand him the list and ask him to check off the ones with which he concurs. If he gets the wrong ones, or misses some of the right ones, we should flunk him and refuse to baptize him until he can graduate in our catechism program. It is not right to baptize a person and label him as a sectarian or an “anti” before he can get his clothes changed and get out of our dressing-rooms.

3. But can two walk together unless they be agreed? Of course they can. You walk with your wife, do you not? If a man comes to me and tells me that he and his wife have lived together for thirty years and never had a disagreement, I know that he will lie about other things, too, if he gets a chance. Perhaps there has been no other passage twisted, contorted and wrested more than Amos 3:3. The translators appointed by King James could hardly have realized what a club they were furnishing to men of a divisive spirit, with the rendering, “Can two walk together except they be agreed?”

This in no sense conveys the idea of the original. In my book “The Twisted Scriptures” I analyze the entire context of the woefully misunderstood question as well as the purpose of the prophet. The word “agreed” is from a Hebrew original which means to arrange beforehand, to make an appointment, to agree to carry out a joint enterprise. Amos is showing that he is in Samaria because he had an appointment with God. The time had come to blow a trumpet of warning, and it was agreed that Amos was the one to blow it. He asks the question, which is the first of a related series, “Can two walk together unless they have made an appointment?”

Amos was not providing a text for advocates of unity based upon conformity. He was talking about two agreeing to walk together, and not about two walking together because they were agreed. Two people might make an appointment to walk together to discuss their differences. But the use of this passage, jerked rudely from its context, points up one of the more serious aspects of the factional spirit. It destroys integrity and causes men to resort to unscrupulous means to bend the sacred scriptures to justify the very division among his children which God condemns.

There is not a faction in the restoration heritage whose members all agree. Those who are vocal in their demand for separation from others on the basis of usage of individual cups, Bible classes, or instrumental music, disagree with one another on a score of things. They walk together in partisan acceptance although they may disagree on the qualifications of elders, birth control and contraception, going to war, divorce and remarriage, the work of evangelists, the nature and function of the Holy Spirit, and a host of other things. The only thing on which there must be agreement is the arbitrarily selected and elevated item which gives existence and status to the sect. If honest divergency were allowed here the factional balloon would burst and fall to the earth in that inglorious disgrace which it deserves.

There is no unity except unity in diversity and all of our factions exhibit undeniable proof of it. They all practice it and they all deny it! This is the only place where they openly achieve uniformity. But God will judge men who elevate other things above the cross and demand that their brethren bow and kowtow to such a partisan standard, and he will judge those of us who perpetuate such a sectarian division in our more enlightened day. It is because of this that I renounce the whole mixed-up mess and messed-up mix of our silly divided state.

If the ideal of the restoration movement was to go back beyond all of the sectarian fractures which resulted from exaltation of human opinions and interpretations, and recapture the simplicity and oneness which characterized the primitive family of God, I propose to go back beyond all of our own sects and schisms, factions and fractions, parties and politics, and take my stand for the original foundation of the restoration movement. I am tired of the sham and hypocrisy that causes us to build our own little worlds in which to mill around because we are frightened to go into the big world which he made.

If the restoration principle was valid for a divided Christendom, it is valid for a fractured restoration movement. I do not have time to wait for my brethren to quit floundering around in the swamps of strife, and start for the shore. I am standing on that shore now and I intend never again to be dragged back into the muddy quagmire of partisan debate. I shall help all of my brethren, not just some of them. I love them all, and whether they agree with me or not has nothing to do with it. We are blood brothers, brothers by the blood of the Lamb, and nothing will ever again negate the power of the blood in my life.

Freedom and Ethics

Mission Messenger (September 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

In the preceding issue of this journal I wrote the first of a series of articles on what has been dubbed “the new morality.” Perhaps you wonder why we are taking the time and space for such a discussion. You will recall that a certain mountain climber upon being asked why he purposed to assault a specific peak, replied simply, “Because it is there.” It could be that will explain my moving into this realm of involvement, although I should like to believe it is a little more profound than that.

It is true that “the new morality” is here, and I predict that it will be around for a long time. It will not go away by ignoring it, or by misrepresenting it! But we do not have to challenge everything to a duel just because it is here. I am doing so because I feel that as a commando for Christ I must face up to the problems of our day, and do so without quibble or fear.

I think, perhaps, I am not too thrilled by the fact that some attacks on situation ethics have not been ethical, although I should not be surprised at it, realizing as I do that all of us are caught up in the human predicament. Our brethren have been putting forward a very talented and perceptive champion who has publicly discussed “the new morality” with such worthy foes as Anson Mount, religious editor of Playboy magazine, Bishop Pike, a sort of playboy without a magazine, and Joseph Fletcher, who is neither a playboy nor a magazine editor. If I am any judge, I think our brother has done a remarkably good job.

What disturbs me about the affair is that I keep running into folks who think that we ought to push these discussions with limelight figures because this is our chance to put the Church of Christ on the map and in the news, and get some free publicity. One cheerful soul said, “It doesn’t make too much difference who wins the skirmish. The important thing is for the world to know that the Church of Christ can turn out someone who can appear on the same platform with the big guns in theology.” With “old ethics” like that it is obvious that a “new morality” could be somewhat of an improvement. One is reminded of the policeman who forgot to slip on his trousers in his haste to get out and arrest a man for indecent exposure.

Probably one of the easiest and safest ways to deal with “situation ethics” is to deal with something else. There is a lot of straw floating around in the intellectual realm right now and it would be easy to gather up enough of it to stuff into some wornout mental overalls, and make a rather gigantic scarecrow which one could cuff and clout around with a great deal of gusto and absolute safety to purse and person. But straw-men are generally fought by straw-Christians, neither of them being genuine.

So I shall try to deal with the real proponents of the disturbing philosophy, and not simply because it is disturbing. We need to be disturbed, one meaning of which is to have the mind agitated. It will do us good to have the mental waters troubled so we do not stagnate and develop a thick green scum over the surface of our consciousness. We need to re-assess and re-evaluate some of our positions but we also need to scrutinize with care what is being offered in their stead.

I have known men to swap cars and before they had gone a hundred miles they were wishing they had the old one back. I am on a journey to a destination and I want to be sure that what I “buy” will take me there before I allow a glib salesman to push the pen on me to sign the contract. I insist on reading the fine print. And I am convinced that there are some real flaws in the new morality structure.

With these few lines let us get on with the task of reviewing ethics as propounded by John A. T. Robinson, of “Honest to God” fame. We must not overlook the fact that Dr. Robinson does not title his book “Morals Today,” but “Christian Morals Today.” That makes it of special concern to me, for what is advocated by the Bishop of Woolwich claims to be an explanation and development of the Christian ethic. The book consists of three lectures given at Liverpool Cathedral, the first of which was titled “Fixity and Freedom.” Although careless critics may associate freedom with license, the author insists that his employment of the term “the new morality” was “certainly no invitation to license.” Still we must not forget that the opposite of fixity may not be freedom. It could just as well be “looseness.” And if the bishop prefers to use the word freedom, we have a right to enquire “Freedom from what and for what?” Freedom in a vacuum would be useless.

It is charged that opponents have made the term “the new morality” a slogan— relieving those who use it of any need to distinguish between widely different views, or even to know what they are. This complaint is probably justified. I know what happens when people are sold on slogans, having grown up in a movement where slogans were often used as a substitute for genuine faith. So I shall not be jolted or jounced about by terminology, nor allow the expression “the new morality” to turn me off or tune me out. After all, I am not interested in whether what I am investigating is something novel, but if it is Christian.

But if the good bishop is bothered because critics tend to misrepresent his views, I find myself a little critical of the impression he seeks to create about those who have found comfort in what he calls “the old morality.” It is implied that up until now Christians have accepted a written code consisting of a set of rules which must be applied to every situation which arises, with inflexible rigidity. I question this. I know of a lot of fine Christians who never did endorse that approach, and I know of a lot more who thought they did, but never did practice it. They were better than their creeds. And if morality has to do with thought expressed in action, I can truthfully say that I have never met a Christian who did not believe that circumstances alter cases— that is, in some circumstances and in some cases! And I have met some pretty rugged ones in my time.

The bishop should be willing to eat from his own spoon and if he accuses more humble folk of being unreceptive and aggressive when on the defensive, he should not exaggerate the thing which he is attacking when he comes under question by its proponents. I find myself quite ready to concede that a lot of what he says is valid and I concur with the following, among other views, as he states or implies them.

1. It is impossible for a person or society to continue for any period of time without a recognized and accepted ethic. Either one is doomed to “come unglued” or fragment in the absence of a proper standard or guideline.

2. Jesus did not come to earth to give us a code of ethics, properly classified, catalogued and indexed, pre-scheduled to fit specifically every contingency, and with a ready answer to cover any behavioral emergency or temptation.

3. The ultimate in our relationship to God and men is embraced in love, and every other requirement or injunction is suspended from this supporting and sustaining principle. I grant that it is the one absolute in the divine-human encounter, the golden chain that binds all together.

4. The ideal, or pure center of our relationship, is the realm of greatest certainty, and it is in the outworking or application of the eternal verity that we experience the greatest diversity and ambiguity.

To some philosophic minds it will appear that this last is a complete surrender to the bishop's position. I trust, however, that the philosophers will not deliver me up prematurely and without reading further. The mere admission that I do not know, in some cases, how to apply the dynamic of love, in no sense argues that there is no rule for its application in such cases, or that there is not a right way to do it. I may recognize the claim upon my citizenship of the principle of taxation without knowing exactly how to fill out my income tax form in every detail. One can be quite conversant with the center of the city and become confused in the suburbs, but this does not prove that there are no maps or street guides.

This will suffice at present for the areas of agreement, and I shall get on with the task of the critic. In listing a few of the things to which I do not subscribe I do not overlook the fact that between Dr. Robinson and myself there is "a great gulf fixed" with reference to our attitude toward the scriptures. This same thing can be said about every other prominent advocate of contextual ethics with whose writings I am familiar.

1. I do not accept as a proven fact the documentary hypothesis as applied to the sacred writings of the old covenant. This is the theory that the scriptures as we have them, are not necessarily the works of those to whom they are credited, but are a compilation from various and unknown sources, and that they simply grew out of the experiences of men in their struggle to achieve meaning in life. The idea of most of the modern theologians is that there was no revelation of a moral pattern of behavior from God but that man evolved a system of taboos and talismanic superstitions which took on special significance. I just do not believe that!

2. I do not agree that there is a basic difference in the ethical teaching of Jesus and that of the apostles, especially Paul. Too many people think that the early Christians simply wrote books to attempt to fit the teaching of Jesus into the life situation which arose in their contact with the world. In this view it is held that the epistles do not necessarily represent an exemplification of the divine will, but rather the attempt of men to explain how they felt the moral values of Jesus could be best applied.

I regard the apostolic writings as unique, different from those of others who followed them. The Spirit spoke to and through the apostles as the chosen envoys of Jesus. The apostolic writings have a sense of authority not possessed by other writings. And properly understood there is no difference between what Christ taught and what the apostles wrote. The epistles are simply to tell us how Jesus would have reacted in the situations which gave rise to them.

3. Dr. Robinson holds that there are no changeless principles which we are to apply. It is his contention that God is in history speaking to us through various forms and altering values. I agree that God is our contemporary and that he is a history-making God. But he does not fluctuate with the changing fortunes of history. History does not create God, but the reverse. It is incongruous to think of a God who became morally better or more enlightened as he worked with men. To conceive of such a God is to be guilty of mental idolatry, to make God after the image of man. And each generation will have a better God, but never a real one.

The God of the old covenant is the God of the new, and he has not changed. Man has grown toward maturity, but God cannot become "more perfect." If there are things which seem strange in his dealing with the ancients, they are only so to me, and not to him. And the reason they are strange to me is because I am limited by time and space. I cannot see the end from the beginning. Actually, they are not inconsistent with God at all, for not being divine I am unable to postulate what God-like consistency demands. They are only inconsistent with my ideas of what God should do under certain circumstances, but if I am not careful I will get my ideas confused with God and end up worshipping the ideas.

If I believe that God is, I must accept that he is God. And if he is God I must accept on faith a lot of things that I cannot explain with my finite mind. A God who can be captured and confined by man is not the God of the universe. In the consummation of all things when human ignorance gives way to perfect knowledge I may be able to look back and see the answer to all of my questions and I will no doubt find that the answer lies in my transcendent knowledge of the divine nature which I cannot grasp here.

The good doctor has a catchy phrase he likes to employ, affirming that God is in the rapids as much as in the rocks. By this he means we need not fear the tumbling, frothing waters of change, and that we may cast ourselves freely into the flux of relativity. He declares that Christians are free to swim and not merely to cling. All of this sounds good. It is an interesting metaphor. But Dr. Robinson fails to identify the rocks. A careful reader of his thesis comes to the conclusion that he may think God is only in the rapids and not in the rocks. Thus, he is guilty in reverse of the very same thing of which he accuses some of us.

What is it to which we are free to cling? If the rapids represent the relativity and change, what do the rocks represent? Or, does he have rapids flowing over nothing? Remember that the figure of speech is his and not ours. I agree that there are rapids and that we are forced to swim in them, but I also accept the concept that there is something abiding, unchangeable and eternal. Man is not a fish and he cannot swim all of the time. When he is forced to find the banks between which the stream of relativity flows, and climb out upon the rocks, to what will he then be clinging?

Are there no bounds of relativity? Is there no line drawn beyond which relativity cannot go, no voice to say, "Hitherto, and no farther shall thou come, and here shalt thy proud waves be stayed"? If not, then relativity itself is an absolute, a universal. Is relativity not a measuring rod or criterion? If so, who is to do the measuring and upon what will he stand that is firm and immovable while he gauges the universe or plumbs its depth?

But I must not tarry longer in dealing with "fixity and freedom," or, with what may turn out to be "fixity and looseness." I must get on to the lecture which is the real crux of our problem and which is titled, "Law and Love." And once again I find myself in agreement with a great deal of the content. Obviously, all of my readers should also read the original thesis of Dr. Robinson. We should see for ourselves what is being criticized and not accept a second-hand version. I hold no brief for that kind of arrogance which feels that an elite corps of preachers may safely read a thing and forbid everyone else to do so. My experience is that preachers are about as gullible as any other group.

Dr. Robinson argues that since we are under grace, and not under law, that love not only fulfils the law but also abolishes it as the foundation of our vital relationship with God and man. He contends that the Christian ethic can never be set forth as law plus love, or as law qualified by love. And I concur with this. For several years, and before I read one word from Robinson or Fletcher, this was my contention. I reached the conclusion from my own study of the sacred writings that the law of Christ, or "the perfect law of liberty" was love!

My statements may not have been as trenchant as those of the much more erudite Anglican scholar, but an examination of my writings will show that I have sought to say in substance what he has said so succinctly, that if law usurps the place of love because it is safer, that safety is the safety of death. It is impossible to take the sayings of our Lord, and his exemplification of them in attitude and deed and warp them into a legalistic code to cover every exigency of life. The “Sermon on the Mount” cannot be defined into an inflexible creedal system. It was delivered to offset that very kind of system.

What then, if anything, is the difference between my thinking and that of the situational ethicists of today. To begin with, let me state that I am not a defender of either “the old morality” or “the new morality.” I do not belong to either camp and am not fighting under either banner. I am fully aware that the advocates of the latter are vociferous in denying that there is such a thing as a system of morals which must be studied and applied to every situation. And I concede that it is not their intent to devise a systematic code of regulation.

But their very use of the terms “the old morality” and “the new morality” seems to me, at least, to indicate that they are shot down with their own weapon. For if there is such a thing as the new morality as opposed to the old morality, it appears that, whether the latter is codified or not, it is systemic. And it is made to appear that one must be encamped in one valley or the other. This I deny for the simple reason that there cannot be two valleys without an elevation to separate them, and I may choose to remain on that elevation.

The superiority of such an alternative is at once apparent. It enables one to look at what is going on in both bivouacs without being committed wholly to either. I am confident that the same God who gives us love as the fulfillment of the law is the one who gave the law of which love is the fulfillment. As I examine his law as a basis for justification, impossible though it was for sinful beings to attain, I am made more aware of the provisions of love. Indeed, the giving of the law was not in itself an act of law upon the part of God, but an act of love.

Our problem goes deeper than some situational ethicists may realize. It is not enough to say simply that love is the fulfillment of the law, for we must then face up to the question of the nature of that love which fulfills law. There must be a definition of love for men use the term to apply to a great many attitudes, and it is possible for love to be employed to “cover a multitude of sins,” in a sense which the Biblical writer did not intend by that statement.

No one will deny that love has sometimes been confused with selfishness, and selfishness is a tricky thing. Since it is a negative quality which derives from a deficiency of justice or benevolence, it projects itself in different shapes according to the dispositions of men, but always seeks justification through rationalization. With his propensity for evil and motivated by temptation, it is not difficult for man to be misled into thinking that his concern for self is a concern for others.

There must also be a definition of “situation.” Does it apply simply and exclusively to an immediate personal confrontation without antecedents and consequents? If so, is life composed of wholly unrelated actions, without connection or continuity? If not, then what all is involved in a “situation”? How can one make an immediate and “one-shot” decision which professes to be based on concern while actually showing unconcern for many factors and persons?

Since man is a social being he tends to conform to the standards of the culture in which he resides. Will he not be inclined to go with the tide in his decisions as to behavior in the situations which he confronts, rather than to weigh the effects of his actions dispassionately? If so, will not the general standard retrogress rather than otherwise? Will not the current be turned into a channel of lowering moral values?

We propose to discuss in a future article love as the divine nature and show that love as a fulfillment of law can never be workable on a universal basis but must be implemented by those who have been born again and are a part of the new humanity. These have been made partakers of the divine nature and in them the love of God can be perfected. Meanwhile, those who are not a part of the new humanity must still be regulated by law in their social conduct.

The Spring of Action

Mission Messenger (September 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

“What we are is utterly plain to God, and I hope to your conscience as well . . . At any rate there has been no selfish motive. The very spring of our actions is the love of Christ” (2 Corinthians 5:11, 14).

Not long ago, while walking down the street, I glanced at my watch and saw that it had stopped several hours before. When I took hold of the stem to wind it I noticed that there was no tension. I walked into the office of a nearby jeweler and he immediately confirmed my own diagnosis of the trouble. The mainspring was broken.

Now a watch is like a human being in some respects. Both receive their motive power from within. It is an interesting fact that both have a face and two hands, but these would be immobile without the “works” on the interior. Man is a creature of motivation. He is subject to drives, desires and ambitions. Some of these are worthy, some are not. And because man is also a creature of will he can surrender to these or subjugate them.

The Bible is the history of God’s dealings with man, so it runs the whole gamut of behavioral patterns and the motivations for them.

There was the case of the young woman who was seduced by a man in an upper social bracket while she was visiting some of her girl friends. Two of her brothers conspired together and murdered the young man and a number of others. They were driven by deep anger and wounded pride.

There was the case of a man who wanted to engage in an inter-racial marriage and when thwarted by his prospective father-in-law, turned to the use of fire in an aggravated incidence of vandalism, which was motivated by revenge. His motto evidently was "Burn, baby, burn!"

It was abject fear which caused a ruler to attempt genocide when he became concerned that there would be a slave uprising and a general revolt in time of war.

Even a noble work such as proclaiming the gospel can be prosecuted by those whose motives are debased. Paul wrote from his prison cell, "I know that some are preaching Christ out of jealousy, in order to annoy me. But some are preaching him in good faith . . . The motive of the former is questionable— they preach in a partisan spirit, hoping to make my chains even more galling than they would otherwise be."

It is refreshing to have the apostle declare that his own heart was an open book, plainly readable by God, and that there was no trace of selfishness in it. Every action which he performed grew out of the love of Christ. It is implied that this love and selfishness are antithetical, and this is correct.

The very essence of the Way is that Jesus gave up everything, including the glory which he had with the Father before the world was. He was the great unselfish One. He stripped himself of all privilege by consenting to be a slave by nature and being born as mortal man. So, in this very connection, the apostle says, "Let Christ be your example as to what your attitude should be."

If the love of Christ is the motivating force of life, that life will be different. Gone will be the pride, anger, revenge and fear which often drive men to drastic and unprincipled deeds. If one can cleanse his heart of such unworthy motives and allow the spring of action to be love, his whole existence will be transformed.

John said, “It is true that no human being has ever had a direct vision of God. Yet if we love each other God does actually live within us, and his love grows in us toward perfection. And, as I wrote above, the guarantee of his living in us is the share of his own Spirit which he gives us.”

Law and Morals

Mission Messenger (October 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

Occasionally some person is thrust into the limelight as a controversial figure and his very name becomes a symbol of all that is good or evil in a certain area of thought. When this is the case, men who have never met him or read a single paragraph that he has written, will react with almost violent emotion when his name is mentioned in their presence. Such a person, I think, is Joseph Fletcher who is Robert Treat Paine Professor of Social Ethics at the Episcopal Theological School in Cambridge, Massachusetts.

Dr. Fletcher has been a rather prolific writer in his special field but it was not until he launched his volume Situation Ethics on the stormy sea of modern polemics in 1966 that he became generally known. Many students were excited by its affirmations, and many were offended. Using the ten commandments as an example, Fletcher said of the last six, that situation ethics has good reason to hold it as a duty in some situations to break them, any or all of them. He propounded some questions with which even the most highly incensed find it difficult to wrestle.

The basis of the book is that there are, in the final analysis, only three approaches possible in reaching moral decisions. These are designated as the legalistic, the antinomian, and the situational. The latter affirms that there is only one absolute, love, and that each encounter in life must be approached in the light of love, and not with an apparatus of prefabricated regulations designed in advance to cover every emergency.

It is not necessary to my purpose that I review meticulously the book by Dr. Fletcher. After all, the question with which I am particularly concerned deals with God's will as I conceive it, and I shall write from that standpoint. The current controversy over morals provides an excuse (if I need one) to have my say about the question. It is not really a question of what Fletcher, or my own brethren say, but of what God says, as I understand His will.

The brethren with whom I have been more closely associated have been legalistic in their approach, I think, although they, like all other legalists, have been forced to resort to a great deal of casuistry. Recently they have been driven to deny their legalism, sometimes in a quite legalistic fashion. When William Banowsky met Joseph Fletcher in debate in Indiana he occupied a considerable amount of his time in denying that he was a legalist. The fact that he labored so diligently in trying to prove he was not, created a little suspicion in the minds of some who heard him.

Obviously, the antinomian position, which is lawlessness, can have no place in the Christian life, so we may dismiss it from consideration. But legalism is always a genuine temptation since it frees from the responsibility of making decisions. It is my contention that the covenantal relationship which we now enjoy in and through the Lord Jesus Christ, is not a legal system at all. Prior to the advent of the Son, God placed man under a written code, the purpose of which was to keep him confined until faith came. With the coming of faith, he was released from this bondage, set free from the demands of law.

It is distinctly affirmed that "the Law was given by Moses, but undeserved favor and reality came through Jesus Christ"

(John 1:17). This does not mean that Moses gave one law, and Jesus gave us another. It does not mean that Moses provided the old law, and Jesus furnished a new law, another written code. Law is one thing, grace and reality create a wholly different set of values. That is why we are told that, “Sin shall no longer be your master, because you are no longer under law, but under the grace of God” (Romans 6:14).

ABOLITION OF LAW

Jesus came to fulfill the law, and by doing so, he abolished law as a basis of justification for all time. Many careless students assume that because it was the Mosaic law which he fulfilled, that he simply substituted another of his own. This is not true. He forever set aside a legalistic code as an approach unto God, and provided himself as the means of our justification. “By following legalistic regulations, no person can be acquitted in God’s sight . . . but now, independent of law, the righteousness of God has been made available . . . that righteousness of God which is by faith in Christ Jesus” (Romans 3:20-22).

All law constitutes a stockade, a prison in which men are kept penned up. Because of immaturity and carnality God thus confined men before Jesus came. “Before this faith came, we were close prisoners in the custody of law, pending the revelation of faith. Thus the law was a kind of tutor in charge of us until Christ should come, when we should be justified through faith; and now that faith has come, the tutor’s charge is at an end” (Galatians 3:23-25).

Here is another version of the same passage. “Before the coming of faith we were all imprisoned under the power of the Law, with our only hope of deliverance the faith that was to be shown unto us. Or, to change the metaphor, the Law was like a strict governess in charge of us until we went to the school of Christ and learned to be justified by faith in him. Once we had that faith we were completely free from the governess's authority."

Jesus removed the stockade fence. He did not build another. He battered down the prison walls with the cross. He dismissed the governess. He set us free. "Christ set us free, to be free men. Stand firm, then, and refuse to be tied to the yoke of slavery again . . . When you seek to be justified by way of law, your relation with Christ is completely severed; you have fallen out of the domain of God's grace" (Galatians 5:1-4).

Let us not compromise at this point, for if we do we create a hangman's noose for our own necks. If we convert the Sermon on the Mount, or the apostolic letters to individuals and communities into a written code of which we then become the high sheriffs and enforcers, we doom ourselves. We reverse God's purpose and deny the efficacy of the cross. We build up that which he broke down by his death. "We are not to look upon ourselves as the son of the slave woman but of the free, not sons of slavery under the Law but sons of freedom under grace."

Law, by its very nature, cannot meet our needs. "We are unspiritual, the purchased slaves of sin." We need life and no law can give life. "If a law had been given which had power to bestow life, then indeed righteousness would have come from keeping the law" (Galatians 3:21). Remember that when you attempt to be justified by law, you must either keep every jot and tittle of that law, or you must die. You cannot have your cake and eat it too. You cannot be justified by faith and by law at the same time, for if you are under law faith cannot save you. Only absolute and perfect obedience in every minute detail will do.

This is clearly brought out by the apostle Paul. "All those who follow regulations are under a curse, for it is stated, 'Cursed is everyone who does not adhere to and observe all the precepts set down in the Code of Law'" (Galatians 3:10). "Now law is not at all a matter of having faith: we read, ‘he who does this shall gain life by what he does’” (verse 12).

THE NATURE OF LEGALISM

Let me now define what I mean by legalism. A great many brethren have a mistaken view of it. They think of a legalist as a sort of nit-picking individual constantly insisting upon conformity with every microscopic point of obedience. What they overlook is the fact that if we are under law we had better all be involved in such minutiae, for if we overlook even the shadow of a shade we are in for it. If we are under law as a hope of justification this kind of “legalist” is the highest type of example to follow, although none of us will make it anyhow!

But I mean something else by my use of “legalism.” I refer to the concept that we will be saved by works through strict adherence to a written code. To be quite specific, I mean simply that a legalist is one who holds that God has handed over to us a law, and that our hope of acquittal or justification lies in our perfect understanding of that body of statutes and judgments, and in our undeviating adherence to all of its regulations and specifications. I reject that theory of righteousness by law, for if it were true, Jesus would never have needed to come, but since he did, he died in vain. “Christ is the end of the law for justification,” says the inspired record.

This disturbs some of my good brethren no end. Like all adolescents and immature persons they prefer to be under law. They are afraid of freedom and liberty. So, in spite of the fact that we are specifically told that we are not under law but under grace, they busy themselves in an attempt to systematize grace and turn it into a legal written code. It is astonishing how many people actually think of grace and the collection of new covenant scriptures as being synonymous. If you doubt this watch how such scriptural scrap-doctors twist and manhandle Titus 2:11.

It seems never to occur to such brethren that the earliest saints would have been without “grace” if the grace of God is identical with the apostolic letters. And since these letters were not all compiled into a single collection for many years, the best any of them would have had was a “partial grace.” If grace is a system, and if the writings of John are a part of “grace” every one of the other apostles died without knowing the fulness of grace. This is a wee bit ridiculous when you analyze it, but most prooftexts in sermon outlines should not be examined too closely, if you love the outline.

Of course the brethren who scrutinize the love letters of God to his children rejoice every time they find a passage which makes it appear that we are under law. They jump on such a passage like a duck on a June bug! And they quote them all to me with an air of triumph as if happy to find the apostles and myself mistaken and inconsistent.

For instance, Paul wrote about his adaptability to various classes in an endeavor to win some, and said, “To them that are without law, as without law (being not without law of God, but under the law to Christ).” It is obvious that whatever Paul meant by the law to Christ, he was not talking about a written code, because he said to the very same congregation, “God has qualified us to dispense his new covenant, a covenant expressed not in a written document, but in a spiritual bond; for the written law condemns to death, but the Spirit gives life.”

MOTIVATING PRINCIPLES

What the legalistic seekers overlook is that the word for law is not limited to a single meaning. True, it always refers to a governing or motivating principle, but it may differ in manner a great deal. This was recognized by Paul, who wrote, “Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? of works? Nay, but by the law of faith.” W. E. Vine renders the second question thus: “By what manner of law?” and says it means, “by what sort of principle (has the glorying been excluded)”? The New English Version catches the meaning, “What room is left for human pride? It is excluded. And on what principle? The keeping of the law would not exclude it, but faith does.”

There is a great gulf between a written code trusted in for justification and the motivating principle of the life of Jesus. Paul expresses it clearly in Romans 8:1, “No condemnation now hangs over the head of those who are in Christ Jesus. For the new spiritual principle of life in Christ Jesus lifts me out of the old vicious circle of sin and death.” Another version reads, “The conclusion of the matter is this: there is no condemnation for those who are united with Christ Jesus, because in Christ Jesus the life-giving law of the Spirit has set you free from the law of sin and death.”

The principle of life is the indwelling Spirit who transforms us from within so that “we have the spiritual outlook, and that is life and peace” (Romans 8:6). The Spirit within enables us to put to death all the base pursuits of the body (verse 13), and “joins with our spirit in testifying that we are God’s children” (verse 16). If we are under a written code as a basis of righteousness we cannot be in Christ.

When all else has been taken from the legalist, he resorts to James 1:22, 25, and reads, “But be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only . . . But whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein . . .” He assumes that the word is the new covenant scriptures as we have them, and that this constitutes the “perfect law of liberty” and since the new covenant scriptures have been written, we are under a written code of law. This sounds good in a sermon outline, but unfortunately, it is wrong on all counts.

In the first place the twelve tribes in the Dispersion to whom James wrote had no new covenant scriptures into which to look. They didn't even have the epistle of James prior to this time. They had only the old covenant scriptures, but few indeed would affirm that these constituted a "perfect law of liberty." What was "the word of truth" which they had, and to which reference is made? The answer is quite simple.

In verse 18 it is identified as the message by which we are begotten, and Peter distinctly says, "And this is the word which by the gospel was proclaimed unto you" (1 Peter 1:25). The Authentic Version translates James 1:18, "Of set purpose he begot us by the Message of Truth, so as to be in the nature of first-fruits of its creative activities." The New English Version reads, "Of his set purpose by declaring the truth, he gave us birth to be a kind of firstfruits of his creatures."

In verse 21 it is identified as "the engrafted word, which is able to save your souls." The Greek emphutos means implanted, and this word had already been implanted in their hearts, whereas the new testament scriptures had not yet been written or made accessible. Paul points out that it is the gospel which is able to save (1 Corinthians 15:2), and declares that "it is the power of God unto salvation to all that believe" (Romans 1:16). The apostolic letters are not the gospel, for everyone of them was written to those who had already obeyed the gospel.

It is clear then that when James speaks of the word, he is not talking about the epistle he was then writing, even though it was probably the only apostolic epistle most of his addressees would ever see. He was talking about a Message by which they were begotten of God and thus introduced into the new humanity. It was a Message which demanded personal purification and renunciation of evil and firm reception of the saving pronouncement.

"Away then with all that is sordid, and the malice that hurts to excess, and quietly accept the message planted in your hearts, which can bring you salvation" (New English Version).

“Have done, then, with impurity and every other evil which touches the lives of others, and humbly accept the message that God has sown in your hearts, and which can save your souls” (The New Testament in Modern English).

“So clearing away every foul weed and rank growth in our moral nature, let us gently receive the implanted word that is able to save our lives” (The Authentic Version).

The Good News makes demands upon men. It requires the killing out of foul weeds and rank growth, but it does not permit the heart to lie fallow. It is a dynamic which must be allowed to fill and transform.

THE LAW OF LIBERTY

“Act on the Message and do not merely listen to it, deluding yourselves. Whoever hears the Message and does not act on it is like a man who observes his natural appearance in a mirror. He takes stock of himself, but when he goes away he immediately forgets what he is like. But he who has looked into the untarnished law of liberty, and stayed to gaze, being no forgetful listener but an active doer, will be blessed in what he does.”

One must never forget that although James acknowledged the Messiahship of Jesus, he remained an orthodox Jew, zealous for the law as long as he lived. Hugh J. Schonfield points out that every time James refers to “the law of liberty” he is talking about “the law of the gospel” as enunciated in the Sermon on the Mount, interpreting the Law of Release in Deuteronomy 15:1-15. This would make sense to the recipients of this letter, as does the usage of synagogue, instead of ekklesia, translated “assembly” in James 2:2.

James declares that love is the royal law according to the scripture (2:8). And he affirms that we must speak and act as those who are amenable to the principles of liberty (2:12). Love and liberty make it possible to judge each individual case on its own merits, and to extend mercy in every case where possible. All decisions are to be made in the light of love, therefore, one will be judged on the basis which he sets up by which to judge others. “For he who acts without demonstrating mercy will receive judgment— without mercy being shown to him. Mercy will actually triumph over judgment.” This means that in the day of judgment the man who has been merciful will find that the mercy he has shown will blot out or cover his own shortcomings and sin.

In conclusion I would like to summarize briefly the concepts which I have reached from my study of the word of God.

1. The Christian is not subject to a written code containing a list of regulations imposed upon him from without. Instead, the law of God is internalized, being written in the heart and mind, so that one is self-governed and disciplined by the love of God which is a fruit of the Spirit.

2. The new covenant scriptures were never intended to be compiled into a code of statutes and judgments to be enforced by minions of “the law” but they are a collection of love letters addressed to individuals and communities of the saints to serve as guidelines of behavior for those in the precious Lord Jesus Christ.

3. In interpreting the new covenant scriptures I must recognize that any application must be made under an umbrella of love, and with mercy shown for the unfortunate brother who has succumbed to temptation. I must resist the impulse to show myself as an “enforcer of the law” or God’s policeman.

4. If I postulate that the new covenant scriptures are a legal code I must either live up perfectly to every implication and demand, or die, for the slightest infraction or deviation will spell my doom. Legalism requires absolute obedience based upon complete knowledge. I cannot claim law as a basis of divine favor and grace as a means of justification. I cannot have law for what I am able to do and grace for my failures. It is not law and grace, it is law or grace!

5. The absolute in our relationship to God is love agape! It is the motivation for our moral and spiritual relationship. It is the royal law, and just as all subjects of a king are in subservience to his rule, so all principles and rules of action are subject to the kingly law.

We sacrifice no truth of heaven when we admit that love, rightly understood, properly defined, and correctly applied, is the foundation of Christian ethics. It is a divine universal, deep as the heart of God and wide as the universe which he made. We must not take a legalistic approach under grace, for to be under law is to fall from grace. We dare not be antinomians for then we will become our own God.

Why should we retreat from encounter on the field of love, and seek to discover another area upon which to meet the advocates of “the new morality”? Love is of God. God is love. Let us defend the love of God— its source, its demands, its sacrifices and its rewards.

It will be our own purpose, God willing, to discuss in our next issue love in contrast with legalism. We trust that you will read carefully what we say at that time and we pray that all of us may love one another in deed and in truth, and not just in word or in speech.

Ministry and Ministers

Mission Messenger (October 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

*“A Christian layman is one who discharges his God-given vocation in the secular calling of life. That is his vocation. He is called a ‘priest unto God’ in the life of ‘the world outside.’ A realization and actualization of such a priesthood is one of the greatest needs of our time. If this fact was firmly grasped by the whole People of God, it would undoubtedly lead to a Christian Revolution, a new Reformation that would transform the life of the contemporary church.” —Cyril Eastwood in The Priesthood of All Believers, page 256.*

Not long ago a brother in Christ came to see me while passing through our city. He was greatly disturbed in mind and heart. A few years ago, while a student in a Christian College, he was present at a missionary rally, and was moved to go forward at a special call for “full-time workers” and pledge his life to the mission field. After having graduated and gone up and down the land visiting congregations in an attempt to arrange support, he and his young wife went to a foreign country and began the difficult task of learning the language and of making friends.

After laboring there for almost six years, his ideas began to change. He found himself distressed by the fact that those who supported him back home wanted him to reproduce in another culture the American-type religious community which they had constructed in a wholly different background and environment.

The brethren who visited him from the homeland brought pressures upon him to conform even though they knew nothing about the lives of the natives whom they regarded as mere statistics justifying the expenditure of money required to convert them.

The missionary wrestled with his soul and finally came to the conclusion that he was not a free man in Christ, but the front man of a system, and that the hands which controlled the purse strings would also control his life. It seemed to him to be ever more apparent that to be really free he would need to become a “tent-maker” and support himself and family. Accordingly, he made up his mind to return to school and secure a degree which would enable him to teach, with a view to returning to the mission field as a fellow-laborer, rather than as a professional missionary.

When this intent became known he was deluged with letters protesting against his decision. A member of the faculty in his alma mater wrote him a highly emotional letter, reminding him of the night he walked forward to dedicate his life to taking the message to a foreign field. He tearfully implored him not to “give up the ministry.” Former classmates wrote him begging him to reconsider and not give up the vocation to which he had been called.

It became necessary for him to mimeograph a lengthy letter of explanation. In it he insisted that he was not deserting the Lord or the body of Christ. He expected to be as much of a child of God as he had always been, and to serve the Master “acceptably and with godly fear.” He even pointed out that he thought he might be more effective because there were certain feelings against a missionary whose very presence tended to make native peoples appear inferior. As a teacher in college he would be working directly with younger minds and might influence more thinkers than he could reach by any other means.

This explanation was rejected by some who had been his closest associates. Some intimated that he was motivated by a love of money and others accused him of betraying the church and the school which had trained him. His wife became nervous and upset because all their former friends were regarding them as covenant-breakers and traitors. As I listened to him talk, and sensed the agony of his soul, I came to understand more fully than ever how ignorance and the party spirit have blinded our eyes.

It is altogether possible that you will grow tired of my recurrent emphasis upon the theme of this article, but I am like the man who kept sawing away on his fiddle which had but one string. His exasperated wife exclaimed, "Why don't you get a violin with four strings and run your fingers up and down them like other men do when they play?" He replied, "Those fellows are just hunting for the right place and I have already found it."

Our brethren are sure that they are "a guide to the blind, a light to those who are in darkness, a corrector of the foolish, and a teacher of children," but they have no adequate concept of ministry as set forth by the Holy Spirit. Until they get straightened out on this matter they will confuse sinners and confound the saints. Most of them think of ministry as preaching, but these are not necessarily the same at all. Preaching is but one facet of ministry, and in our culture it may be a very insignificant part. It may be indulged in as a substitute for real ministry and frequently serves as an escape hatch to keep from really ministering. Many of God's best ministers could not say three sentences in public to save their lives if they were threatened with hanging. I have known some excellent ones who couldn't sign their own names or read "Little Miss Muffet."

Every child of God on this earth is a minister, and the same act which makes him a child of God makes him a minister. Ministers of God are made by God and not by men. One does not "go away to become a minister," and if he was not one before he left he will not likely be one when he returns. We are not ministers because we go away to study, although we may well go away to study because we are ministers. Study does not make us ministers although it will certainly improve our ability to minister.

We do not become ministers of God because other men lay hands upon us but because we place our lives in the hands of Christ. Nor can one be made a minister by handing him a diploma or granting him a degree. A diploma signifies that we have listened intently to what men have said and given the answers they wanted to the questions which they asked, but a diploma can no more make you a minister than a birth certificate can make you a baby.

It is downright silly to talk of one “leaving the ministry” so long as he is in Christ Jesus. We enter the ministry by accepting Jesus and we leave it by rejecting him. One no more leaves the ministry when he quits pulpit proclamation and starts teaching history in Junior High School, than he forsakes the family of his physical father when he stops plowing corn and starts painting houses.

There certainly is nothing wrong with one answering a call in college to step forth and declare his desire to serve God in some other nation. Neither is there anything wrong with one keeping his seat when the pressure is on and resolving to continue serving God in this nation. I knew a brother who had a good job and a big salary, and who went out to a little rural congregation in Arkansas, and blistered the brethren because they did not support a missionary with their cotton money. When he finished one of the brethren arose and said that their hearts had been mightily touched by the plea, and he proposed that they send the speaker to Africa. He did not bother that congregation any more. His motto was, “There he is. Lord, send him!”

But suppose a man volunteers to go to South America or to Asia Minor and then becomes convinced that he is not cut out for the work. What should he do? Must he hang on and wear himself out, breaking his health and causing his wife to have a nervous crackup, because of a sense of loyalty to his “commitment”? Of course not! His commitment to go may have been made to his brethren in a time of emotional stress, but his original commitment (and the one that matters) was made to Jesus at the time of his baptism. That commitment was to serve wherever he could best do so. Baptism is not intended to destroy one’s judgment or to warp his mind.

If one becomes involved in an effort for which he is not qualified, or in which he experiences no genuine joy or satisfaction, he ought to get out of it, and get into a work for which he is better adapted. In doing so he is not “abandoning the ministry.” God needs sociology teachers, bakers, policemen, automobile mechanics and laundromat operators. His world would be in a real mess very soon if the only thing anybody could do was to mount a pulpit and hold forth on a sermon outline. The man whose drive is created by his “gift of gab,” would get nowhere if someone did not have the gift to drive a cab.

Our problem stems from the fact that we pay lipservice to the ministry of all the saints but never put it into practice. It is a little bit dishonest to pretend that we do not have a clergy-laity system. There is not one bit of difference in the functioning of the average “minister” in the Church of Christ and that of the Baptist pastor down the street. The clever dodge that “the elders are the pastors” is another illustration of the semantic chicanery in which our brethren often engage. It consists of giving a scriptural designation to an unscriptural practice, or of denying the applicability of a term to an unscriptural practice in the hope that such practice may be hallowed or sanctified, or that an ignorant world may not know the difference.

Once in awhile some artless soul lets the cat out of the sack. I recall a debate in Indianapolis where two gladiators were hacking away at each other nightly before a packed arena over the cataclysmic and world-shaking problem of whether it was right to send money to a town in Texas to help pay the tariff on a television program designed for propaganda purposes. In the daytime sessions opportunity was provided for various ones in the audience to address the brethren. One affluent elder from the Lone Star State began his remarks by saying, "I may be out of place in speaking today, because I am not a minister, and must appear before you merely as a layman."

It was this kind of casuistry which got next to a good brother whom I know. He came out of a Christian College with a noble ambition and high ideals for service to humanity. He tried out for a position in a congregation and "won the toss" because he was hired over more than a half-dozen other disappointed rivals and competitors. For three years he tried to preach peace to a group of people who preferred to "take the low road." The elders were jealous of one another and were touchy and sensitive. They were dominated by a self-appointed "bishop" who used his wealth to throw his weight around and control the situation.

It soon became apparent to the preacher that he was a stooge, and that the members had no intention of changing their unlovely attitudes. They were married to their beautiful building and basked in the prestige which it gave them in the community. They gloried in their real estate instead of in the reality of Christ. Their "services" were rendered to their ego instead of to God. They made no impact on life. They wanted to remain aloof from the world and its problems, and resented reference to the racial question, population explosion, birth control, and the other things which trouble many sober minds in our day. Upon three occasions the preacher was called into session by the elders, and "the leading elder" warned him that the members were complaining that he was bordering on the social gospel in his insistence that Jesus wanted men who would share with others in every aspect of the human predicament.

Finally it became obvious that he could not stay, and he decided that he would not seek for another “pastoral” position. He entered the employ of an insurance company and almost from the very first began to make a success as a salesman. Doors for personal witness to the faith opened on every hand. On weekends he was free to assist small and struggling bands of believers, and he did so, always refusing to take a cent from them for his labors. With more time to spend with his own children his family life improved and tensions fell away.

The strange thing about this case is that some of the very ones who were responsible for his decision to serve God in another capacity criticized him for “leaving the ministry.” Yet he was actually touching more lives in a meaningful fashion than while seeking to placate those who manifested hostility at every attempt to get them to overcome unreasonable prejudice. And he was helping congregations of saints who were really in need. Perhaps Satan has never hoodwinked us more effectively than in causing us to equate “ministry” with regularly trying to pamper groups whose chief concern is to maintain the status quo.

Sometimes men have had to completely re-orient their thought patterns in order to maintain their personal integrity. I think this is what happened to a fine young Christian in one of our northern states. He came out of college with a dream of the kingdom of heaven and with a real prayer life. From the first night of their marriage, he and his lovely young wife had kneeled together and talked to God so unashamedly and free from inhibition, that Jesus had become the most vital and realistic factor in their lives. When they began work with a suburban congregation they did so with a fervent expectation of sharing their dream.

It was not to be so. The congregation was legalistic and anxious to convey an image of success in the community. They talked of “expansion” but limited it only to the thought of a new building with all of the latest gadgetry. Their concern was for indirect lighting rather than for letting their light shine directly in the community. In vain the preacher strove to get them to erect a modest structure and use their means to touch real life needs. But they became more engrossed with planning the parking lot, landscaping the plot and designing the edifice of brick and stone. As the only congregation of the restoration movement in the area they felt called upon to uphold the traditions.

With sad heart the preacher announced that he was resigning while his love for all of them remained unabated. He secured a job which now pays him much more than the congregation gave him. His present position is unique. He is part of a “church in thy house” group. There are some two dozen people, including children, who gather every Lord’s Day in the family room of one of the members. The coffee table is the “Lord’s table.” The order of the meetings is not static. No two meetings are ever alike.

Anyone may start a song, anyone may read a scriptural portion, any one may make a comment. There is always a season of prayer in which the names of the needy are borne up to the throne of mercy. Those who are present kneel for the prayers and petition God with fervency. When a contribution is taken up, mention is made in advance of the purpose for which the collection is made. That very afternoon it is taken and given to the needy.

Most of the time the members eat together, with each family bringing food which is spread out upon the table at noon. In the afternoon they visit hospitals or go to the homes of shut-ins or widows. There are no Sunday evening meetings but most of the family groups have a prayer session in their own homes to close the Lord’s Day. Here is active ministry but the brother is referred to, almost with sadness, as “a former minister.”

Please understand that we are not herein criticizing those saints who have held “try-outs” and hired someone to “minister” to them for so much per week or month. Recently we have seen some elaborate contracts which spell out like legal documents all that is expected of the “minister” even to the point of telling how many meetings he may hold elsewhere, and of what length, and specifying the length of his “vacation from the pulpit” and in what month such vacation must be taken. Our brethren are developing a rare degree of sophistication when they can plan the work of the Spirit in their community that far in advance.

But our point does not deal with the right or wrong of such contractual matters. What we are saying very simply is that one who follows his conscience and chooses to minister for Jesus in another way does not thereby forsake the ministry. Actually, he may minister more effectively, and where human need is the greatest. In many places there are two strikes against one who must identify as a professional minister and people may turn him off automatically. One does not need to give up his service station or store in order to minister, and one does not necessarily cease to minister when he relinquishes the pulpit to work as a plumber, painter or policeman. He that ministers should wait on his ministering regardless of where he may be!

Inside the Circle

Mission Messenger (October 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

“But now through the blood of Christ, you who were once outside the pale are with us inside the circle of God’s love in Christ Jesus” (Ephesians 2:13).

What a thrill should surge through us as we read these comforting words. The writer is actually talking about us, for we are Gentiles. He has just pointed out that those who were not of the seed of Abraham were without Christ, utter strangers to God’s chosen community of Israel, with nothing to look forward to and no God to whom they could turn. No other scripture paints so graphically the lost and undone condition of those who were “strangers to the covenants of promise.”

There is a world of meaning in that little expression “But now!” It is in startling contrast with another expression, “At that time.” What happened between the two periods represented in those words? Something occurred which transformed the divided world with its ethnic prejudices and racial bitterness. The outcasts became part of the in-group. The hated ones suddenly became “accepted in the beloved.” Hostility was slain. Animosity was banished. Read the passage again and savor its majestic truth. “But now through the blood of Christ.”

That is the secret. There’s power in the blood. Nothing else can cleanse the heart of sin and purge the conscience of guilt. It is sin and guilt which make us hate those of another race, to despise those whose only “crime” is that by the accident of birth, by a combination of genes and chromosomes which they did not choose, they are in another strain of the family of man than ourselves.

Guilt makes us uneasy. We are driven to sham and hypocrisy, as if outward pretence of love can atone for the buried cancer of hatred which eats away within. It is only the blood of Christ which can make us real by making us whole. That blood reduces all of us to a common level. In the crimson stream which flowed from Calvary, none of us can stand tall while others grovel. Here we are all proclaimed to be sinners with no advantage accruing from circumstances of birth, race or social standing.

The blood reaches to all, even to those who were “once outside the pale.” That is an interesting expression. It literally means “outside the fence, or across the barrier.” When I was a youngster we called a fence made of upright slats, or pickets, a “paling fence.” We did not know the origin of the term, nor did we realize that in history certain restricted areas had been called The Pale, because foreigners were not admitted.

Jesus removed the fence. He battered down the barrier. Those who were once outside are now “inside the circle.” It was not our goodness which eliminated the fence. We did not suddenly become kind and forgiving. It was the action of God in allowing the Son to die which suddenly showed us that actually all of us were “outside the pale” and therefore, we could all be “inside the circle” which is no longer limited because the circumference is the boundless love of God as manifested in Christ Jesus.

This is the divine answer to racial problems. They can never be settled by legislating new laws for the statute-books, nor by the decisions of courts and juries. True, those who are hostile can be kept apart by a wall of steel, by glistening bayonets and shiny rifle barrels, but these are powerless to stop the green bile of hate emptying into human hearts. The circle of police and militia must always enclose some and leave others out.

But what cold steel cannot do, the warmth of love can accomplish. It can free us from our own prejudice and littleness. No one can be “with us in the circle” who is not first with us within our hearts. When I cease to see red men, black men, yellow men or white men, and see only men for whom Christ died, I am on my way to the removal of the pale from my heart so it will no longer be a part of my world. No external wall was ever built that was not first laid, stone upon stone, in the hearts of men.

If I would follow my precious Lord I must dedicate my life to removing the pale, to bringing men within the circle. Being human, there is the tug of the flesh to erect walls and to build fences. Fear causes us to seek for protection behind our own barriers, and to hold men aloof. But the perfect love which casts out fear causes us to draw men unto Him so that we can say, “you are with us inside the circle.”

We need to have our hearts gently touched and strangely warmed by Jesus until the glow of a transformed life acts as a magnet to draw those inside who are still without the pale. The ministry of reconciliation is the great and abiding need of the alienated and frustrated ones in our day. Once we tune them into Jesus and they become committed unto him unreservedly, their fruitless existence will become meaningful and hopeful. There must be in us a passion for souls which transcends all other interests and which drives us relentlessly into the wilderness of life to rescue the sheep who have gone astray. We should not be able to rest until we have helped these restless ones find peace inside the circle of God’s love. It is for this we have been called in this day!

The Supreme Dynamic

Mission Messenger (November 1969)

[Abstract]

*We must not only approach other people with the love of God in our hearts, but we must know how to express it. I heard recently of a schoolmaster who was teaching his children Religious Knowledge. "What did Jesus come into the world for?" he asked. There was no answer. "What did he come for?" shouted the exasperated man. Still no answer. "Love!" he roared at them, striding around the classroom, hitting each child over the head, "Love! Love! Love!"— Stephen Verney, in Fire in Coventry.*

In this last of the series of articles on morality and ethics, I shall not appear as a defender of either a new morality or an old one. I prefer to be a researchist, answerable to no one but God, and seeking only for truth. I am not obligated to advocate anything simply because it is old, nor reject anything simply because it is new. I am a slave to no system and a lackey to no time. Best of all, I am free to change as I learn and grow as I discover additional truth.

Because I believe that our relationship as Christians stems from our relationship to God, our moral standard must be grounded in the nature of God as it has been revealed to us in both the written and the living Word, that is, propositionally and personally. I am convinced that God sought to keep men united and pure for fifteen-hundred years by law. The law could not accomplish its purpose, not because of inherent flaws but because of the weakness of men.

What God once attempted by law he now proposes to accomplish by a dynamic so far superior to law, that it operates in a field where law is neither needed or found. A great many men, frightened by what is called “the new morality” and feeling called to rush to arms against it, decry its emphasis upon love as an absolute, and actually end up attacking and denouncing love, a thing which no inspired writer ever did.

When someone says, “love is a monolithic and jealous standard, a univalent norm. It shoulders aside all other, lesser goods,” why do we have to fear it? Sometimes we are influenced more by who says a thing than by what he says. Our concern is often for the camp in which he is rather than for the value of what he states. I shall take the position in this article that love is the standard by which all else is measured, and I do so because I believe the word of God teaches just that. If a situation ethicist also affirms it this does not negate it. Rather it just proves that he coincides with the Bible to this extent.

Our whole problem centers around the nature of love, and while the Greeks had several words which we translate by the English word “love,” our concern is with agape. This is the love God had for the world (John 3:16), the love which Jesus manifests for his disciples (John 15:19), and the love we must have for both God and our brothers (1 John 4:21). It is also the love we must have for our enemies (Luke 6:37). In my analysis of love I want to make a few general observations as a foundation for our study.

1. This love is not an emotion or sentiment, but an act of the will. It represents, therefore, not so much an involuntary response to conditions, as a deliberate choice, a calculated set of the mind. This is why it can be commanded. “A new commandment I give unto you . . . that ye love one another” (John 13:31). One cannot command or maintain full control of an emotion. He cannot always direct it.

However, I think there is much more to it than this. I may be wrong, seriously wrong, but I do not believe that one who is not a member of the new humanity, can really demonstrate agape. There is nothing in the purely human nature which can produce or stimulate it. Indeed, that nature is definitely opposed to it. It is an attribute of the divine nature. God is love. Thus it belongs to those who are made partakers of the divine nature (2 Peter 1:4).

It is a fruit of the Holy Spirit (Galatians 5:22), and is distinctly declared to be “poured out in our hearts by the Holy Spirit who is given unto us” (Romans 5:5). From this it is obvious that this love can never be adopted as a universal basis of moral conduct. Men who walk after the flesh must be restrained by laws of society. It is only those who are Christ’s who have “crucified the flesh with its inordinate affections and base desires” (Gal. 5:24). These only can “walk in the Spirit and not fulfill the desires of the flesh” (verse 16).

2. The love of which we speak is always active in the accomplishment of its purpose, which is also the divine purpose. It cannot be passive for by nature it is creative. Man has being because of divine love. The universe was not brought into existence purely as a demonstration of superior power, nor does it exist simply as an exhibit of awesome wonder. The Almighty does not need to show what he can do to satisfy a super-ego. He cannot “point with pride” at some accomplishment. The world is not a transcendent “county fair.”

God is love— love unlimited and unbounded— and love seeks an object upon which it can lavish itself. Life is not so much a gift of love as it is love itself, animating, throbbing and thrilling in a new-found relationship. “For God is love, and his love was disclosed to us in this, that he sent his only Son into the world to bring us life” (1 John 4:9). We need to be careful here, because of the way we think of “sending” and “bringing.” Jesus did not come as a special delivery carrier to ring the doorbell and hand us a neatly-wrapped package of life.

He is the life, and he came to live in us, identifying with us, and merging with us, so that just as he became flesh then, he is now incarnate in us. “God is love; he who dwells in love is dwelling in God, and God in him” (1 John 4:16). Because we are human we find this difficult to accept. We want to explain everything, to capture it in our little mental box and slam the lid shut on it. The greatest temptation on earth is to reduce love to human terms, to talk love instead of living it. So John says, “My children, love must not be a matter of words or talk; it must be genuine and show itself in action” (1 John 3:18). God disclosed his love for us by sharing himself, we can only show our love for others by sharing life. It is easier to share money, time and things. The tragedy of our day is that we so often substitute these for love. Sometimes we commit a greater sin in mistaking them for life.

3. The opposite of this love is not hate, but selfishness. Hate is simply lack of love, as darkness is absence of light. The Latin oppositus is a compound of ob and pono, to place in the way. Darkness does not get in the way of light, and hate does not get in the way of love. Darkness recedes before light and hate is a shadow which flees as love is turned on.

But selfishness opposes love, as the flesh opposes the Spirit. It is antagonistic, adverse and stubborn. This is an important distinction for it is possible to hate a brother without exercising any conscious feeling of animosity toward him at all. Love is concern, and to be unconcerned is not to love, and not to love is to hate. “But if a man has enough to live on, and yet when he sees his brother in need shuts up his heart against him, how can it be said that the divine love dwells in him?” (1 John 3:17).

4. Other forms of love exhibit themselves toward that which is loveable in the object. The value exists before the love is bestowed and it is recognition of the value which calls forth the love. Such love is an automatic response to the beauty or other attribute which attracts it. In the case of agape the reverse is true.

Here the love creates the value in the object. It is not loved because it is loveable, but it becomes loveable and capable of loving because it is loved. "We love because he loved us first" (1 John 4:19). It is not that "we love him because he first loved us," but we love. His love transforms us, dries up the fountain of selfishness within, and makes us capable of loving through the indwelling Spirit. "Christ died for us while we were yet sinners, and that is God's own proof of his love for us" (Romans 5:8). God never got anyone out of what he was in to love him, but he loves men to get them out of whatever they are in.

It is this kind of love which makes it possible for us to love our enemies, a thing which no selfish or egotistic individual can ever do. Jesus is very specific. "Love your enemies and pray for your persecutors; only so can you be children of your heavenly Father" (Matthew 5:45). The converse must also be true, that only children of the Father can exhibit this love. One need not be a child of God to love only those who love him. "Surely the taxgatherers do as much as that" (Matthew 5:46). To match love for love, or to meet love halfway, is not agape, for no one can bargain or barter with it.

In our generation there is a lot of sticky sentimentality and trifling twaddle which parades as love. We use the word to describe our feelings for bicycles and Buicks, sandwiches and scenery, weather and wives. Thus the term has been washed out and squeezed dry of any transcendent quality. We need to study again the nature of a value so great that its essence is of God, a dynamic of such a vast potential that it is greater even than faith and hope, those twins of the forward and backward look. Let us consider the following truths.

Love gives assurance that we have been safely transported across the border into life. “We know that we have crossed the frontier from death to life because we love our brothers. The man without love for his brothers is living in death already” (1 John 3:14).

Love makes possible a divine-human relationship in spite of the limitations of the senses such as sight. “Though God has never been seen by any man, God himself dwells in us if we love one another, his love is brought to perfection within us” (1 John 4:12).

Love completely banishes fear. “Love contains no fear—indeed fully-developed love expels every particle of fear, for fear always contains some of the torture of feeling guilty” (1 John 4:18). This is vital to our thesis because fear is one of the most potent forces in the universe. Thomas Carlyle wrote, “We must get rid of fear; we cannot act at all till then. A man’s acts are slavish, not true but specious; his very thoughts are false, he thinks too as a slave and coward, till he have got fear under his feet.” Gandhi said, “Where there is fear, there is no religion.” That which can eradicate fear and the guilt-complexes which accrue from it is indeed a mighty dynamic.

Love is ultimate and universal, indestructible and enduring. It is destined to conquer all else. “Love knows no limit to its endurance, no end to its trust, no fading of its hope; it can outlast anything. It is, in fact, the one thing that still stands when all else has fallen” (1 Corinthians 13:7). As the New English Version has it, “There is nothing love cannot face; there is no limit to its faith, its hope, and its endurance.”

This is enough to demonstrate that we are not talking about a weak or vacillating influence, but a vital and energizing quality which knows no bounds or restraints. We have already written about the folly of trying to define love, but still we must describe it, so that we may recognize it if we cannot fully explain it.

Joseph Fletcher says that “agape is goodwill at work in partnership with reason.” He also says that “love and justice are the same, for love is justice distributed, nothing else.” Those who have been regular readers of this paper through the years know that I have repeatedly affirmed that love is that “active and beneficent goodwill which stops at nothing to achieve the good of the beloved object.” In reality it is the life of God at work in and through us, to transform the universe, for God is love!

When I thus affirm that love transcends all legalistic codes, and exists in a realm superior to imposed regulations, I am simply saying that life divine, the life of God, is not, and cannot be made, subject to prison walls. It cannot be confined to statutes and codes. These may act as guidelines but not as imposed laws. And that brings us to the place where we are ready to consider love in relation to law under the new covenant.

In the days of Jesus the rabbis had agreed that there were 613 commandments in the Torah. When a scribe sought to tempt Jesus by asking which was the great commandment of the Law, the reply was to love God with the undivided personality. The second was to love man as one loves himself. Jesus did not stop there. He employed a well-known Jewish expression about suspension, saying, “Everything in the Law and the prophets hangs on these two commandments.” What does this mean?

Alfred Edersheim says that all sprang from these two as their root and principle, and stood in living connection with them. No law was to be kept for the law’s sake, or for mere love of law. Such love is impersonal, misdirected and may be cold and calculating. Laws are things. They are to be used. But love is for persons, God and man. Jesus declared that the sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath. Human welfare has priority over laws or statutes.

Paul writes, “He who loves his neighbor has satisfied every claim of the law.” He then cites the law against adultery, murder, stealing and covetousness, and adds, “Any other commandment there may be, are all summed up in the one rule, ‘Love your neighbor as yourself.’” Note the expression, “satisfied every claim of the law.” Law has no more claim upon one who really loves, than a collection agency has upon a man who has received a receipt marked “paid in full.”

Every command that was ever given is summed up in the one rule of love. This offers no licence to ignore, break or violate any commandment. The apostle says, “Love hurts nobody; therefore love is the answer to the Law’s demands.” Love is the answer! Does this not mean that every situation must be approached, not with a lawbook in the hand, but with the love of God in the heart?

“Love cannot wrong a neighbor; therefore the whole law is summed up in love.” It is not that love ought not, might not, or should not wrong a neighbor, but it cannot. Love can do no wrong. That which hurts or wrongs is not love. This is difficult for us to accept because we are always bending and warping concepts to justify and condone our actions regardless of their effect upon others. But if we can once embrace the significance of this our whole attitude toward self and others will be transformed.

In a magnificent treatise on freedom, found in Galatians 5:13-15, Paul writes, “You, my friends, were called to be free men; only do not turn your freedom into licence for your lower nature, but be servants to one another in love. For the whole law can be summed up in a single commandment: ‘Love your neighbor as yourself.’ But if you go on fighting one another, tooth and nail, all you can expect is mutual destruction.” Does this not say that the ultimate purpose of our relationship is service rendered in love?

So long as love is regarded as the divine nature, operating in active concern through us, it is the basis for ethical behavior. It is both the center and circumference of our commitment, linking us to God and men in a redemptive fellowship. It creates of us a community of the reconciled and a reconciling community.

I am not afraid of turning men loose with love as the tie that binds. “If you are guided by the Spirit you will not fulfill the desires of the lower nature” (Gal. 5:16). “If you are led by the Spirit you are not under law” (verse 18). “And those who belong to Christ Jesus have crucified the lower nature with its passions and desires. If the Spirit is the source of our life, let the Spirit also direct our course” (verses 24, 25). As Augustine said, “Love with care, and then do what you will!” I concur with this, for it has a built-in spiritual safeguard. Can you find it?

The Fading Fear

Mission Messenger (November 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

The cold snows of division in the higher peaks are beginning to melt. The spring thaw is starting and the first gentle rivulets are commencing to trickle downward, skirting the boulders and other obstacles and finding their way toward that unity which some day will become a broad and placid river. The heirs of the restoration movement are beginning to think in terms of oneness rather than of divisiveness.

It was almost a century ago that our fathers in a frontier culture, many of them uneducated and illiterate, possessed of quick tempers and touchy pride, began to splinter and fragment a movement which began so auspiciously as “a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects.” The first cleavage was the signal for others to follow, and the sin of schism with its sectarian segregation and isolation became a way of life for thousands.

The first rupture ruined the restoration movement as an effective force for unity. Subsequent fractures intensified the confusion and multiplied the problems. From the first day that I began writing about healing the breaches, I have emphasized that we must go back to the first ghastly laceration and repair it, or it would stand as a monument to our inconsistency and mock us for our hypocrisy. At that time there seemed little hope that any consideration would be given to my plea.

I was hailed as a visionary, attacked as a liberal and branded as a traitor. Since I anticipated all of this I could say that “none of these things move me and neither count I my life dear unto myself.” I have always felt that the brethren whom I love would someday recognize the futility of preaching unity and practicing partition. Now that faith is being realized.

More than two years ago a meeting of top-level men in the Churches of Christ was held in an eastern city with a prominent brother from the Christian Church. It was agreed that these leaders in the non-instrument ranks would tone down the factional approach in their articles and broadcasts, eliminating such material as would intensify tensions between the two groups. No mention of the meeting ever leaked out to orthodox journals but the effect has been seen from coast to coast.

In New York, the Manhattan Church of Christ entered into “the fellowship of giving and receiving” with an important and wealthy Christian Church family. In California, across the nation, the administration of Pepperdine College reached the conclusion that the use of the instrument was no barrier to fellowship in Christ Jesus. Since that time, the president and vice-president have both spoken at the North American Christian Convention, hailing those in attendance as their brethren. One of them made an address on the campus of a Christian Church school, and the other addressed a banquet of friends and alumni of the same institution. Both made it clear that they recognized they were among the children of God.

A front-rank man in the Bible department at Abilene Christian College recently said that if the instrument was being introduced now, the brethren who oppose it would look at it a long time before they would divide over it. This is a clear-cut admission that the division has cultural overtones and it is now time for the Bible department at Abilene to take a second look at its role in condoning and continuing a division which was sinful in the first place.

A ranking professor at another college told one of his good friends, who is also a good friend of mine (but secretly for fear of the Jews), “Carl is right about fellowship and has been all along, and if he had come up in the right group, he would be headlining every lectureship program in the brotherhood.” In the face of such an admission I’m not sure it is much of an honor to speak at a lectureship, and I am very grateful to God that I did not “come up in the right group.”

I hail with genuine pleasure every attempt of brethren to meet and discuss our sinful schism. Such a meeting took place in a southern city several months back, and the proceedings were all conducted in an amiable fashion. One of the ironic twists of fate is that present for the occasion was my esteemed brother, James DeForest Murch, who has lived down his detractors on both sides, and is now able to meet with men who once heaped opprobrium upon him for working on what was known as the Witty-Murch plan for unity.

The brethren who oppose the instrument agreed to work for lessening of the tensions on the mission field where the question is not even an issue. They also disclaimed any intention of becoming involved in public partisan debate over the matter. They conversed and prayed together in a spirit of harmony and fraternity, and parted with a mutual resolution to promote other such meetings on an expanding scale in the future.

This points up one great phenomenon which must not be ignored. Brethren can treat each other with decency, politeness and even affection, on the street, in public eating places, in private homes and in motels. It is only when they get into their church buildings that they clam up and retreat into the deep-freeze posture. There is a psychological reason for this. Our meetinghouses have become symbols of our partisan loyalties, bastions of orthodoxy, and citadels of the status quo. Outside of their walls we approach one another with cool heads and warm hearts, inside of them we resort to cold hearts and hot heads. If all of our temples of party pride were burned down we could get together in a month. This is merely an observation, and not to be taken as a suggestion.

We must face up to the fact that a great many preachers and professors in Christian Colleges now realize that it was wrong and sinful to divide over instrumental music and the millennial question. They are undergoing inner trauma because they would like to speak out plainly and say so. They are caught in a vise which they helped to construct. They have taught the brethren to be bitter and sectarian in attitude, and they are afraid of the legalistic monster which they have created. Their prestige, salaries and jobs depend upon keeping still about their real sentiments. They have a lot to lose.

I can sympathize with them and have compassion upon them. I was as narrow and factional as any of them. I regarded as faithful only those who were attached to our little party. All others were “brothers in error,” to be stigmatized, scandalized and humiliated. I taught the members of our splinter group that they alone were loyal to Christ and that they should dwell in unsullied isolation to save the truth. But when the blessed Spirit of God opened my eyes to the realization that what we called righteousness was simply damnable self-righteousness, I openly and publicly renounced the whole sick and sordid mess.

Church of Christism is no better than any other “ism.” It is parochial, provincial and sectarian. I am ashamed of the bigotry and intolerance which once enveloped my heart and caused me to turn the cold shoulder upon good brethren whose only sin was that they could not in pure conscience see everything as I did and bow the knee to our unwritten creeds. I am astounded that I could have been so brain-washed while proclaiming the grace of God to others. I have no intention to conceal the fact that such a schismatic course was a sin against my Lord and against His body.

My frightened brethren are choosing a different course. They are resolved to play down the troublesome questions of the past and allow them to gradually pale into insignificance and fade into the dusk of coming ages. They realize that these trifling issues will be eclipsed by the greater and more burning problems of a secular age. They will take no chances. They will rock no brotherhood boats. I do not doubt that they will achieve a measure of success. I only pray that their silence is truly golden, and not merely yellow.

But I do not have time to wait. I must repair the breaches my fathers made, and seek to undo the sectarian attitude which I helped to promote, and do it now. "I must work while it is called today, for the night cometh when no man can work." I am compelled by an inner sense of urgency, a compulsion which will not be stilled. The way to unite is to unite! After all the conferences have been held and the bone-weary negotiators have completed their awesome studies of "ham on the Lord's table" and "gopher wood in the ark" in relation to instrumental music, the only way they can unite is to unite. I am starting where they will be ending! I have fiddled away too much of my life already. I have no more to waste!

I trust, therefore, that I will not be thought presumptuous in suggesting the following steps which I think our brethren ought to take if they expect to seriously attempt to answer the prayer of Jesus for all who believe in Him through the apostolic testimony. I especially commend them to my brother and fellow-editor, Reuel Lemmons, who is in the forefront of arranging for Church of Christ participants in the dialogue sessions.

I think it is rather useless to get together to exchange the same old tired clichés and parrot the moss-covered stereotyped expressions. We need a new approach, a bold approach, one that will challenge us all with its freshness. It was just such an approach which gave the restoration movement birth. It is such an approach which will revive it in power in our cynical society.

1. Let us freely admit our error in equating the restoration movement with the kingdom of heaven. That kingdom has always existed and did not need to be restored. Restoration is an approach toward solving the problems of schism in the body, and the restoration movement is not the body of Christ moving exclusively in this fashion and through its adherents only, but it is a movement within that body.

We have employed the term “Church of Christ” in a sectarian sense, and when we use the expression “the Lord’s church” to designate those only who are members of a faction, segment or movement, we sectarianize it. Even if we bring together all of the dissident parties in the restoration movement, we have not yet achieved the unity of all God’s people. We will only have made the restoration movement a more effective agent in working toward that end.

God has children whose names are not found on the roster or in the directory of any Christian Church or Church of Christ. Certainly they are members of the body of Christ and it is the church of Christ. But the term church of Christ as God sees it embraces many more people than are embraced in the term as employed in the Gospel Advocate or Firm Foundation, and all of God’s children are my brothers and sisters. And I do mean all of them!

2. Let the non-instrument brethren openly admit that our fathers were wrong when they made a test of fellowship out of instrumental music, and created a non-instrument party or sect. This has nothing to do with the right or wrong of instrumental music. Certainly one could not say it was right to use it if he thought it was wrong to do so. But it is a sin to “set at nought a brother” for whom Christ died, over such matters, and we need to quit pussyfooting around and say so out loud.

All of the sparring and fencing around over whether psallo includes plucking or twanging on something while you are singing is beside the point when it comes to fellowship in Christ Jesus. Lambasting each other with lexicons and pasting each other with patristics may be a good diversion for those who have time for it. But whatever the final decision is when the referee sounds the last whistle, cannot alter the fact that we are brothers now in one body by baptism, and we are charged with maintaining the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

We need to rise above that species of petulant partisanship which causes us to jockey around for a favorable concession from “the other side” so we can appear justified. This is childish, frivolous and silly. We inherited a factional set-up, we supported and defended it. It was a sin to start such a faction, it is a sin to perpetuate it. Let’s say so. Never mind whether other factionists evade the issue or face up to it. Let us free ourselves from the short-sighted sophistry into which we have been betrayed by tradition. I do not favor the use of instrumental music in the praise service of the community of saints, but I shall not allow the devil to motivate me to use this to try and club my brothers into conformity, or drive them from me.

3. Let us candidly concede that we have betrayed the original restoration ideal as enunciated by Thomas Campbell in “The Declaration and Address.” To try and make it appear that we are upholding that ideal while making tests of fellowship out of such things as instrumental music or the millennium, exhibits either a deep-seated ignorance or blatant hypocrisy. Nothing can be clearer than proposition six in the “Declaration.” Here it is.

“That although inferences and deductions from Scripture premises, when fairly inferred, may be truly called the doctrine of God’s holy word, yet they are not formally binding upon the consciences of Christians further than they perceive the connection, and evidently see that they are so, for their faith must not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power and veracity of God. Therefore no such deductions can be made terms of communion, but properly do belong to the after and progressive edification of the Church. Hence it is evident that no such deductions or inferential truths ought to have any place in the Church's confession."

For years I made deductions and what I conceived of as inferential truths part of the church's confession, or unwritten creed. During that time I spoke fervently about the efforts of the pioneers of the restoration movement, but I was wholly ignorant of the platform of that movement. I had not even read "The Declaration and Address." All I knew about it was what other preachers in the faction said about it, and a lot of them had not read it either. We were learnedly professing to defend something about which we were almost wholly ignorant.

When I finally read "The Declaration and Address" and saw what a noble document it was, and how far I had missed even the basic principles which it spelled out, I became convicted of the sin of factionalism and sought to clear my heart of the whole sordid mess of inept and inconsistent reasoning which was equated with loyalty by the party chieftains. The party spirit makes for dishonesty and breeds arrogance and self-righteousness.

Our position on instrumental music is a deduction from Scripture premises. One need not be profound to see that. The same holds true for our interpretation of the millennium. Granted that what we believe is a truth (and both sides firmly believe they have the truth), it is an inferential truth, and neither can bind it upon the other as a term of fellowship.

Let us admit that we have sinned in creating separatist parties over such things as instrumental music, cups, classes, colleges, and the rest of the catalogue of issues over which we have stultified ourselves and caused the rest of the religious world to regard us as magnifiers of the minute and crucifiers of the concrete. We can hang up charts from now until Jesus comes, and devise arguments that are complex and intricate, but when the gong sounds to end the struggle, whatever we have said about instrumental music will have been a deduction and an inferential truth.

I do not intend to sit around on the fence twiddling my thumbs and wait while the party “somewhats” continue their puerile palavering and their legalistic lacing of one another. I am through with all of the factional huddles and higgledy-piggledy. My brothers are my brothers. All of them are. It is just that simple. Whatever they think about instrumental music or the millennium, or about cups, classes or colleges, they are still my brothers. I am in the one body with them. I am united with them through the one Spirit. And I shall recognize them as my brothers in the Lord.

In the encounter between the select representatives of the Christian Churches and Churches of Christ, the former asked the latter what they thought of me and of my work. The Texans who were present hastened to say that I was too liberal. And measured by their standard I think that I am. I just do not believe that any orthodox faction in the restoration movement is the Lord’s church to the exclusion of all others. I do not believe that all of them together exhaust the possibilities of God’s grace. I do not believe the restoration movement is the whole body of Christ on earth. I no longer defend any party, splinter, sect or segment as the one holy, catholic and apostolic church of God upon earth. That is what these men mean when they say I am too liberal. I will not be confined in my love for God’s children by any arbitrary and authoritative fence which men construct.

For this, of course, I am branded as liberal, and I thank God and take courage, for at last I am a free man, free in Christ to serve all of my brothers without fear or favor. My allegiance is to the risen Lord, my Comforter is the Holy Spirit, my brethren are all those who have been born from above. Not for all this world contains would I again barter the grace of God for the favor of men. It is a thrilling experience to look back and recognize one's errors, and be empowered to confess openly, "I was mistaken," and never worry what men can do to you. I have been set free by the grace of God. I shall never again wear the yoke of partisan bondage!

The Capture of Thought

Mission Messenger (November 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

“Our battle is to bring down every deceptive fantasy and every imposing defence that men erect against the true knowledge of God. We even fight to capture every thought until it acknowledges the authority of Christ” (2 Corinthians 10:5).

We are engaged in a struggle for the minds of men. This is the real basis of our war against atheistic Communism. It is not essentially a conflict between two political theories— between democracy and socialism. One nation cannot impose its governmental structure upon another without its consent, except in violation of basic human rights. But the kind of communism of which I speak dethrones God and enthrones the state, so that man is made the vassal of the latter instead of the servant of the former. Communism erects an imposing defence against the true knowledge of God.

Man’s heart belongs to God. It is His chosen dwelling-place and whatever else occupies that territory is a usurper. It must be dislodged and driven out, and the flag of the kingdom must be planted in the soul, and possession be taken in the name of the absent Sovereign. The soldier of Christ is committed to unrelenting and aggressive warfare against every such intruder regardless of how imposing his defence may be.

Communism is not the only such enemy we must face in our day. Another is scientism. I did not say science. There is a difference. Science is a hand-maiden of God. It is his servant. But scientism is the elevation of the slave to the throne. God gave us science, but scientism is the mistaken view that science gives us God. That which was intended to serve our needs is regarded as the supplier of them. And this is idolatry!

Communism and scientism originate in men's minds. They are the brainchildren of human rationalization. In spite of their opposition to the divine purpose their very existence is proof of the creative power of God, just as Satan is. God did not create Satan, but he created angels and archangels, and one of them by rebellion against God made himself to be Satan. So false "isms" spawned by fertile minds, only serve to show the length to which concepts may go when started on a tangent away from God. The very devilishness of such ideologies is indicative of how ingenious and inventive is that mind which could come only by the power of One whose mind is infinite.

It is here that we need to be very careful. Our task is not to discourage men from thinking and certainly not to destroy the power to think. In our zeal for victory we must not crush men's spirits in order to soften their hearts. When we make men flabby and thoughtless we make them useless. In the past "religious systems" have often operated on the basis that to avoid wrong thinking it is better not to think at all. Their communicants have been blessed when they exhibited a rubber-stamp mentality, and cursed when they rose above partisan mediocrity.

To stifle original thinking is not to bring a man closer to the image of Christ, but to eradicate the image of God from his heart. Bland conventionality and blind conformity are not conducive to creativity. We are to channel thought, not crucify it. Read our heading text again. It is one thing to capture a man, and a wholly different thing to crush and kill him. We are to capture every thought and bring it to acknowledge the authority of Christ. That which is dead is incapable of recognizing or acknowledging authority.

Please notice that our responsibility is to every thought. We are always tempted to categorize thoughts into “religious” and “non-religious.” But thoughts affect men’s lives and behavior. They make us what we are. Though some of them appear irreligious they are not non-religious for they are wrapped up in life as we live it. And our life is our “religion.”

Whether our thoughts are labelled as literary, scientific, mechanical, poetical, fictional, or whatever, they must be captured and led to the throne and brought to bow before the authority of the Christ. We must not stop men from writing fiction and thus dry up the wells of imagination which God hollowed out in human hearts. Let us only bring our stories, plays, television scripts, and magazine articles to serve his purpose in slanting men’s minds toward his glory. We need as much as anything else to encourage literary genius in our day.

Let us not deride those whose creative hearts seek to express their inner visions in various art forms. The great Artist of the universe is not jealous when his children walk in the steps of their Father. Let men be free to probe the far reaches of space, to experiment in their laboratories, to explore the depths of the sea. Let them postulate, theorize and speculate, and let the world know that God sets no limit upon our right to knowledge of the universe except the limits we impose upon ourselves through fear or false humility, which is not really humility at all.

All truth is one truth! Whether given by revelation, discovered by scientific investigation, or arrived at by rationalization, if it is truth, it is His truth, and He wills it to be ours if we arrive at it. Let us capture every thought, but let us not torture our captives, or brutalize and murder them. Dead thoughts are like dead men, they can acknowledge no authority, not even His!

I believe that the throne-room of consciousness is the rightful domain of the King. Every concept which invades it must come in proper homage to his majesty. No alien thought can long be tolerated which arrogantly refuses to be naturalized and bow before him. But foreign ideas which stray into the sacred premises must not be smitten down. Instead they must be placed under tribute that they may bring to his coffers all the riches of the universe. The Lord of glory is also the Lord of thought. The infinite Mind must capture and embrace the minds of the universe!

Words of Lipscomb

Mission Messenger (November 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

It is interesting to read the writings of those brethren who lived in a previous generation and sought to face up to the problems of their day. One such brother was David Lipscomb, for many years editor of the Gospel Advocate. Upon one occasion a preacher wrote that during his meeting at Cedar Grove, Tennessee, a little fourteen year old girl who was one-eighth negro, was baptized. The question was “Now, as there is no negro congregation in that community, where should she worship? Should the white members fellowship her, or should she be deprived of worshiping God?” Here is the reply as given by Lipscomb:

I have never found any sanction or authority in the Scriptures for different churches in the same community for different races of people. In the days of Jesus and the apostles the antipathy and antagonism existing between the Jews and Gentiles were as great as that now existing between the white race and the negro race. I find no intimation or suggestion of separate congregations for the two antagonistic races. On the other hand, it is distinctly stated that his mission was to make of the two races one body in Jesus. I believe that is the only correct course to follow in any and all other ages . . . Whatever we do to the least disciple of Christ, we do to him. If we refuse to recognize as a brother or sister the most despised of his disciples, we refuse to own him. I doubt if one who refuses to fellowship and encourage and help one who is his disciple because he or she is of another race can be saved.

Another reader of the paper which he edited wrote in to ask, "Is it right or wrong to ask a sectarian to get up and read a chapter in the Bible where they take a part with us in the Sunday School, and should they offer prayer after reading?" Here is the way David Lipscomb faced up to the matter in print:

I would say it is wrong to encourage sectarianism in any way, if we can tell which are sectarians; but my observation is, it takes a sectarian to ferret out a sectarian, just as 'it takes a rogue to catch a rogue.' Unfortunately, all the sectarians are not in sectarian churches; and I hope some in sectarian churches are not sectarians. Things get badly mixed in this world. Sometimes people who wish to obey God are born and raised in sectarian influences. A man who loves party more than he loves God is a sectarian. A man who divides the church of God for a theory or teaching not required by God is a sectarian. A person who pushes an idea or practice not required by God to the disturbance of the peace of the church, or that exalts a human opinion or practice to an equality with the commands of God, is a sectarian and a heretic.

There are some in nonsectarian churches who are sectarians, who violate the laws of God in order to oppose sectarians. They are sectarians in their opposition to sectarians. There are some in sectarian churches who will obey God and follow him in spite of the sectarianism of the churches in which they find themselves. As examples, there are persons in the Baptist, Methodist, and Presbyterian Churches who were baptized to obey God rather than to please the sects. In this they rise above the sectarian spirit, despite the parties in which they find themselves. They ought to get out of the sectarian churches, but they see so much sectarianism in the nonsectarian churches they think all are alike.

Peter and John, Paul and Barnabas, all met with the sectarian Jews at their times and places of worship and participated with them, that they might find an opportunity to speak a word for the truth. I do not think it hurts any man, sectarian or sinner, to read the Bible anywhere or at any time. I do not think it hurts any one to hear the Bible read by sectarian or sinner at any time or place. The great end is to be true and faithful to the truth and at the same time kind and sympathetic with those in error. The nearer we can do these two things, the more like Jesus we will be and the more sinners and sectarians we will save.

Upon another occasion, Lipscomb said,

Every man has those predilections and preconceptions that warp his judgment and blind his vision to a greater or less extent. Some have them stronger than others. Some desire to know and do the will of God with more earnestness and singleness of purpose than others; hence some learn the truth much more slowly than others, even where natural ability is equal. No human being in the beginning of his religious life can, with a true and perfect heart, desire to know and do the will of God. To have such a heart, unblinded by prejudice, unwarped by other desires, would be more than human. If God did not accept service from imperfect and prejudiced hearts, he would never accept service from human hearts.

It is quite evident that if David Lipscomb and other brethren of his day could come back to life, they would be rejected and repudiated by the very congregations they helped to plant. Lipscomb would be branded as a liberal and would be shut out of the pages of the very paper he once edited, as well as being debarred from speaking on the lectureship of the school which he founded. This only serves to show what happens when movements harden into sectarian attitudes, and little men continue to build monuments to the very prophets whom they would stone if they were still present.

Things to Come

Mission Messenger (December 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

There comes a time in the life of a man who has fought for a cause when he must risk his all on the result of a single decision. To me, that time has arrived. It was twelve years ago that I turned my back on my former factional attitude and committed my life to the task of helping in a weak way, to bring peace to the schism-wracked heirs of the restoration movement. During that time great changes have occurred in the world about us and these have affected men in every religious movement.

Many who were laboring within the framework of our own movement have abandoned it for other fields. Some have argued that the restoration ideal has no validity in this secular age and that it is a sheer waste of time to expend efforts upon those whose arrogant attitude toward others of God's children only serves to widen existing gaps. I do not concur in that type of thinking. Our brethren have a great many faults, of course, and I am no exception. But one will not find perfection by going somewhere else. He may only run into more problems and some of these will be worse than those from which he fled. In any event, I am staying. I intend to be neither frightened nor bought off.

But I do think the time has come for a real searching of God's word, our present condition, and our own hearts. We are divided, strife-torn and rent into factions. No amount of congratulatory writing can eliminate this cold fact. In some cities there are as many as eight or ten separate groups of restoration heirs, meeting in selfish exclusivism, often hating and being hated by the others. Each faction equates its own adherents with the people of God, while those who gather to memorialize the Lord elsewhere are regarded as traitors and apostates.

Citizenship in the kingdom of heaven is no longer a matter of commitment to the King, but is judged by one's concurrence with the partisan test proposed by the faction. Humble prayers, a consecrated daily walk, and a deep spiritual concern count for nothing. All of these are negated by a special view of music or the millennium, or of cups, classes, colleges, or some other secondary matter hoisted into prominence by a "pro" or "anti" party. Even the most unassuming servant of the Lord is attacked with animosity and bitterness if he merely transfers his attendance to a place of meeting sponsored by another segment. Hostility and hatred are manifested toward other children of a common Father in journals, church bulletins and radio programs.

Our present course is shameful. It disgraces the name of the Son of God. It bespeaks our own shallow thinking when we allow the relationship created by his precious blood to be broken up over our trivial matters of controversy. That there should be even two rival parties operating in one community, each claiming that it alone basks in divine favor while the others are all reprobates is frightening; that there should be ten or more is an unthinkable tragedy. Can we continue to go on in such a state until death claims us? Dare any of us be coldly concerned for our own faction alone and never seek to make peace with our other brethren? Has it come to pass that the very peacemakers who are blessed by the master are damned by his disciples?

What is the real basis for our division? Every one of the factions says it is lack of respect for the authority of the scriptures. Every one believes that it alone respects that authority while all of the others do not. Each is righteous in its own sight. Each is wise in its own conceits. If the Word is as plain and simple in every detail as the brethren declare it is, why are there any divisions at all? Do only dishonest persons divide? The time has arrived to go deeper than our superficial answers which are parroted from one generation to another while divisions increase and chasms grow wider.

We cannot continue in our childish and petulant course, blaming all others while proclaiming our own innocence and freedom from guilt. It must be admitted that our attitude toward the new covenant scriptures has created division among honest and sincere brethren. Our divisions are no monuments of disregard for God's word, but living testimony to our attempts to follow its teaching. There is not a single faction among us that does not credit its very isolation and separation to its solemn adherence to the Bible.

Whatever our thinking in the past it has solved nothing. Under its influence we have grown to be an ever-decreasing proportionate minority in an expanding world. We cannot even stay together or work together among ourselves. We have shattered and fragmented the very movement of which we are a part, a grand and noble effort in its incipency with the goal of "uniting the Christians in all of the sects." I refuse to believe that my brethren in any of our own sects are deliberate rebels and malicious rogues. They are eager to serve the Lord and to please him.

Even a casual reasoner can see that if all of our warring tribes declare that basic to our unity is regard for the sacred scriptures, and if every splinter party declares that it alone is following the scriptures, there must be something wrong with the way in which we regard the scriptures. And it is apparent from our history that so long as we regard the scriptures as we do we must continue to divide and tear the body of Christ. We are doomed to a new schism in every generation if we continue on our mad course!

In 1970, if the Lord wills and I live, it is my intention to probe our difficulty in the restoration movement in a way I have never done it before. I am going to ask my brethren questions which will cause those who are honest to evaluate anew their concept of the role designed for the new covenant scriptures in the ongoing life of the people of God. My brethren have posed as champions of the truth of heaven in the field of religious polemics. They have been bold in challenging the very ground upon which others stand. I propose very humbly and sincerely to let them see how they appear on the other side of the fence.

The reason why we must anticipate a united attack on all fronts is because I am not waging a factional battle. I am not defending one party in the restoration movement as opposed to other parties. I am not a factional champion. What I shall do is to challenge the whole ground of Church of Christism. And I shall be striking at what I believe is the root of our problem, which is a mistaken view of the design and purpose of the apostolic writings. I will not be questioning whether this faction or that has recaptured “the pattern.” Instead, I will be questioning if it was ever the design of heaven to provide for us a meticulous and stereotyped formula of procedure for all ages and climes.

I am going to ask what things were said and done by Jesus purely as a part of a contemporary and cultural setting? I am going to ask what was absolutely essential to please God in the life of the apostles, and what things were incidental, products of the place and time. It is my intention to show that what our brethren call the pattern was not prescribed by God at all, but is a compilation and collation of partisan deductions and traditional preconceptions, so that each group has constructed and cobbled up its own “pattern” so that we now have two dozen different patterns, all of which profess to be a restoration of the divine order.

In this, I intend to be as gracious and generous as I can, but I shall be as relentless in the exposure of our fallacies and pretences as I will be in the search for truth. I think the time is at hand when we should be forced to face up to the fact that our brethren have built a “house of straw” upon a foundation of sand. This will mean that I will be called upon to deal with our divisions as they exist. I shall try to do this without rudeness for I have a deep sense of compassion for those who are gripped by partisan fear. However, I intend for my readers to know what I am talking about when I uncover the weakness inherent in our crazy-quilt pattern of strife and division.

I accept the new covenant scriptures as a revelation of the infinite mind and thought. I shall defend them against all who would abuse them, either by denying their divine origin or by warping and twisting them into a position their giver never intended. Which Church of Christ today, of our two dozen sects, has the divine pattern? Which of these respects the authority of the Book and the Lordship of Jesus? We cannot much longer deal with these matters as we have in the past by biting and devouring one another. I shall explore these and other questions as pertinent without fear or favor.

In the ensuing year we can promise you, God being our helper, that your hearts will be challenged, your minds stretched, and your lives enriched. The series of articles for 1970 will all be written around the theme, “The Living Pattern.” We pray that you will continue to read what will be said, and we urge you to pray for us as we write.

We are grateful to God that we are again closing a year with all bills paid. Our readership list is the largest it has ever been. This means that our expenses are heavier because the subscription rate does not nearly pay the cost of printing and mailing the paper for a year. Inflation makes one month of the publication cost us more than a whole year when we started over thirty years ago.

Spirit-filled brothers and sisters make up the difference, God bless their precious hearts. Some of them send every month, choosing to support what we are doing as a vital mission of peace to our brethren torn by strife and disunity, rather than placing their contribution in the institutional church to aid and enhance a factional image. We never use a cent of money contributed to the paper for our own use. All of the work done in conjunction with it goes without remuneration. It is a work of faith and labor of love shared by some of the most wonderful saints in our world of crisis.

The subscription price will remain at one dollar per year, and we shall use any overplus to mail the paper to those who cannot pay for it or might never see it except through the generosity of someone who really cares!

Actually, our 1970 series will begin with the February issue. The January number will contain a reprint in full of the editorial "Faith or Opinion" by Brother Ruel Lemmons, which appeared in the Firm Foundation, for September 30. I expect to analyze that editorial point by point, and show how the attitude taken by our brethren in current unity talks will only serve to enhance the factional and divisive course of the past. It is sectarian to make tests of fellowship where God has made none, and to fracture the family of the Father into warring tribes over artificial issues. It is time that we start facing up to the real troubles which beset us, and my reply to this article will zero in on the problem in an honest appraisal which you will want to read.

The Secret Plan

Mission Messenger (December 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

“For God has allowed us to know the secret of his plan, and it is this: he purposes in his sovereign will that all human history shall be consummated in Christ, that everything that exists in heaven or earth shall find its perfection and fulfillment in him” (Ephesians 1:9, 10).

The human mind partakes of and assimilates ideas as the mouth introduces food to the stomach. That is why we use such expressions as “food for thought,” or “digesting new truths.” As food strengthens and nourishes the body, so ideas cause the mind to grow and expand.

But not all food is equally tasty, and when one gets a morsel which is especially delectable, he wants to hold it in his mouth and swallow it slowly, savoring every bit of it. The same thing is true with the thought-processes, and one of the most wholesome and palatable bits I have ever found is the one in our heading. I never tire of meditating upon it. Here are a few things that thrill my soul about it.

1. God is the God of a plan. Our universe is not the result of blind chance. It did not result from a mere fortuitous concourse of atoms. We have not been condemned to a meaningless meandering or a senseless striving from the cradle to the grave. Everything in creation is composed of related systems, and all of these combine to form greater systems. In the physical body the digestive system, the nervous system, the genito-urinary system all inter-relate to form the body, and each would be functionless outside of the ultimate combination.

By the same token, the planetary system, the terrestrial system, and countless others, are part of a grand design. Can we deny that all that is made, visible and invisible, is not linked together by the Maker into an unfolding pattern which some day will reveal itself in such transcendent beauty that man must have a transformed nature to even appreciate it?

2. God is the God of a secret. Parents sometimes have a noble desire to make their offspring heirs of such wealth as will provide them happiness and security beyond their fondest dreams. But they dare not disclose their ultimate aim while the children wrestle with the struggle toward maturity. The closely guarded secret must be kept without disclosure until the children are ready to understand and appreciate it.

Thus it was with the secret of the ages. God sent his children to the primary school of the patriarchal economy, then to the elementary school of the Mosaic economy with its governors and child-conductors, and finally to the preparatory high school conducted by a special tutor, John, the son of Zacharias and Elisabeth. Then, when the children graduated he told them the great secret. So it is written, "You must realize that so long as an heir is a child, though he is destined to be master of everything, he is, in practice, no different from a servant. He has to obey a guardian or trustee until the time which his father has chosen for him to receive the inheritance."

We are fortunate indeed to live in the age of the shared secret. Paul writes, "This secret was hidden to past generations of mankind, but it has now, by the Spirit, been made plain to God's consecrated messengers and prophets." Again he says, "that sacred mystery which up till now has been hidden in every age and every generation, but which is now as clear as daylight to those who love God.”

3. God is the God of human history. The march of mankind is not a tramp through the darkness with no definite starting place and without a designated destination. It is not an upward groping from flecks of spume or slime in primordial ooze, or the reaching out of fleshy tendrils or tentacles to clamber up to a rocky shore from the depths of a sea of gaseous mud. Instead, it is the ongoing procession of men made in the image of God, with that image soiled and defaced through sin, but always tending toward “the hope that in the end the whole of created life will be rescued from the tyranny of change and decay, and have its share in that magnificent liberty which can only belong to the children of God.”

There is no question about the terminus of our existence. It is determined according to the purpose grounded in God’s will, and that will is sovereign, not subject to external or changing conditions. Man is not in a rat race. He is part of the human race, come from God and destined for fellowship with the Eternal One. It is not always easy for one who is caught in the eye of a hurricane to see the way out, but we need not be too concerned for the One who watches over us does not slumber nor sleep.

Human history will be consummated in Christ. This is the secret. We have now been cut in on it so we know what life is all about. We were made flesh by the Word of God, and then the Word was made flesh to become like us. He shared our lot so we could share his life. He came down that we might be lifted up. He is our existence, our motivation, our ground of being. “In him we live, and move, and have our being.” We are because he is! He is not merely God up there or out there, but God down here and in here. He is not just Alpha, but also Omega. The alphabet of the divine has its final letter as well as its first, so he is perfecter as well as the pioneer of our faith.

4. God is the God of fulfillment. There are no dangling threads in the divine pattern but all are caught up in the loom of the ages and woven into the warp and woof of the infinite coverlet of love. There are no spare parts scattered over the workbench of time but all are fitted into the enmeshed gears of the machinery of destiny. Every desire, every thirst, every hunger, every drive which is legitimately a part of our nature finds its fulfillment in him who bridged time and space to fling out the lifeline which drew him unto us by the same act which drew us unto him.

The secret is out and gone are the frustrations which result from peering intently into the darkness. The secret is out and gone are the fears of hacking our way through a labyrinthine jungle filled with frightening sounds and sights. The storm is subsiding, the waves are receding, the breakers are quieting. The secret is out, and the dawn is coming, and he stands on the far-off shore beckoning. He is the Reconciler of the Eras, the Desire of all nations, the Peace of God. “In my opinion whatever we may have to go through now is less than nothing compared with the magnificent future God has planned for us. The whole creation is on tiptoe to see the wonderful sight of the sons of God coming into their own” (Romans 8:18, 19). Praise God!

Consecrated Diversity

Mission Messenger (December 1969)

Volume 31

[Abstract]

An address delivered at The School of the Ministry, Milligan College, August 20, 1969, by James M. Swiney, Educational Director of Mountain Mission School, Grundy, Virginia.

We all know that as Jesus tied the towel around His waist and washed the disciples' feet. He gave us an example that instructed us to serve, to be ministers— each and every one of us. In effect, Jesus tells us that Christians not only should, but must incorporate some ministry into their personal lives. Just as the salt in Jesus' parable flavors food, so Christians must flavor the life around them as they minister through their own personal service.

I'd like to consider with you some of the diversity found within the teaching ministry— not only as we express it in mission work such as that at Mountain Mission School— but also the areas of public and private school classrooms, the home and also the non-teaching job. For while opportunity exists for a teaching ministry in parochial type schools, greater opportunities for greater numbers exist in the public sector.

It is interesting to note that Jesus, the incarnation of God, came to men not primarily as a preacher as John the Baptist had done, nor principally as a worker of wonders and miracles (though he accomplished much along these lines), but rather Christ came to us primarily as our teacher.

As God chose to present Himself to mankind as our teacher rather than as our judge, though He does judge us; or as our mediator, though He mediates for us; or as our healer, though He heals our infirmities; His example tells us something of the real importance, character and diversity within the teaching ministry.

We tend to think of the priest as someone special in our society and so we should, though we should not necessarily treat the priest as a hands-off, sub- or super-human, the way some people do. Christ, our eternal priest, gave us the example of true, effective priesthood when He came as one of the people. He further loved His pupils and prepared Himself for almost three decades before He began to teach them.

To reach people, to successfully minister to their intellects, their bodies and their life force, God chose to present Himself to mankind in a secular light, rather than a sacred one. God presented us with a divine paradox— He revealed the sublimely sacred as being truly secular. In this act God revealed the misnomer of our system that places the priest on an imprisoned pedestal that often totally prevents him from doing the type of job he most wants and needs to do.

God tells us to mingle with people and make them know that the secular and the sacred are one and the same experience. Rather than to fragment our lives while we divorce science from religion or the arts from spirituality, God indicates that as we live we will both minister and live more successfully and effectively if we recognize that everything comes from God and therefore points back to Him, one way or another.

God was a teacher-priest. So also the professional teacher can minister most successfully as a priest in our world. If he acts responsibly, his teaching position carries respect and honor with it. The populace looks to the teacher to help it solve problems with its children. That populace sometimes blames the teacher for the child's failures or for failures of discipline within the home environment. Still, the opportunity exists to help the children and their parents.

While the teacher sometimes faces problems that are prevailingly academic in nature, he most often deals with problems directly related to the human personality or a developing child's social habits. And the teacher deals intimately with these problems.

The teacher gets down to the "nitty-gritty" of human life at a most important time—the time of home and childhood. The teacher deals with the human person as that person develops his personality and outlook toward life.

The teacher-priest deals with these problems not one day a week but five, six or even seven days a week. Thus, the opportunity to serve, to minister to a human person, remains constant within the world of that teacher who follows God's example of the teacher-priest.

Few people realize the tremendous impact the teacher can make, not only upon children and their parents, but also upon a community at large. A teacher finds he has a reputation. It may be good, bad or indifferent. However, the teacher who studies his teaching art and brings high excellence into his classroom causes talk that opens up opportunities of service to him as a teacher-priest.

People want to know about the teacher of excellence. Students strive to get into classes taught by the teacher of excellence. Administrators exult over the teacher of excellence. Colleagues want to imitate the teacher of excellence. Communities honor and mightily strive to retain the services of their teachers of excellence.

In short, the more the teacher extends himself to grow as a teacher, the more opportunity he has to minister to others as their teacher-priest. This principle prevails within the entire scope of the teaching ministry. The more we grow, the more we can grow.

Working with the young also offers the teacher a concrete opportunity to actually affect the course of society. The teacher also finds opportunity to retain the fresh, idealistic— even altruistic— outlook of youth, tempered with the wisdom found through experience that helps him communicate with the young and their elders as he serves them as a teacher-priest. And they need never fully know he serves them as a priest.

The teacher-priest also finds ample opportunity to help those who cannot help themselves. The student from an economically deprived background can receive a direct ministry from the teacher-priest. The child who needs a substitute parent can find solace and instruction at the feet of a teacher-priest. The child who bears strong emotional scars, a psychological neurosis of the more worrisome type, or even a mild psychosis can receive aid and instruction from the teacher-priest.

Teacher-priests often find that people, whether young or old, come to and inquire of the teacher before they consult their preacher. Whether or not these people are right or even wise to do this is beside the point. The teacher who wishes to serve as priest finds a vast array of opportunity to serve, that's the point!

The Scriptures tell us we all have a contribution to make to the church. Just as a woven blanket needs every thread of its warp and woof in place to be complete and warm, so also the church needs each person within its membership to act as ministers, as a holy priesthood for God.

The attitude that says, “let the preacher do it” slows down the effective ministry of Christ’s church. It is at this point that the idea of a “fulltime Christian service” often comes back to haunt us. There’s enough work for everyone in God’s service. Every Christian has a duty, an obligation to God and the grand privilege to engage in fulltime Christian service.

Christ ministered as a carpenter. Peter ministered as a fisherman and Paul ministered as a tentmaker. Each was a teacher-priest. There do exist only two kinds of people in this world— practicing Christians and non-Christians.

Let us not neglect the man in the pew when this is where our numbers and our potential strength lie. If we do neglect this source of strength then we will find ourselves wasting our opportunities to develop a truly diversified teacher-priesthood and will further add to the woes caused by the “let the preacher do it” syndrome. We will then find our people coupling that syndrome with the natural human tendency to avoid strangers. And finally, we will find that the strong commitment of an effective personal teaching ministry escapes the great majority of our people almost entirely. We thus weaken the church, young people reject an organized and yet uninvolved Christianity and we should know better. It would seem that those of us who now hold positions within the teaching priesthood have the solemn duty to train as many recruits to this service as we possibly can.

Let us go to this man in the pew and get him to roll up his sleeves and get on to a personal teaching ministry. Let us realize that few men are really good at nightly visitation. Also, in today’s urbanized society, doors get slammed in the visitor’s face for the occupant within considers the visitor without to be an encyclopedia salesman in disguise. Even if the average working man can make it out to the evening sessions after fighting the evening rush hour and a hurried evening meal, he usually finds such slamming doors and late evening calling discouraging.

Why not encourage a home teaching ministry? We can develop a church program that vitally encourages such a ministry with all the necessary instruction sprinkled with plenty of “how to” examples. Then the man in the pew can competently conduct an in-depth teaching-priesthood within his own home.

Doesn't it seem reasonable that such a man who teaches in his own home and sees his own growing proficiency there will then look for and subsequently find more opportunity and courage to teach on the job? Won't this same reaction occur with mothers as well? Do we encourage the teaching ministry in all its true diversity or do we think only people with a professional license can teach?

Let us encourage all our number to act as teacher-priests whether our vocation lies in the area of preaching, professional teaching, machine operation, secretarial services or the too-often neglected energetic and intellectual powerhouse called the housewife. The opportunity exists to develop a truly diversified teaching-priesthood that will have continuing impact wherever Christians live or work.

At Mountain Mission School, our teaching ministry deals with rejected, orphaned children and children from homes in crisis. Our teachers come from all over the country and they have graduated from Bible colleges and major universities. We have a specialized teaching ministry at Mountain Mission School that deals mostly with the scared and the scarred. We find the more we learn the more we can apply our knowledge. The challenges to our minds, our emotions and our physical stamina are enormous. Our teaching program is diversified itself as it covers the sciences, humanities, the fine arts, physical development, sex education, plus Sunday school and church. This keeps us busy.

The Slave Mentality

Mission Messenger (December 1969)

[Abstract]

“So then, my brothers, we are not to look upon ourselves as the sons of the slave woman but of the free, not sons of slavery under the Law, but sons of freedom under grace” (Galatians 4:31).

The Galatians had been set free by the Good News, free from “the authority of gods who had no real existence,” and free from “dead and sterile principles,” which had held them enslaved, the victims of superstition and terror of the unknown. But then there came those intruders who seduced them into believing that the God whom they now knew was a stern law-making, whip-cracking Deity, and under this delusion they forgot that they had been set free, adopted and made heirs as sons of the family. Immediately they began to think as slaves and act accordingly.

The apostle turned their own weapon upon them. “Now tell me, you who want to be under the Law, have you heard what the Law says?” He then told them the interesting story of Abraham who fathered two sons, one by his wife according to promise, and the other by an Egyptian slave girl. He likened these women to God’s two covenants, and pointed out that those who were under the Law must be ejected from the family, for the slaves cannot inherit with the sons. Our heading quotation in this article is the conclusion of the allegory.

The way in which we look at ourselves is going to affect our whole attitude toward God and our demeanor toward one another. There is something about the slave mentality which makes it difficult for one to react as a wholesome social personality. This was demonstrated at the time of the American Emancipation Proclamation. Although the former slaves were legally free they could not think of themselves as so, and the previous feeling of inferiority bred into and forced upon them was only augmented in the presence of their one time owners who were now no more free than themselves.

The law enslaved and made prisoners of men and thus filled them with unnatural fears and inhibitions. If God is regarded as a tyrannical slave-owner we will get the idea that the community of saints is a group of unreconciled individuals living in slave-quarters behind the big house, but if we recognize that we are sons, born of a free woman, we can sit down together at the table without latent hostility and inner trauma.

The way in which we look at our parentage will determine the way in which we regard one another. We will not browbeat and seek to destroy those who are beloved as brothers and sisters. We will not set up false standards and demand conformity, for the freedom we inherit in spite of our shortcomings will prompt us to make allowances for others. As recipients of mercy and forgiveness we can be forgiving.

For several years I have been aware of the insecurity which characterizes those who seek security in law-keeping. I know men who continually hold "revivals" to save others and who dare not testify that they know they themselves are saved. They purport to bring to others that which they are not even sure they possess. And they cannot really forgive for they are not sure they are really forgiven.

These brethren are afraid to live and die. Their bravado and braggadocio is like a frightened lad whistling in the dark.

They bank their hope of everlasting bliss on the chance that they will not be killed suddenly. They must have the last few minutes of rationality to breathe a prayer asking forgiveness for their last mistake. There must be time to utter the cliché, “And if we have done anything else contrary to thy will for which we have not requested forgiveness.” Eternal life in the Father’s home is contingent upon bookkeeping with exactitude, of getting credit on one side of the ledger to balance and offset “acts of omission and commission” on the other. One sin, one prayer, and the latter wide enough to cover the former. What a whittling down of grace this is!

The result of all this is the development of a kind of smug hypocrisy which makes one bold in his claims to others who are regarded as “brothers in error,” and outside the pale, while he is filled with inward doubt right down to the last gasp. I thank God for deliverance from this “off again, on again, gone again” philosophy. What a sense of freedom comes when grace stoops down and lifts the crushing burden off your back. I know I am saved! I know I am in Him!

It is my prayer and heart’s desire for my brethren that they be delivered from the slave mentality. I bear them record that they have a zeal for God but not according to knowledge. Being ignorant of God’s method of justification, and going about to establish their own system of justification, they have not submitted themselves to that justification which is of God. For Christ is the climax and culmination of justification through law-keeping to every person who believes.

We are not to look upon ourselves as sons of the slave woman— law! We are sons of the free woman— grace! Too many of us have mistaken our mother and nursed the paps producing the curdled milk of trust in our own righteousness. Like the son of Abraham’s slave, we have grown to be like a wild ass in the wilderness, dwelling in the presence of our brethren while inwardly despising them. Our hand is against every man, and every man's hand is against us. It is time to realize that we are sons of freedom, and can move out of our factional tents and into the Father's house.

The Priority Value

Mission Messenger (December 1969)

[Abstract]

“In Christ Jesus there is no validity in either circumcision or uncircumcision, it is a matter of faith, faith which expresses itself in love” (Galatians 5:6).

The big issue of Paul’s day was circumcision. It was the subject of more debates and the cause of more bitterness than anything else. It divided the saints in every locality into “pros” and “antis.” Even the big name preachers were involved. Paul and Barnabas engaged in such a heated dispute with some brethren from Jerusalem, that it was decided to call a central conference in an attempt to resolve the matter. Paul said the gathering was infiltrated by “some pseudo-Christians who wormed their way into our meeting to spy on the liberty we enjoy in Christ Jesus, and then attempted to tie us up with rules and regulations.”

Peter vacillated in the matter and split one congregation “out of sheer fear of what the Jews might think.” Brethren were careful to act differently when certain ones were present lest they be branded and tagged as “soft” or compromising. When Peter was trying to straddle the fence with both feet on one side, Paul wrote, “The other Jewish Christians carried out a similar piece of deception, and the force of their bad example was so great that even Barnabas was affected by it.”

Circumcision is no longer an issue. It seems a little ridiculous to us now that it ever caused such a furore. It was displaced by other problems which were fought back and forth and which have now been relegated to the pages of history where the follies and foibles of succeeding generations are recorded. Now we are confronted by new issues which have supplanted the old, and which seem as grave and important to us as did the others in days of yore. There are some things we seem never to learn.

We are always getting caught on the “either-or” hook. “Either circumcision or uncircumcision.” We say that a thing has to be either right or wrong. What we overlook is the fact that regardless of which it is, it still may be relatively unimportant, and have no effect whatsoever on our relationship to God, and should have none upon our relationship to each other. Future generations will see this and wonder at our childishness even while they fight over matters as trivial.

All truth is equally true but not all truth is equally important. So all error is equally error, but not all error is equally important. All truth is to be desired for our wellbeing, but not all of it is essential to being. That which is required for life is more essential than that which is incidental to it, or enjoyable within it. It is not true that everything in the Bible is equally valuable to know. It is not nearly so important to know that Methuselah died at the age of 969 years as to know that Jesus died for our sins. Paul wrote that he left his overcoat with Carpus but that is not so valuable to know as that “the Lord’s servant must not be a man of strife; he must be kind to all, ready and able to teach.”

There are some things which have no real validity in Christ Jesus. The essential thing is to be in Christ. A man might be circumcised, or he might not be, but whether he was or not did not affect his state in the Lord. To be in Christ is to lift us above a lot of things and place us on a wholly different plane. It is like mountain-climbers whose porters are arguing about how to build a fire at an elevation of 8,000 feet, while the main body passes upward to establish a camp at 10,000 feet, so that the contention is no longer relevant.

It is certain that most of the things about which we have wrangled and travailed have no eternal significance. They are all transcended by our tremendous adoption into grace through the new birth. The thing which is valid is “faith which expresses itself in love.” Because of the King James translation— faith which works by love— our brethren have seized upon it to answer and offset a theological concept of salvation by faith only. This is probably a grave abuse of the statement made by Paul, but it is employed because the words “faith” and “works” appear in proximity.

The apostle was not seeking to establish a theological base, nor arguing against one which was established. He was simply showing that the big issue of the day was without any real validity in Christ Jesus, and the one thing which really counted was “faith which expresses itself in love.” If that is still true, why have we allowed issues of our day to gain such importance in our thinking? If Paul were writing directly to our situation, would he say the following?

In Christ Jesus there is no validity in either Sunday School classes, or the absence of such classes; it is a matter of faith, faith which expresses itself in love.

In Christ Jesus there is no validity in supporting Herald of Truth, or in not supporting it, it is a matter of faith, faith which expresses itself in love.

In Christ Jesus there is no validity in using instrumental accompaniment, or in not using it, it is a matter of faith, faith which expresses itself in love.

Our problem lies in our mixed-up sense of values. With many of us “faith which expresses itself in love” counts for nothing unless brethren have the external marks which make for acceptability. Our priorities are out of adjustment. We spend a much greater amount of time studying how we may defend our views about the issues, than in the cultivation of that deep faith which rises to the surface and showers love upon all about us. After Paul’s statement with which we have been dealing, he said, “You were making splendid progress, who put you off the course you had set for the truth?” That question comes with equal force to us today.

[Abstract]

I dislike to stand on the threshold of a new year, tendering an apology to our readers. But I must ask your kind indulgence for postponing until next month the beginning of the series of articles on "The Living Pattern." I am not so inflexible that I cannot alter my editorial plans where necessity seems to require it, and I want to place upon record certain feelings and attitudes related to contemporary matters. You may feel that it is poor judgment to do so, and if you do, I will not dispute the point with you.

Since 1957, when I wrote the first article entitled, "Thoughts on Fellowship," I have been urging brethren to set up dialogue sessions across lines and to discuss the fact that we have allowed carnality and immaturity to divide us until our witness as a unity movement has been negated and destroyed. Now we are seeing attempts being made to bridge chasms and span the gulfs. We stand upon the brink of what could become a historical breakthrough in the history of the restoration movement.

Although numerous meetings are being held in our day I will confine my remarks to one particular attempt, because it will tend to be more publicized than any other. It has been obvious for sometime that gradual changes are being made in the thinking of orthodox Church of Christ men, and that some of these brethren are becoming uncomfortable with their own attitude in an ecumenical atmosphere. When Reuel Lemmons wrote an article in Firm Foundation, in which he expressed the thought that the time had come for non-instrumental brethren to explore their thinking with representatives of Independent Christian Churches, James DeForest Murch wrote him asking how the matter should be implemented.

It was suggested that each select six brethren who would meet in Memphis and converse together about the divergencies, and become better acquainted. This meeting was characterized by a real spirit of fraternity and amiability. It was thereupon agreed that fifteen men from each group would meet in Saint Louis to continue joint exploration, and that the meeting remain on an invitational basis. At the Saint Louis gathering positional papers were presented and discussed, and all was done in a very brotherly and encouraging attitude.

In view of the fact that my name was publicly injected into both gatherings, and that I have no means of making my own position known except in MISSION MESSENGER, I am going to ask your gracious forbearance while I comment at length upon such a time of concern for all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in the Churches of Christ and Christian Churches. Since thousands of our readers do not receive Firm Foundation, I am printing in full herewith an editorial by Brother Lemmons, which appeared in the issue of his journal, dated September 30, 1969.

FAITH OR OPINION

by Reuel Lemmons

For three days, September 18-20, in St. Louis, Mo., 15 preachers and elders from among churches of Christ met with a team of fifteen brethren from the Independent Christian churches, in an effort to further explore possibilities of the two main bodies of brethren having a common heritage in the Restoration movement coming closer together. Those from among churches of Christ were Frank Pack, J. W. Roberts, Raymond Kelcy, Norvel Young, Bill Humble, Jimmy Allen, Tom Olbright, Earl West, Harold Hazelip, Jay Smith, Hulen Jackson, Hardeman Nichols, Robert Bell, Eldred Cayce and this editor.

We believe such meetings are productive of much good. Conscientious and sincere brethren who are willing to grapple with the issues and who are really concerned over any division among the Lord's people always do good when they become better acquainted and when they understand each other better. This was a blunt meeting in which issues were faced squarely, and yet one in which brotherly love and consideration for each other were evident.

The real issue between the two groups, as it has always been, is the issue of faith versus opinion. This was clearly brought out. There are several other grounds upon which there is disagreement other than instrumental music, but this issue illustrates the two divergent views concerning faith and opinion. We believe that the exclusion of instrumental music is demanded by faith; they believe it is a matter of opinion.

We tried to show, and we believe we did show, from the scriptures that such issues belong in the realm of faith. An action of faith is an action having as its motivating force the word of God. Singing is a good example. An action of opinion is an action having as its motivating force the mind of man. Inferences drawn from careful study do not qualify as opinions. Instrumental music is a good example of an action which admittedly stems from the mind of man, and which is not based upon inferences drawn from study. Therefore: faith does what God commands; opinion ventures anything God has not specifically prohibited.

The Bible is filled with both practices. Actions of faith are always commended. Actions of opinion— where human judgment is interposed as an extension of the divine command have been severely condemned. We believe we can show that God, who never changes, has, in both the Old Testament and the New, placed his approval upon actions of faith and his disapproval upon extensions beyond faith into the realm of opinion. In this respect opinion becomes presumption, and presumptuous sins are more serious than is implied by simply using the word “opinion.”

Let us consider some examples of presumption beyond faith. For example, Nadab and Abihu (Num. 16) were commanded to offer incense as a sacrifice of praise. They were to burn it with fire from the altar. God did not specifically prohibit strange fire. What God commanded they could do by faith. When they ventured into opinion they were destroyed.

There were various sacrifices commanded in the Old Testament. The plain command of God concerning each sacrifice made it possible to offer those sacrifices by faith. God did not have a “thou shalt not” law eliminating every other possible sacrifice. The very commandment which specified a certain sacrifice excluded all others.

Hamburger would pervert the Lord’s supper, not because God has said, “Thou shalt not use hamburger,” but because God’s plain prescription concerning the elements of the supper circumscribes the limit to which we can go and still observe it by faith.

We cannot accompany prayer with incense by faith. We cannot accompany the gospel with added elements in teaching— by faith. We cannot accompany giving with a raffle by faith. We cannot accompany the Lord’s supper with hamburger— by faith. Why would one think we can accompany the praise service with instrumental music by faith?

We believe a valid argument can be made on the authority of God in areas of silence. And the Holy Spirit thought so, too. In Heb. 1:5 the Spirit argues that Christ is superior to angels and the single argument that he made was that God was completely silent on the superiority of angels. The silence of God established the superiority of Jesus. Again, in Heb. 7, the priesthood of Jesus is proven to be different from that of the law on the sole basis of the fact that “the law spake nothing concerning priests” from the tribe of Judah. And still again, certain brethren who troubled the church in Acts 15 in an attempt to accompany Christianity with circumcision “to whom we gave no such commandment” were severely rebuked. These men were going beyond the commandment, but they were not violating any “thou shalt not” law.

Repeatedly we hear both inside the church and out of it, the challenge “Where is the verse that says you can’t use it?” Is nothing a sin unless there is an explicit law against it? Those who want to gamble or sprinkle babies or practice open membership or pray to Mary can say “Where is the law against it?” Really, if we must find a specific prohibition for everything, before it can be sustained as a position of faith rather than opinion, there is actually no such thing as perversion in the absence of specific prohibition.

We walk by faith. Without faith it is impossible to please God. Faith cometh by hearing the word of God. What we do in praise to God must be done by faith. Whatsoever is not of faith is sin. We can easily sing by faith, but we seriously question whether we can play by it.

Such meetings as the St. Louis meeting should be held all over the country. The two groups have too much in common not to try hard to solve their few differences. There was not, and should not be, any attempt at compromise of truth on either side. It is only through the sincere study of the word that we can ever hope to come to a unity of faith. And a unity of faith is what we must come to if we please the Lord. It behooves all of us on both sides of the issue to face up to the necessity of locating the issue in either faith or opinion. Just simply to express the opinion that it is in the realm opinion gets us nowhere. We are attempting to set forth in this article our reasons— from the Bible— for placing this issue in the realm of faith. If it is in the realm of opinion these reasons must be shown false and other reasons— from the Bible— set forth to put the issue in the realm of opinion. This simply must be done before we can come to a unity of faith. We did not get in our present condition overnight, nor will we get out of it overnight. We have little sympathy for unity efforts that seek to sweep under the rug real differences and simply refuse to face up to them. Such efforts are doomed before they start. But when brethren who love the Lord, and who are sincere in their love for each other, sit down together to really grapple with the issues that divide us, as did these men in St. Louis, then there is hope.

REMARKS ON THE EDITORIAL

Although the Hilton Inn, where the meetings were held in Saint Louis, is less than a five minute drive from my home, I was not in attendance at the discussions. The brethren who use instruments could not invite me; those who do not would not invite me. I no longer belong to any kind of a party founded upon either the “pro” or “con” of the instrumental question. I represent no sect or segment in the religious realm, and since the problem of the fellowship was settled for me at Calvary, nineteen centuries ago, nothing that is said about it now will settle anything for me in the twentieth century.

I personally know most of the brethren from “the two main bodies” and I respect and regard them all as God’s children and my brothers. I have no concern at all for “the two main bodies of brethren having a common heritage,” or for any of the lesser bodies. So far as I am concerned there is only one body, even as there is only one Spirit and one hope. There never was but one body of brethren in Christ, and there will never be another. All who were present at Hilton Inn are in that one body which God created. If they are in anything else it is by their own creation, and it is sectarian. None of them were inducted into the one body because they endorsed instrumental music; none of them were adopted by the Father because they opposed it. I receive them all as brothers exactly as he received them all as children.

This does not mean that I oppose brethren from various parties coming together to discuss their religious hangups. Contrary to that, I rejoice exceedingly, and have pleaded for this very thing. I commend our brothers, Lemmons and Murch, for their concern and willingness to do something to remedy our shameful schismatic state. I am especially grateful to Brother Lemmons for demonstrating how the Spirit can use and transform us in this age. When I first began to go among the very same men who were at the Hilton Inn, our good brother wrote me up for going among what he then called “rank digressives.” He predicted that if I had my way “the digressive element” would capture us all.

I am thrilled that these men are now “conscientious and sincere men who are willing to grapple with the issues.” Really these brethren have not changed on the issues, or in their attitude toward them. Brother Lemmons has changed, and those who love him as I do are overjoyed at that fact. Perhaps my brother will deny that his attitude has changed. He may not even know that it has. The Holy Spirit can change us from one degree of glory to another and we might not recognize it, or give him any credit for it. But let us not quibble over such things. It is enough that we all be grateful that those who were once “rank digressives” are now “brethren in the Lord who are sincere in their love for each other.” Praise God from whom all blessings flow!

Let me not seem critical in review of some things, for if I engage in “blunt writing in which issues are faced squarely,” I want brotherly love and consideration to be as evident in this little journal as it was in the conference room. The editorial will do a great disservice if it leaves the impression that “the real issue between the two groups, as it has always been, is the issue of faith versus opinion.” That is not the case at all! The brethren who use instrumental music make a clear distinction between faith and opinion. Many of those who were present teach in Christian colleges. I have visited their schools and spoken in chapel to the student body. Without exception all believe that “in matters of faith there should be unity, while in matters of opinion there should be liberty.”

The Real Issue

The real issue is not faith versus opinion. The real issue concerns who shall be the infallible interpreter of scripture for other men, and who shall determine what is a matter of opinion for the consciences of other “conscientious and sincere brethren.” This is the unenviable position which Brother Lemmons is forced to occupy by reason of the philosophy of Church of Christism. He must rule that what he has that other men oppose is a matter of opinion, but he must also rule that what other men have which he opposes is a matter of faith. He must be the official arbiter for the consciences of others.

Take the problem of Bible classes, for example. A lot of wonderful brethren think the Sunday School is “interposed as an extension of the divine command.” Brother Lemmons roundly rebukes them for claiming it is a matter of faith. He calls them hobbyists. But when brethren who have the instrument contend that to them it is a matter of opinion, Brother Lemmons rebukes them also, and says it is in the realm of faith. This is the real issue and it was not clearly brought out in Saint Louis, nor will it be brought out in any future meeting of the brethren unless they forget and invite me to attend. It will be clearly brought out then!

Our good brother believes that he showed all in attendance that the issue related to instrumental music belongs in the realm of faith. Apparently his arguments sounded more convincing to his ears than to others, because they still all use the instrument and consider it is a matter of opinion. Brother Lemmons says, “An action of faith is an action having as its motivating force the word of God . . . an action of opinion is an action having as its motivating force the mind of man.” It really isn’t that simple. All that God says is addressed to the mind of man. There never has been a disclosure of revelation that was not subject to reason and interpretation.

There are three spheres in which the mind operates—knowledge, faith and opinion. And when an eager student of God’s word investigates all that God has said, and forms an opinion based upon his over-all concept of God’s will, concerning a matter which is not clear to him, it is God’s word which motivates to that conclusion as a working hypothesis for himself, although not so for another. It isn’t all quite as “black” and “white” as a lot of people think it is.

Our good brother seeks to escape from an anticipated noose by postulating that “inferences drawn from careful study, do not qualify as opinions.” It is apparent that he thinks that inferences drawn from casual study do qualify as opinions. Now, who is to determine of what careful study consists? Is it the number of commentaries you read, or the number of hours you spend upon a subject? I know some “conscientious and sincere brethren” who have read all of the commentaries and studied for years and they still think that instrumental music is in the realm of opinion. Is careful study that which leads you to agree with Brother Lemmons in his views on a topic?

Are inferences identical with knowledge? Are they identical with faith? If they are either, why call them inferences? If they are not, are they left in the realm of opinion? Does not one opine that a thing is correct, based upon a consideration of factors involved, although there is no clear statement of fact? Is this not inference? Since our brethren universally hold that, “In matters of faith unity; in matters of opinion liberty; in all things charity,” where does that leave matters of inference, or deduction? In the realm of charity? If so, let’s start practicing love in spite of our inferences.

Our brother exhibits a failing common to men accustomed to laying down laws for others who do not engage in “careful study.” He defines a thing arbitrarily, and then attacks his definition as if he were dealing with the thing itself. He defines opinion as “human judgment interposed as an extension of the divine command.” He says that such has been severely condemned. Yet, in another editorial (May 4, 1965) he wrote, “There is plenty of room for diverse opinions in the church. The fact that we are Christians does not rule that out. Diverse opinions are often good. And in opinions there should be liberty.”

If “an action of opinion is an action having as its motivating force the mind of man,” and if “actions of opinion where human judgment is interposed as an extension of the divine command have been severely condemned,” then how can there be liberty of opinion? I think that, in the final analysis, our brother would be forced to the position that the only opinions for which there is liberty are his own. No one else is entitled to an opinion, for to exercise an opinion would be to “make extensions beyond faith into the realm of opinion.” Let us trust that he will not evade this by saying one is at liberty to hold an opinion if he never expresses it or acts upon it. That would condemn Brother Lemmons for having Bible classes and individual cups, both of which he says are in the realm of opinion.

Nadab and Abihu

Our brother equates opinion, as he defines it, with presumption, and adds that “presumptuous sins are more serious than is implied by simply using the word ‘opinion.’” Surely he realizes that every word translated “presumptuous” or “presumptuously” in the word of God has inherent in it a sense of pride, arrogance, or rebellion. Does he imply that our brethren who sincerely think that instrumental accompaniment in conjunction with their praise service is justifiable, are acting in insolent defiance of the will of heaven? I know some very humble saints who assemble where an organ is played. I also know some very arrogant ones who do not. I doubt that an opinion about instrumental music constitutes a presumptuous sin, even though brethren may be mistaken about it. Brother Lemmons needs to know the difference between rebellion and a mistaken view.

It is amazing how much a lot of sermon outlines are indebted to Nadab and Abihu. But honestly now, do they really fit into this situation? Brother Lemmons got them mixed up with Korah, Dathan and Abiram. He told the story of Nadab and Abihu, and cited Numbers 16, which relates to the other case. This was an honest slip but it shows what happens to editors. I know, because it happens to me a lot more often than it does to Brother Lemmons. In any event, Nadab and Abihu offered unholy fire before the Lord, under a legalistic system where nothing common or ceremonially unclean was accepted.

Is it possible they were drunk and couldn't tell the difference between holy and unholy fire? In direct connection with their death, the Lord said to Aaron, “Drink no wine nor strong drink, you nor your sons with you, when you go into the tent of meeting, lest you die; it shall be a statute for ever throughout your generations. You are to distinguish between the holy and the common, and between the unclean and the clean; and you are to teach the people of Israel all the statutes which the Lord has spoken to them by Moses.”

These priests, whether drunk or sober, did not distinguish between that which was holy and that which was unholy, and thus did not teach by example. They died for their failure. They were in rebellion against God. But we are no longer under a legalistic system. We are under grace. Does our brother think that God is going to burn all of his children who love him and respect him, and seek to serve him acceptably and with godly fear, even though they may be mistaken about some element of their praise? Will fire come out and destroy them all? May they not believe that God has sanctified to his use their praise, and that it is no longer common or unclean?

Even under the law Aaron and the others continued to serve with Nadab and Abihu until the Lord smote them. They did not anticipate what God would do and start beating his other servants. On what grounds do our brethren today play God with their brethren and start cutting them off in advance of the judgment of God?

For years I have been waiting for some of my brethren to get beyond verse eleven in Leviticus 10, and tell about Eleazar and Ithamar, the brothers of Nadab and Abihu, but they never do. Nadab and Abihu suit their needs. But Eleazar and Ithamar also made a great mistake and disobeyed a direct command on the same day their brothers were killed. It is recorded in the same chapter. And Moses became very angry. These young men were to take the goat of the sin offering into the sanctuary and eat it there. It was specifically appointed to them as a thing most holy, so they could bear the iniquity of the congregation and make an atonement for all the people before the Lord. It was a positive command.

But upon this day they did not even bring the blood into the inner part of the sanctuary, and they did not eat the flesh of the sin offering as they had been commanded. Moses instituted a search for the goat and learned that it had been burned contrary to the law. He was highly incensed and jumped all over them. But Aaron pleaded that the things which had befallen the family that day had caused so much sorrow of heart that they were not in the proper frame of mind to eat the holy things, and did not feel that God would accept their services if they did obey the command.

“And when Moses heard that, he was content.” Is this a case of situation ethics? Did human values transcend specific precepts? Did mercy rejoice over judgment? Why do we never hear about Eleazar and Ithamar and the forgiveness granted to them in spite of their violation of a command? I must mention one more thing. Our brethren bear down heavily upon the statement that Nadab and Abihu “offered unholy fire before the Lord, which he commanded them not.” But George Bush, one time Professor of Hebrew and Oriental Literature at New York City University writes, “This, by a figure of speech called meiosis, is probably equivalent to saying, ‘which the Lord had pointedly forbidden.’” If careful study should sustain Professor Bush it will certainly shoot a big hole in some well-worn sermon outlines.

Hamburger and Sacrifices

It is true that God commanded certain sacrifices and established a ritual under the Mosaic economy. Those who arrogantly rebelled against it were severely punished. But it is also true that not every one who failed to keep the due order was killed, because there is a difference in being rebellious against God’s requirements and being mistaken about them. Nothing is clearer, even under the old covenant, than that God showed mercy upon his anointed. Those who are in Christ are his anointed in our day.

In the days of Hezekiah a great many of the people ate the passover, “otherwise than it was written.” The record says, “But Hezekiah prayed for them, saying, The good Lord pardon every one that prepareth his heart to seek God, the Lord God of his fathers, though he be not cleansed according to the purification of the sanctuary. And the Lord hearkened to Hezekiah, and healed the people” (2 Chronicles 30:18, 19). Since the things written aforetime were written for our learning, perhaps this was written to show what leaders of the people, like Brother Lemmons, ought to do when their brethren prepare their hearts to seek God, but worship “otherwise than it is written.”

Why does our brother not follow the example of this godly king? Does he think that God is less likely to hearken to such prayers under the economy of grace? It is true that it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God, but it may be worse to fall into the hands of dying brethren who specialize only in the people God slew without ever breathing a word about those whom he spared. If the situation was as bad as our brethren paint it under the old covenant how did anyone ever muddle through?

Forgive me for saying so, but I think the hamburger in the Lord’s Supper bit has run its course. Certainly it would “pervert the Lord’s Supper.” The two elements in the Lord’s Supper are specific symbols of the body and blood of the Lord. To add a third ingredient would serve to confuse the purpose and design of the Supper. But, right, wrong, or neutral, playing an instrument does not pervert the purpose and design of the singing, which is to praise God. If it did so, it would have been as true under the old covenant dispensation as under the new. In mature discussion of our present problem, grown-up brethren might well leave the childish “pork and beans” and “hamburger” argument at home. It in no sense parallels the situation and is introduced to bolster a presupposition.

Areas of Silence

A good many brethren feel that after the Memphis meeting the brethren who oppose instrumental music went home to “shore up” their argument on “the authority of God in areas of silence.” At Saint Louis, Brother Lemmons gave the results of the research. It was alleged that in Hebrews 1:5, “the Spirit argues that Christ is superior to angels and the single argument that he made was that God was completely silent on the superiority of angels.” Note that “single argument.”

This statement is as full of fallacies as a sieve is of holes. In the first place, on the basis of logic, the superiority of one person cannot be established simply by silence about the superiority of other persons. The very best you can argue from this is equality. If God was silent about the superiority of the Son, and silent about the superiority of the angels, one would have to depend upon sheer conjecture to determine the superiority of one over the other.

But the argument of the Spirit is that God bestowed upon the Logos a title which is indicative of rank, and the very fact of its bestowal indicated superiority over all who did not receive the title. The Holy Spirit argues from a positive angle while Brother Lemmons argues from a purely negative posture. If the army authorities designate a man “Commanding General,” it is not the fact that they do not say anything about the other soldiers which proves his superiority, but the conferring of the title.

It seems incredible that a student of Hebrews 1 would state that the Holy Spirit used “a single argument” to show the superiority of Christ. Actually, he used seven arguments. He affirmed the authority of Jesus on the following grounds: (1) Reception of a more excellent name, verse 4; (2) Superior relationship, verse 5; (3) Reverence demanded, verse 6; (4) Nature, verse 7; (5) Coronation, verse 8; (6) Authority granted, verse 13; (7) Type of ministry, verse 14.

Even more revealing, in the light of the present analysis, is the fact that the Spirit specifically quotes from Psalm 45:6, 7, where the throne and sceptre are accorded to the Lord, and where it is affirmed that because of his attitude toward righteousness and wickedness, God anointed him with the oil of gladness above his fellows, or companions. In the contextual light many scholars of note with whom I am familiar hold that the “fellows” are the angels. If this be true, the Spirit is arguing from the old covenant scripture that God specifically decreed the superiority of Jesus over angels and even recorded it in Psalm 45:7. That certainly is not an argument based on silence of the scriptures. It is just not true that “the silence of God established the authority of Jesus.”

Our good brother is just as mistaken about Hebrews 7, where he goes to show that “the priesthood of Jesus is proven to be different from that of the law on the sole basis of the fact that the law spake nothing concerning priests from the tribe of Judah.” That was not the sole basis of proof at all. The priesthood of the Son, which was after the order of Melchizedek, was different than that of the law because, while the head of the legal priestly tribe was still in the loins of an ancestor, that progenitor was already paying tithes to Melchizedek (verse 7).

It differed in that the priesthood under the law had “a legal requirement concerning bodily descent,” while the Son was made a priest “by the power of an indestructible life” (verse 16). It differed in that priests under the law were not inducted into office by an oath, while the Son was (verse 21). It differed because priests under the law were prevented by death from continuing in office while the Son has a permanent priesthood. The argument that the law said nothing about the tribe of Judah in conjunction with priesthood is not an argument for the authority of silence, but simply for the confirmation of silence. It was only one in a sequence of arguments.

But Brother Lemmons has now switched sides. In the case of instrumental music he argues that he cannot accept brethren who use it because the scriptures are silent on it, but in the case of the priesthood he argues that Jesus was to be accepted as a priest in spite of the silence of the scriptures. I have no doubt that the Jews put up the very same argument to reject Jesus as Brother Lemmons does to reject his brethren.

I confess that I am a wee bit leery of “the law of exclusion” and even more so of its application and interpretation by finite brethren. A lot of good humble people think that when someone talks learnedly about the law of this or that, it is a definitive rule spelled out in so many words, and if you know where to look in the statute-book, you can run your index finger down the page, and there it is in black and white. They do not realize that these “laws” are mostly in the minds of preachers, filed away with a clutter of generics and specifics, ready to be aimed at any unwary soul who commits the frightful error of differing with them on any point of deduction.

Most of the brethren are of the opinion that “we speak where the Bible speaks, and remain silent where it is silent,” so when they hear one of us speaking, they automatically think it is the Bible speaking. But such terms as “the law of exclusion” are not in the Bible, and if we are going to call Bible things by Bible names, we will have to lift that one out of the slot. In other words, the law of exclusion excludes “the law of exclusion.”

This does not generally bother brethren who contrive laws with loopholes to govern conditions, and then go off on a talmudical tangent and compile a lot of precedents which are a part of our tradition. Actually, of course, we do not have traditions. Only the sects have traditions, in our case it is “just the way we have always done it.” It is sanctified by our practice and that keeps it from falling or being tossed into the barrel where traditions are stored, to be dragged out when needed, and when scripture is lacking.

The only thing that can really be proved about instrumental music from the silence of the scriptures on the subject, is that the scriptures are silent on the subject. You can speculate on the reason for that silence and can work out elaborate and complex arguments for your conjecture, but this does not amount to proof in the absence of testimony. For example, you may conclude, on the basis of a presupposition about authority, that God intended by his omission to show positive aversion to and condemnation of the use of instruments in conjunction with praise publicly rendered, but you are always faced with the possibility that God may not have been sufficiently concerned about the matter one way or another, to mention it. It is not always certain that heaven gets as worked up about some things as do mortals on earth.

Too, we dare never forget that what we have in the new covenant writings grew out of contemporary problems in the day when they were written. They are heaven's response to life events, and there may have been historical and cultural problems in the world of Ephesus and Colossae which made any statement about instrumental music irrelevant and immaterial. A lot of good brethren think this was the actual case. The point is that our final discovery of God's revealed purpose may not yet have been made. The last word on our understanding of this facet may not yet have been written. None of us know all there is to know about the matter, and that is probably why we differ.

Beyond the Commandment

Our brother next refers to the conference regarding circumcision which was held in Jerusalem. Certain disciples from Jerusalem had gone down to Antioch and taught the Gentile brethren that unless they were circumcised according to the custom of Moses they could not be saved. Paul and Barnabas challenged them and it was arranged for a deputation to visit the apostles and elders in Jerusalem and ascertain their feelings about the matter. It resolved in a decision of the apostles, elders and the entire congregation to send chosen men back with Paul and Barnabas to personally confirm a letter which was addressed to the Gentile saints in Antioch, Syria and Cilicia.

According to the King James Version, the letter began, “Forasmuch as we have heard that certain which went out from us have troubled you with words, subverting your souls, saying, Ye must be circumcised, and keep the law: to whom we gave no such commandment” (Acts 15:24). Our brother fastens upon this as one proof of his thesis on “the authority of God in areas of silence.” But the word for commandment is one which means “to set forth distinctly,” and then, “to enjoin, order or instruct.”

In this instance it simply means that those who went down to Antioch and stirred up the furor did so without a commission from the brethren in Jerusalem. If Brother Lemmons is not careful he will be establishing the authority of the church and we will then be in trouble with Rome. The New English Bible rendering is, “We have heard that some of our number, without any instructions from us, have disturbed you with their talk.” The Authentic New Testament reads, “Since it has come to our attention that some of our number, to whom we gave no such instructions, have been confusing you with their statements.”

Since our brother introduced the Jerusalem conference, let me ask why the Saint Louis conference did not follow the pattern set at Jerusalem? That conference ended in a compromise and thus avoided forming a “circumcision faction” and an “uncircumcision faction.” Unity was maintained in spite of some deep problems. It was agreed that Paul and Barnabas would go among the Gentiles and not advocate circumcision for them, while James, Peter and John would go to the Jews and insist upon their circumcising their children and keeping the customs of Moses (Acts 21:21). On this basis the right hand of fellowship was given.

Why did the brethren at Hilton Inn not give each other the right hand of fellowship, and agree to allow each congregation of saints to be free under God to approach him as they understood the divine requirement? Who gave the non-instrument brethren a “commandment” to disturb other communities of the saints, and unsettle their minds by teaching the brethren, “Unless you rid yourselves of your instruments according to the custom of Texas, you cannot be saved.” I make no more of an appeal for instrumental music than I would for circumcision. I do not advocate either one. I do not defend either one. But instrumental music is no more of a problem in our day than circumcision was in the primitive ekklesia of God. If our brethren want to go back to Jerusalem, why not adjust our problems as did the apostles and elders of that city?

If the brethren in apostolic times could live in fellowship with some congregations insisting upon circumcision for their constituency, and others taking an opposing stance, surely we can, for the sake of unity in the blood-bought body of the redeemed ones, live without fragmenting over such things as a congregational decision to accompany their singing with the strains of an organ.

Motives for Meeting

There is some indication that brethren are coming together to spar for a factional victory. They are not really seeking truth because they think they already have it. It is possible that continued association will cause them in the distant future to forsake their defensive posture which makes them regard one another as rivals and brotherly enemies. If they do they can then start listening honestly to one another. At present they are bandying around the same old slogans and arguments with which they have bombarded each other ineffectively for years.

It would be regrettable indeed if the non-instrument brethren approach the dialogue with a pontifical attitude as if they were the infallible interpreters of God's will and all the other brethren can do is to capitulate and bow to the ultimate and inevitable. It would be regrettable for the instrumental brethren to do this also, but I understand that they are not insisting that we see the matter as they do to be in the fellowship of the reconciled. They are not coming to the meetings to bind their practice upon others.

There is something about the "easy answer" attitude which has been bred in us by Church of Christism, which causes a lot of the brethren to feel that they are a superior breed and can look down from the brow of Olympus upon lesser mortals. This kind of tragic arrogance causes them sometimes to get up and go through childish "sermon outlines" in an attempt to vanquish others who may have a doctoral degree in Biblical study. While they earn and deserve the compassion of real scholars they occasionally congratulate themselves that they have won a victory simply because others choose to ignore them. Even a horsefly may think it has conquered a horse if the tolerant animal does not swat the pest in the first five minutes with a well-aimed switch of its tail.

Brother Lemmons agrees that the brethren have much in common and few differences. He is right in pleading for a sincere study of the word of God. All of us need that, and sincere study will lead us to see that God never did authorize division as a means of settling differences among brethren. It is condemned every time it is mentioned by the Spirit. But our brother is confused if he thinks that unity of the faith demands absolute agreement upon music, methods or the millennium, or on cups, classes or colleges. Thousands of good brethren are in the faith and are one in Christ Jesus, who disagree upon these and other matters. They will never agree upon all of them while this world stands!

Did not most of these brethren hold their present views when they embraced the faith at baptism? Did not the Father accept them into the faith as his children while they were holding such views? If God could welcome them into the family circle with their varied and mistaken views, on what ground can Brother Lemmons later reject them for the same views? Is anything more required of me to accept a man as my brother than is required of the Father to accept him as a child?

I deny that we have to face up to the necessity of locating all of our issues in either faith or opinion before we can be one. One man's faith is another man's opinion, by our definition. We can stop categorizing and pigeon-holing these things and make them merely matters of understanding and spiritual intellectual development. This will provide for brethren making any changes necessary with increasing knowledge. I refuse to think that we need to sort every issue into its proper little box before we can be one in Christ Jesus and start treating each other as brethren.

It is true if all come to agree that instrumental music is in either the realm of faith or opinion we will all be one on that issue. All of us agree we should unite on matters of faith. All of us agree we should not divide over opinions. At the present time Brother Lemmons holds the opinion that instrumental music is a matter of faith, while Brother Murch holds the opinion that it is a matter of opinion. They are obligated not to divide over their opinions, so they must work together until honest brethren finally decide whether it is a matter of faith or a matter of opinion.

Why does not the "much in common" have as great a power to hold us together as the "few differences" have to drive us apart? Are we guilty of the factional spirit so that a few differences mean more to our divisive hearts than the many mutual concerns? Are we victims of the Satanic will to divide? Why can we not at least work together up to the point of difference? Must we splinter the trunk of the tree because the topmost branches point in different directions?

Our brother is right in pointing out that we will not get out of our condition overnight. We will never get out of it unless we allow the Holy Spirit to crush the party spirit in our hearts. Our schism will be healed in many places. It will require a little more integrity and a little less fear of men, and we can labor together in many areas. At least one of the brethren invited by Brother Lemmons has already been speaking to Christian Church gatherings and recognizing those present as his brothers. And he sings while they are playing the instruments. I know because I was there.

If this brother had gotten up in Saint Louis and told the brethren that he was through making a silly test of fellowship out of the matter and would have advised them to follow suit, it would have jerked the magic carpet out from under the whole group. But it is probably best to let the brethren go through with their speeches, dreary as the experience may be, so they will be able to save face “down home.” We have played politics so long now in the Church of Christ that we would not want to quit abruptly and kill it with withdrawal symptoms. In any event, I know a whole lot of brethren in the Independent Churches who do not practice what they preach, and a whole lot of them in the Church of Christ who do not preach what they practice!

There is a difference between throwing a mantle of love over our brethren and sweeping our differences under the rug. Brother Lemmons wants to reject the brethren first and then discuss how we can get them back together. I propose to receive the brethren first and then seek to resolve our problems. Our fathers sinned when they divided over instrumental music, and I shall not be guilty of perpetuating the sins of the fathers. My brethren are more important to me than our issues. Jesus did not die for a particular position on instrumental music. He died for men! I do not propose to “destroy a brother for whom Christ died” by my views on any of our issues. Man was not made for music, but music was made for man!

About the Future

Brother Lemmons recommends more such invitational, semi-secret, closed-door sessions be held all over the country. While there are many undesirable features about such gatherings it is probable that it is about all that can be done by the participants in our present party-ridden, fear-driven state. Some of us have long since thrown off the yoke of factional bondage and moved on to more open encounters where no one is debarred and all are free men in Christ Jesus.

This prompts me to say that while I am glad the brethren are conversing together as they did at Saint Louis, it is possible that they are twenty years too late to have any real bearing on the restoration movement. The new generation, the restless ones, are no longer hooked on the issues discussed at Hilton Inn. They do not suffer from the hangups and neuroses which wreaked havoc on the restoration movement of the nineteenth century. The “real issues” do not concern whether a child of God can play a piano in a priestly structure on Sunday, or use Sunday School quarterlies in teaching a class.

The “real issues” which throb and pulsate through the incisive minds of the “jet set” in all of our camps have to do with denial of common human dignity to minority groups in our midst; the morality of war in the nuclear age when civilians are shot far behind the lines, maimed, blinded, and their intestines blasted out; the hypocrisy which builds huge temples made with hands in which to worship God, while people suffer from hunger and malnutrition a few blocks away; the blatant pretense of loving our Father while hating and despising his children.

Meetings like the one in Saint Louis will act as a purgative for the hostility which men nourished up inside by their years of partisan attack and debate, but whatever decision is reached will have a hollow ring. It will not be nearly so important as the principals would like to make it appear. It is as if Rip Van Winkle had aroused from twenty years of slumber to call a conference to discuss the implications of the British Stamp Act, or as if a few Roman Catholics and Lutherans met at a Holiday Inn to read papers dealing with the morality of eating meat on Friday.

History did not stop and wait for our brethren who “fell out by the way.” And history will not wait for them to catch up, even though they are now riding together in the same chariot, arguing and reading papers to one another as they come. We are in the Space Age and we face problems of such magnitude that they make our little internecine squabbles of the past appear like a dispute over which brand of paper cups to use in the meeting of the local Parent-Teacher Association.

If you have read this far, you are to be commended for your patience, but I crave a little more of your generosity while I again enunciate my personal position. I shall make nothing a test of fellowship which God has not made a condition of salvation. Whether my brethren use instruments of music or not, whether they are pre-millennial or post-millennial, they are my brothers. I will work with them, share with them and help them as they will allow. I will love them regardless of how they treat me. I will not return evil for evil if I know it.

All of those who gathered in Saint Louis are my brethren. Nothing they conclude about their issues will affect my regard for them. My faith will not be decided at the Hilton Inn. It was decided long ago by him for whom there was no room in the inn. “My hope is built on nothing less, than Jesus’ blood and righteousness.” Wherever my Father has a child, I have a brother. It is just that simple!

The Supreme Need

Mission Messenger (January 1970)

Volume 32

[Abstract]

“Oh, my dear children, I feel the pangs of childbirth all over again till Christ be formed within you” (Galatians 4:19).

The letter which Paul addressed to the Galatians differed a great deal from those addressed to any other community of saints. Here he was dealing with an impulsive and impetuous people, descendants of the headstrong and volatile Gauls from whom the country took its name.

J. B. Phillips transliterates and has him referring to “you dear idiots of Galatia” (3:1).

It seems quite possible that the apostle proclaimed the message to them rather accidentally to start with. He had not intended to stop in their territory but was waylaid by sickness. “You know how handicapped I was by illness when I first preached the gospel to you.” But the inhabitants received him with uninhibited hospitality. “You didn’t shrink from me or let yourselves be revolted at the disease which was such a trial for you. No, you welcomed me as though I were an angel of God, or even as though I were Christ Jesus himself.”

The message had its effect. They came “to know God, or rather are known by him.” They received the Spirit “by believing the message of the gospel.” But something went wrong.

The apostle wrote, “there are obviously men who are upsetting your faith with a travesty of the gospel of Christ.” The gospel sets up faith in hearers, a false message upsets faith in them. The Galatians began “reverting to outward observances.” They began to go back “to dead and sterile principles and consent to be under their power all over again.” Paul said, “Your religion is beginning to be a matter of observing certain days or months or seasons or years.”

Sometimes I think that some of us miss the very essence of the Galatian letter. It stands as a constant reminder that men may be formed in Christ without Christ ever being formed in them. The apostle had travailed in their initial hearing of his message and had been rewarded by seeing them delivered into the sonship of the family of God. “For now that you have faith in Christ Jesus you are all sons of God. All of you who were baptized into Christ have put on the family likeness of Christ.” But it was now necessary that he feel the pangs of childbirth all over again “till Christ be formed in you.”

What thwarted the growth of Christ within? The answer is plain. “Surely you can’t be so idiotic as to think that a man begins his spiritual life in the Spirit and then completes it by reverting to outward observances” (Gal. 3:3). Christ begins to be formed in us by the Spirit, and when we begin to trust in legalistic performances as the basis of our justification, we stifle the Spirit and thwart the further development of the transformed life.

The image of Christ can only grow in an atmosphere of freedom, and this freedom is a product of grace. “If you try to be justified by the Law you automatically cut yourself off from the power of Christ, you put yourself outside the range of his grace.” When we cease to trust in grace we create a short circuit. We throw the breaker switch, and we are automatically cut off from the transforming power.

The recommendation of Paul is to, “plant your feet firmly therefore within the freedom that Christ has won for us, and do not let yourselves be caught again in the shackles of slavery.” All of us have seen men who heard the gospel, were baptized and came into the community of believers, but whose lives “were bound in shallows and in miseries.” Arrogant, bigoted, and self-righteous, they trusted in their own goodness but made life intolerable for those around them.

Such persons are often meticulous about outward observances and may truthfully boast they have not missed a midweek meeting in years. Sometimes they may have a head full of scripture but a heart empty of Christ. They brag about how they have put sectarians to rout without realizing that their very bragging is indicative of a raw sectarian spirit.

It is only through complete surrender and utter abandonment of self to the Spirit that one can free himself from the flesh, that state of alienation from God where law reigns and one is under its dominion. Paul wrote, “For the whole energy of the lower nature is set against the Spirit, while the whole power of the Spirit is contrary to the lower nature. Here is the conflict, and that is why you are not free to do what you want to do. But if you follow the leading of the Spirit, you stand clear of the Law.” Do you accept that last sentence? Read it again slowly, emphasizing every word and see if you really acknowledge it without reservation.

Nothing is more important to our inner peace and serenity than having Christ formed in us. It is this which will give us a sense of community, for as Suzanne de Dietrich has said, “Real community is not a matter of feelings. It grows out of a common call and a common goal.” It is this also which will make us leaven in a world which needs reconciliation more than any other thing in this universe.

According to the Pattern

Mission Messenger (February 1970)

Volume 32

I never met the man of whom I write but he was a graduate of one of the Christian colleges before the turn of the century. He was a diligent student of the Bible and a devoted disciple of the Master. It was his desire to follow in the path of righteousness and to do all things pleasing unto God. As he read the sacred pages he became aware of the fact that the primitive saints constituted “a church of the upper room.” Jesus ordained the Lord’s Supper in “a large upper room furnished and prepared.” After the ascension of Jesus the apostles and others abode in an upper room. In Troas the saints were gathered together “in the upper chamber.” The brother to whom I refer constructed a two story building and during his lifetime the congregation met to break bread upstairs. This was deemed essential in order to “do all things according to the pattern.”

I personally knew the sister to whom I now refer. She was a humble saint but possessed of strong convictions. She was a member of the congregation I attended as a mere lad. It was our custom to do our baptizing in a clear pool of a small stream that flowed through a pasture owned by one of the elders. It was a lovely spot shaded by the overhanging boughs of a large tree, although it was inconvenient in the winter when icy winds swept across the fields and chilled the observers. But when the brethren decided to construct a baptistery under the pulpit there were objections raised at once. The aged sister was more adamant than any of the others. I can recall her saying, “There’s just as much scripture for an organ on top of the pulpit as for one of them things under it. The day they put it in they can put me out. There’s no pattern for it. The Lord was baptized in a river and I don’t want to see anyone baptized in a box.”

A number of years ago my father went to speak for a congregation on the Lord’s Day. By enquiring in advance he learned that he would speak following the Lord’s Supper. Imagine his surprise when the congregation stood following the Supper, and while singing a hymn, all marched out of the building. Thinking he had misunderstood the arrangement, Father got his hat and book and started out, only to meet them all coming back in. They informed him that they followed the divine pattern for the Book teaches that “when they had sung a hymn, they went out.” Father did not have the nerve to tell them that the record said, “they went out into the mount of Olives.”

In 1836, Francis Whitefield Emmons, a respected contemporary of Alexander Campbell, took the position that Acts 2:42 contained a divinely ordained order of worship and that to be scriptural a congregation must observe the sequence therein set forth for its “items of worship.” Both Campbell and Robert Richardson took issue with Emmons, denying that “this order should be considered as of divine order.” Sixty years later the controversy was revived by publication of a tract on December 1, 1897, under the heading, “The Worship.” So heated did the discussion become that one participant wrote, “That there has been haste on both sides of this unholy war is not a question. This is to be regretted and repented of. Unfair methods have been employed. Men, regardless of character have been justified; and men, without regard to character, convictions or conscience, have been condemned.” He ended with a challenge to debate.

A short time later another furore was created when a well known brother reached the conclusion it was wrong to eat the Lord's Supper "at dinner time." He presented the case for partaking of the loaf and fruit of the vine after dark, and continued, "History shows it was kept at night in the first centuries and never in daylight." He said, "I think you will conclude with me that the evidence for the Supper at night is as clear as for the first day of the week. Those who contend for a restoration of New Testament Christianity will not ignore the argument for long without drifting to the common ground of indifference to the whole matter. It comes with poor grace to contend for loyalty to one example, and ignore the other. But Paul says, 'Ye have us for an ensample.' Phil. 3:17."

Recently I have had letters from two sisters in Texas who tell me that they are worshiping with those who had to leave "the daylight worshipers" in order to follow the apostolic pattern. They have pleaded with me to direct my energies toward fighting the spiritual decadence evidenced by partaking of the Lord's Supper in the daytime. I am asked to insist that everyone "come out from among them and be separate."

On a trip to the east I learned of two small groups of brethren in the mountain regions who have declared a state of non-fellowship with the congregations around them that do not practice "washing of feet" as a proof of loyalty to the commands of Jesus. It is their contention that nothing is plainer than the statement of the Lord, "For I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you" (John 13:15).

When brethren began to become conscious of microbes and germs and the emphasis upon hygiene caused laws to be passed to abolish the common drinking cup at schools and on trains, there arose a tendency to adopt an "individual communion service." This launched a struggle which has not ceased to our day. Many places which had always used two or three glasses took up the cudgel against individual cups. As usual, both sides quoted those who had previously been recognized as heroes of the faith and claimed them as favorable to their positions. Debates have been held in many places with a constant emphasis on the divergent views, one side contending that we must have one container “according to the pattern,” with the other just as vociferously affirming that the cup of which Jesus spoke is “the fruit of the vine.”

In an endeavor to be even more literal there are two congregations of our acquaintance which will not use a glass or goblet at all but insist upon using a cup. In the community about them they are designated as the “One Cup With a Handle Church of Christ.” They seem to appreciate rather than resent this as it serves as a means of distinction from those whom they regard as “liberals” or “glass digressives.” It is not at all uncommon for adherents of the several groups to call each other “one-cuppers” or “cups churches.” It is a strange, and almost ludicrous commentary on our condition to read in some reports of “cups preachers.”

In several areas small groups have reached the conclusion that “the pattern” calls for fermented wine in the Lord’s Supper. They have severed themselves from what they term “the grape juice churches” and claim no “fellowship” with them. Others have divided over a method of breaking the bread, with certain ones insisting that the one who presides at the table must first break a bit from the loaf and eat, then pass it to the other communicants and allow each to break off a portion in turn.

A special field of literature including magazine articles, tracts, booklets, and printed debates, has grown up around what is called “the Sunday School question.” The right to teach in classes has been challenged and discussed with intensity, and even with resultant partisan bitterness in many places. The Sunday school has been labeled, “a missionary society for the children which differs no whit from the organized missionary organizations for the grown ups.” Those who have classes have been dared to find a precedent for their practice in “the pattern.”

In recent years a question has been raised about the scripturality of congregations contributing their funds to a congregational treasury remote from them for the purpose of propagandizing by national television and radio programs. The problem of institutionalism has reared its head again as it often has through the years, but this time in relation to charitable organizations. The non-instrument segment of the disciple brotherhood has been fractured into three fragments— called “liberals,” “antis,” and “middle-of-the-roaders.” In these areas the feeling has been so deep that divisions have occurred and those who met in the same building a few years ago have set up rival encampments from which to assail each other.

What shall I more say? Time would fail me to tell of all the other ideas which have splintered and shivered the heirs of the restoration movement through the years. The things of which I have written are but a small minority of those which have been documented as having caused schisms among the brethren. I think that it is time that we should study objectively the underlying causes and basic reasons why our brethren divide periodically. Why should a movement which began as “a project to unite the Christians in all sects” end up as the most bitter and strife-torn in our generation? Is it possible for a people who have spent their time in unmitigated attacks upon others to turn the searchlight upon themselves and explore the philosophy which has wrecked their influence in many communities? Certainly it is dangerous for one who attempts it, for those who have been conditioned to regard themselves as “the elect of God” and to treat all others as “heathens and publicans” will bitterly resent any implication that they are as guilty as those whom they have accused.

THE TRUE RADICAL

I can no longer be content to continue in a factional program and insulate my heart from some of the real elemental problems which make us behave as we do. I regard those things over which we have divided, and even the divisions themselves, as mere symptoms of a deep underlying fallacy in our thinking. It has betrayed us into bitter strife in the past and will lead us into such civil wars in the future as will decimate us and render invalid any plea that we make to the religious world at large. In short, it will make of us a bitter and bigoted sect with “our hand against every man and every man’s hand against us.”

Unfortunately, certain concepts become entrenched in the thinking of a people and are eventually sanctified by the passing of time. To attack the traditions of a group is regarded as equivalent to an attack upon the word of God. We cannot deny that the interpretation of scripture is substituted for the scripture and becomes the real criterion. We have seen this demonstrated too often in the sectarian creeds of those about us. “Our way of looking at it” is equated with God’s message and one must be bold indeed to fling down the gauntlet in the face of ingrained position and practice.

Men are not too concerned with critical investigation provided that it is not radical. So long as it consists of lopping off twigs and snipping away at small under-growth, they will debate and skirmish without being particularly perturbed. But the word “radical” is from a term meaning “root.” That is why we call a certain root vegetable a “radish.” Jesus was a radical. He got to the very root of life and sin and so he was crucified. Most real radicals must be removed because men cannot stand what they reveal. You “dig up things” when you get to the root of them. Few people want to be really disturbed. In the final analysis, it has been the radicals who have always been responsible for our progress.

I know why I am writing this way. It is because I realize that I will be branded an extremist. In our parlance an extremist is always one who opposes any position we hold. One who opposes instrumental music is regarded as an extremist by one who employs it; one who opposes classes is an extremist to the one who has them; one who opposes individual cups is an extremist to the one who uses them. We are all extremists as viewed by someone. It does not hurt me to be labeled an extremist for this is a term of universal application. I have learned that the word is never applied to oneself. It is always reserved for application to others. It is obvious, then, that one is not an extremist because of where he stands in his views, but because of where others stand as they view him.

There is a difference between an extremist and a radical. The former has to do with the horizontal, the latter with the vertical. One is an extremist because he stands to the right or left of us but a radical may cut the ground right out from under us. If we are to the right or left of Jesus, one may be to the right or left of us and be closer to Jesus than we are. Or he may be farther from Jesus. The whole point I am making is that there may be nothing seriously wrong with being called an extremist or radical. There may be something seriously right about the one so designated. I will have one thing in my favor in this current investigation because I will not be examining the position of one faction as opposed to another. Instead, I will be probing the question of what has created all of our factions.

I am sure that opinion will be divided as to the worth of what we write. There will be some in every faction who will hail what we say as true, others in every faction will regard it as the greatest threat of our day, while the majority will continue in complacency and unconcern. They are not moved by what Jesus said so there is little hope they will become aroused by what I say. I am personally convinced that a lot of us would be perfectly content to pursue our factious course and engage in occasional tilts and tussles with brethren provided no one ever really reflected against "The Church of Christ" as such.

We can permit a contest over colleges or a contention over classes and the din of battle dies away, but when someone challenges our standing as a people, or implies that we may be sectarian, that is going too far. We do not mind the members of the family having a tug of war provided no one reflects on the family honor. Some of the things with which I shall deal may get beneath the surface. Perhaps it is time that we rise above banalities and superficial examination. We are where our thinking has brought us and it has brought us division and schism. This is where God does not want us to be. I suggest it is about time to change our thinking. In order to proceed with as little misunderstanding as possible let me make some points at this juncture.

VIEWING THE PATTERN

1. I have a very deep reverence for all of the brethren in every faction growing out of the restoration movement. I do not think that those who disagree with me are dishonest. I do not regard as sectarians those who have things I cannot endorse, nor do I regard as hobbyists those who cannot, in good conscience, endorse things I have. They are all my brethren for whom Christ died. I do not look with disdain upon some nor with obsequiousness upon others. Those who choose not to have classes or cups and those who choose to have colleges and instrumental music are alike my brethren. They are accountable unto God and not unto me. There is no compunction about moving among any of them because I love them all— not because of what they have or do not have, but because they are children of my Father.

2. All of us are victims of a heritage of division which has given us certain traditional backgrounds of a partisan nature. I am aware that there are those in orthodox “Churches of Christ” who deny that there is any division. They constitute the elect of God and all others are separated from them. They have “arrived” while everyone else has “departed.” Of all our various groups, these deserve the greatest pity and compassion. It is the person who is sick and does not know it, the one who is seriously ill while he thinks he is well, who deserves our commiseration. In many places the faction which puts on the biggest front has the least behind it and arrogant exclusiveness is merely a cloak for an empty spiritual shell. No faction is “the faithful church,” no segment or splinter constitutes “the loyal body.”

3. One of us is not divided from the other. We are separated from one another. No group is completely guilty nor wholly guiltless. Those who project all of the guilt to others have the least to commend them in the sight of God and their fellows. We are divided because of a philosophy which confuses division with fidelity to God. Each party feels that the thing it elevates as a test of fellowship is vital and essential to relationship with God through the Holy Spirit. Brotherhood is thus conditioned upon an attitude toward cups, classes, colleges, or other things. It is not knowing Christ but “the right stand” on these issues upon which one must rise or fall with the party.

4. No faction among us can be wholly discounted. The smallest group may have something of value to contribute to others. Each has emphasized a different area of thought and has specialized in a certain field. Not all that any faction does is completely wrong. The factional spirit is a sin but that which it seeks to exploit may be right. None of us should become so arrogant or spiritually sophisticated that we cannot listen attentively to any of our brethren. “Setting at nought a brother” is a dangerous procedure.

5. I think we may concede that all of our divisions have resulted from a proper desire. All of the brethren have sought to do what they earnestly believed would meet God’s approval and avoid His chastisement. Those who oppose individual cups believe they are contrary to the pattern; those who oppose classes believe they are contrary to the pattern. The same thing can be said of those who oppose colleges, institutional homes, societies and instrumental music. The opposition does not stem from a desire to be reckoned cranky or cantankerous but from a fear of violating a divinely ordained pattern. All who practice or endorse things believe they are justified by a proper interpretation of the pattern; all who oppose them believe just as firmly that they are forbidden by the pattern.

It is evident that we have disagreed so violently over the pattern that we have fragmented ourselves into warring tribes and clashing clans. Yet the word of God reads identically the same to everyone of us and all are equal in their anxiety to understand and obey it. It is not enough for one party to say that all that is necessary is to take the word of God for what it says. That is precisely what each party feels it is doing now. The party that makes such a statement simply implies that everyone should take the word of God for what that particular party thinks it means by what it says. Each party feels that it has an infallible interpretation and those who do not concur with the party exegesis do not understand the Bible at all. They misunderstand it. This is a simple and naive approach. It merely begs the question, it does not solve the problem.

For example, take the question about the container for the fruit of the vine in the Lord's Supper. So long as one ardently believes that the cup is the pattern and another believes that the "fruit of the vine" is the cup about which Jesus speaks, there will be contention. So long as this is esteemed vital to walking in the Spirit there will be division. Which is in accordance with the pattern— one container, multiple cups, or both? Would it shock you too greatly if I came directly to the point and suggested that perhaps God gave us no pattern at all in the commonly accepted usage of the term by the various factions calling themselves "The Church of Christ."

If Jesus ordained a Supper instead of a pattern, one might partake of it in memory of Him without regard to minute details, and there could well be several different ways of handling the details by consecrated disciples who could "proclaim the Lord's death until he comes.” To bind a method as the pattern when no pattern was intended would be fallacious, and might become sinful. We are not divided over the Lord’s Supper, but over “the pattern.” We are not divided over teaching the Bible, but over the pattern. We are not divided over caring for the needy but over the pattern. In every instance the basis of division is “the pattern.”

Regardless of how we view the various items which divide us, all of us without exception will acknowledge that division among brethren is a sin of grave consequence. All admit that the purpose of God’s revelation was to unite us and to create harmony where division previously existed. It is evident that any use of God’s word for the purpose of creating or justifying division among humble and earnest saints is an abuse and misuse. Nothing has been more productive of dissension among us than the concept that God intended to provide for us a specific pattern complete in minute detail and that this pattern constitutes an inviolable law for His children in all ages, climes, and conditions. It would seem that the attempt to establish the new covenant scriptures as a legalistic blueprint or temple with every insignificant and incidental matter spelled out has resulted in an overthrow of God’s purpose.

To merely suggest that the new covenant scriptures may not have been intended for such a positive pattern will bring down upon the head of the one doing so a storm of acrimony and resentment. He will be denounced, proscribed and anathematized. The fear of being harried and harassed through brotherhood journals acts as a constant deterrent to the exploration of new areas of thought. In spite of this, I am urging that the whole “pattern concept” which makes of the apostolic letters mere legalistic documents be examined calmly and dispassionately. This is not an adoption of liberalistic philosophy. It represents no renunciation of the faith upon my part. It is merely a suggestion, made in all humility, that, in the light of present knowledge and available information, we measure up to our responsibility in our generation by examining the ground for our spiritual procedure.

It is an admitted fact that every faction among us rejects as being a part of the pattern that which every other faction accepts as an essential part of it. The brethren who use individual cups reject the idea that there is a specific pattern for one container; those who employ classes reject the idea that there is a specific pattern for teaching methods. The same holds true for those who set up chartered institutions to care for the needy, as well as for those who employ instrumental music. Every detail which means so much to some is lightly esteemed by others in the brotherhood of saints so that a compilation of composite views would show that if these views were universally adopted as a criterion there would be no detailed pattern at all. Yet to suggest this will bring indignant response from every segment. This indicates that the pattern in each instance is the partisan interpretation and this is equated with the will of God. This is creedalism in its worst form!

It is obvious that the person who does not believe there is a technical specification for each requirement of God can worship with his brethren regardless of how they carry out the requirement, so long as it is not in violation of good order and decorum. The reverse is not true. One who has no qualms about instrumental music can enjoy a service where the praise is rendered a capella. The same is true of one who believes it is proper to have classes and individual cups. The man who has no scruples about the state of the fruit of the vine can drink in fellowship with his brethren wherever he may be, whether they use fermented or unfermented fruit of the vine. If it be true that God did not design to give us an exclusive pattern, those who interpret the sacred writings as such, do themselves and other brethren an injustice. Despite their good intentions and zeal they run counter to God's purpose by binding laws in areas where he intended for us to be free. Let me be candid enough to say at this point that I believe every faction among us is guilty of this very thing in its relation to other factions. I will go one step further and say that it is my conviction that “The Church of Christ” has done the same thing in relation to other segments of our religious world. While this will be hailed as treason we can never recapture a real sense of destiny until we face up to the stark truth about ourselves.

We are prone to look with disdain and condescension upon the scruples of others. Those who contend for them are agitators and busybodies. When we do the same thing we are “contending for the faith.” Recently a congregation in Iowa engaged in a prolonged and somewhat heated business meeting engendered by a preacher who protested against “taking up the collection” before partaking of the Lord’s Supper. The congregation had inherited a tradition stemming from the “order of worship” controversy in which “the fellowship” in Acts 2:42 was regarded as the contribution, and thus was attended to before the breaking of the bread. The preacher referred to insisted that they were violating the pattern because Paul gave instruction for observing the Supper in chapter 11 of First Corinthians, whereas he did not give orders for the collection until chapter 16. I mentioned this to a brother of my acquaintance who laughed in high glee at such naivete. The very next Lord’s Day he was in high dudgeon because the brother who presided began the service with meditation and prayer rather than with a song. It all depends upon “whose ox is gored.”

I would like to believe that all of my brethren are sufficiently mature to face up to some questions which will help us to scrutinize our philosophy and practice openly and fearlessly. I suspect that it is too much to count upon this but I do believe that we live in an era when a sufficient number are beginning to think independently that we can suggest some matters for concern and study. I have no desire to arouse additional bitterness nor to increase areas of tension. I would like to relieve these if possible. However, I cannot make myself think that we better ourselves in the ultimate by ignoring truth as we go along. For that reason I crave your kind indulgence while I propose a series of questions which may serve as guide lines for exploration in subsequent articles. A careful study of these will enable you to properly evaluate what we shall say in the immediate future.

1. In the fulfillment of any responsibility there are things essential and others which are purely incidental or accidental. The former are inherent and grow out of the nature of that which is to be accomplished; the latter are adherent and provide a setting in which, or a means by which, the thing may be furthered. This is a principle so universally recognized that any attempt to elucidate it would be superfluous. Was this true of the things which Jesus performed and of the principles he enunciated? If so, how can we determine that which is essential and that which is incidental? That this demands the exercise of judgment and requires an application of the faculty of discretion and the powers of discrimination must certainly be plain to all. Whose judgment must prevail and who is to be the final arbiter unto whom all must submit?

2. Every teacher, in spite of his grasp of truth, lives among a people who are products of their own environment. Unless he becomes a hermit and retires to solitary exclusion, he must face up to practical problems growing out of the circumstances of his day. His teaching is affected by, and must directly affect, the culture in which he lives and labors. I doubt not that Jesus of Nazareth was the Son of God and a universal Savior, but he was instructing a provincial and parochial people in a land which constituted an occupied territory. Is it possible that some of his statements were directly relating to conditions then obtaining and have relevance only under such conditions? I am fully aware of the fact that principles may be enunciated which are applicable under all circumstances and I am certain beyond question that our Lord gave such ecumenical truths.

But is it possible that Jesus, while in the flesh, recognized and followed the customs of his day and time, without intention to bind these upon all men in all ages, or without expecting conformity in these respects? If so, what is universal and exhaustive and what was temporary and localized? What will be our standard for differentiation and whose mind will apply the measure? Admittedly this is no problem to those in an authoritarian and monolithic structure. My friends who are Roman Catholics are not at all disturbed by the problem but neither are they free men in Christ. Who is to determine such things for free men and if they surrender the right for someone else to do so, are they still free?

3. In view of the fact that the apostolic epistles were written to meet situations arising in congregations of their day and would probably not have been written at all if such conditions had not obtained, to what extent did these epistles urge conformity to customs and modes which are no longer acknowledged and recognized? I am sure that everyone of our readers would regard some of what is written as being within such a category and while there would no doubt be disagreement as to what should be included and what should be excluded it would be admitted by all that certain portions of the apostolic coverage would have to be relegated to this sphere. Who is to rule as to what matter was purely contemporary and what was to continue? By what standard can we reject the command to “greet one another with a holy kiss” or substitute for it a different and more modern form of salutation? On what ground can we dispense with the Agape (love feast) which was practiced by the primitive saints with regularity?

4. The apostle Paul specifically wrote of the new covenant that it was “not in a written code but in the Spirit; for the written code kills, but the Spirit gives life” (2 Cor. 3:6). When we regard the new covenant scriptures as a pattern in the absolute, do we not convert them into a written code? Have we not regarded these scriptures as a legalistic basis of justification? I am not questioning the inspiration or authority of the sacred scriptures. I believe in both. I believe the apostolic writings have the authority of God behind them, but if we have used them as God intended, why are we divided contrary to the word of God? Have we changed the scriptures into something they were never intended to be? Could Paul become all things to all men, that he might by all means save some, if he was operating under an inflexible set of rules as unalterable as the law of the Medes and Persians?

To state it in slightly different fashion— is every word spoken by authority of equal importance? Are there “weightier matters of the law” if so, what makes them weigh heavier? Granted that there are some absolutes in God’s revelation, does it follow that everything is in that domain? What is central to the Christian way and what is on the fringe or border? What things must be understood to be a Christian and what things may be misunderstood without severing or impairing the relationship? Are the latter the same with every individual?

In the physical realm some members of the body are essential to being and some to wellbeing. God created the little finger as well as the head, but if you cut off the latter you will die. This is not true of cutting off a finger. Can the same distinction be made with reference to the body of revealed truth? Surely all that God has said is valuable but is all of equal value in our Christian life? Is it possible to fight over certain things which are not worth the effort? Can we exalt some things to a position of prominence they do not deserve? One would not willingly dispense with anything that has been written any more than he would cheerfully cut off his finger, but if there is a serious question about interpretation should not the salvation of the other man be given prior consideration? Should we not incline to that interpretation which would achieve and maintain unity seeing that this was one of the prime purposes for writing the new covenant scriptures?

There may be more than one method of doing the right thing. In a simple operation such as gaining entrance to a box tied with a string, one man may labor patiently to untie the knot, another will cut the string with a knife, while a third will slip it around the edge or corner of the box. That which is effective for one may be ineffective for the other, but there is nothing wrong about either way. In many instances it appears that God has not specified the means of accomplishing an objective. He has left it to us to decide the manner best adapted to our individual ability and temperament. We are not free to set up such a method as an absolute and demand that all others work on this basis or be lost, nor should others legislate for us where God has not done so.

It is difficult for most of us to realize that we are not under a legalistic code. The record declares, "For the law was given through Moses; grace and truth came by Jesus Christ" (John 1:17). The contrast is not between two laws. It does not say that the law came by Moses and another law came by Jesus Christ. The law is contrasted with grace and truth. Perhaps the contrast is nowhere else seen as clearly as in Hebrews 10:28, 29, "A man who has violated the law of Moses dies without mercy at the testimony of two or three witnesses. How much worse punishment do you think will be deserved by the man who has spurned the Son of God, and profaned the blood of the covenant by which he was sanctified, and outraged the Spirit of grace?" On one hand you have as the greatest crime the violation of law; on the other hand is the spurning of the Son, profaning the blood and outraging the Spirit of grace.

It is characteristic of Pharisaism to "bind heavy burdens, hard to bear, and lay them on men's shoulders" (Matt. 23:4). This is the spirit of partisan righteousness. In the primitive church "some believers who belonged to the party of the Pharisees rose up, and said, 'It is necessary to circumcise them, and to charge them to keep the law of Moses.'" Peter asked them a pertinent question, "Why do you make a trial of God by putting a yoke upon the neck of the disciples which neither our fathers nor we have been able to bear?” Was he talking about the written code with its meticulous observances of rituals and forms? Is it not significant that the apostles, elders and whole church at Jerusalem, wrote to those who were being subjected to legalism, “It has seemed good to the Holy Spirit and to us to lay upon you no greater burden than these necessary things” (Acts 15:28). The necessary things did not include circumcision or legalism. How many things are really necessary according to the Holy Spirit and the apostles? How many things are simply laid as burdens upon men to “hold them in line?”

The Roman Catholic hierarchy makes no apology for binding certain things simply as authoritative and disciplinary measures. They do not profess to find scriptural authority for commanding to abstain from meats on Friday. This is a law of the church and not of God. It is accompanied by threats which are effective only because of the hold that the church has over its communicants. Are there any forms or requirements in traditional “Church of Christ” practice designed for the same purpose? It is one thing to perform an act voluntarily, willingly and spontaneously, and doing the same thing under threat of reprisal and to avoid public castigation.

I think it would not be quite honest with our readers if I did not tell you that it is my conviction that the system which constitutes Church-of-Christ-ism is the result of a degeneration of noble restoration principles into a narrow and sectarian framework. For this reason the haughty and arrogant back-patting done by some of the larger factions does not affect me for this is a clear demonstration of the truth of my claims. The self-righteous criticism of the smaller groups by these larger ones, and their utter denial that there are Christians outside the restoration movement background— these do not betoken that the spokesmen for “the loyal church” have a better vision of truth. It only means they are in a worse state of blindness as to their own condition.

Those who think they have arrived and are therefore in a favored position from whence they can summon all others to come and take their stand, have a great deal yet to learn. It will help them to begin their spiritual education if they will realize that “the pattern” which they insist on imposing upon all others may be a compilation of explanations and interpretations handed down by men whom they would not allow to speak in their pulpits nor call upon to lead in prayer. We still garnish the tombs of prophets whom we would stone if they lived among us. The pattern in most cases is the partisan interpretation, and just as each faction among us has built up its own exclusive body of beliefs in a mistaken view that its foundation is divine, so “The Church of Christ” in its relation to other sincere seekers after truth may have done the same.

It is this kind of writing which will be called treason. I do not want to unduly upset my brethren nor to cause them concern. I wish that I knew of a more diplomatic approach. I would gladly spare all of those whom I love from exposure to any apparent crudity in expression. But the truth must be known and “I am weary from holding in.” Regardless of personal attacks which I may incur I cannot live with my own conscience if I do not decry the spirit of sectarian exclusiveness which is rampant in many areas of the disciple brotherhood.

Let me mention again that inter-factional squabbling and criticism will be condoned. So long as one equates the elect of God as those within the confines of the non-instrumental “Church of Christ” and denies that all outside of its bounds are children of the Father, he can be tolerated. But what we are doing is challenging Church-of-Christ-ism as a modern system. This challenge cuts across all lines and falls with equal force upon all segments of the disciple brotherhood, instrumental and non-instrumental alike. In short, we are doing the same thing with all of the factions growing out of the restoration movement that Alexander Campbell did to all of the Protestant sects growing out of the Reformation movement, and we are doing it for the same reason.

We believe that in a century and a half we have, as a people, compiled a body of interpretations which we have made into an unwritten creed. We believe that variations and modifications of this have produced our divergent factions. The composite views create an affinity which enables us to regard all of these factions as constituting "The Church of Christ" and this body of believers regards all other believers exactly as each faction within it regards all the other factions within it, as respects fellowship. We have concocted a basis of fellowship which we project into the sacred scriptures and refer to as "the pattern." In each instance the pattern is actually the party position and honest men who cannot in good conscience subscribe to it in every minute detail are labeled as heretics and apostates.

While our natural inclinations would deter us from writing thus, our love for the truth prompts us to pursue the crusade for a brighter day based upon better understanding of the word of God and the motivation of all who seek to do His will. We are expendable. What happens to us personally is of little consequence. We are content to await the verdict of time and the final judgment of the Prince of peace. We submit ourselves wholly and completely into His care and surrender unreservedly to His will and purpose. It is in that spirit we write with love for all, including those who disagree. None of our brethren need accept what we write to be loved and revered as children of the Father. We can only hope and trust that what we write will be sufficiently provocative to stimulate a greater study that we might come to really know Him who is the source of all Reality.

If God wills I shall, in our following issues, examine some of the questions raised in this one. It will be my intention to give special attention to the statement, "See that ye do all things according to the pattern showed you in the mount." I shall expect to demonstrate that this is one of the most abused passages of the sacred writ, that men have ignored its contextual setting and purpose, and have used it to effect the very opposite of what God intended. I shall deal with the psychological problem of why men convert grace into law and with the equally important question of how we can have freedom without having anarchy. I can promise you that the coming months will provide the most challenging approach to the Christian concept in our generation. It is our hope that you may continue to read and think with us.

Our Personal Pattern

Mission Messenger (March 1970)

Volume 32

[Abstract]

We are attempting an unbiased investigation of the underlying cause for division among the heirs of the restoration movement. Our aim is not to uphold any faction as opposed to others nor to defend any party as “the loyal church.” We have no partisan axe to grind. We are simply trying to face up realistically to one of the gravest problems in our religious life, that of division in the ranks of the believers in Christ Jesus. In our previous issue we proposed a number of questions. We are convinced that they are germane and pertinent to our aim and announced purpose. We intend to pursue them with the intent of arriving at a correct solution.

There is a difference between what we are attempting and the course generally pursued in inter-factional discussions and debates. In these the purpose is to determine which faction conforms to scriptural procedure and precedent with reference to some specific point of difference. Regardless of who wins such forensic skirmishes the factions will still continue to exist and they will still be factions. Our accepted task is much more profound than this. It is to find out what basic philosophy gives rise to factionalism and sustains and nourishes it. Although we are concerned about the things over which our brethren fall out we are primarily interested in why they do not fall in and march together as a united army.

Unless we succeed in finding and isolating the germ or virus which produces division we will continue to fracture and fragmentize ourselves. The treatment of symptoms is not enough. If we debate every currently divisive issue into oblivion our children will find others over which to divide. We must make a radical departure from our previous methods and explore on a deeper level than ever before. We have been too shallow and superficial in the past. It is obvious that we must also be prepared for a shock because what we find may run counter to our every tradition. It may actually frighten us by some of its implications.

Each faction justifies its separate existence on the basis that its procedures in work and worship are true to “the pattern.” Each accuses the others of having forsaken “the pattern.” It is taken for granted by all that the new covenant scriptures constitute a detailed blueprint designed to meet every exigency and provide for every emergency and that loyalty to Christ consists in seeking out these details and binding oneself by them and binding them upon others. Every faction claims to follow the pattern while denying that the others are doing so. None plead guilty to violating it. All are willing to affirm that they, and they only, are identical in every particular with the original.

It will readily be seen that if anyone suggests there is no such legalistic pattern he will draw the wrath of all. Those who cannot work together in pursuance of “the pattern” would all unite their forces in joint attack upon such an intruder. There are two things the brethren cannot tolerate. One is to deny there is a pattern; the other to affirm that anyone else is following it. We are willing to brook the disfavor of all and suggest that it was never the revealed intention of God to provide for us a meticulous bill of specifications covering every facet of procedure and the attempt to convert the new covenant scriptures into such a code of particulars has warped and thwarted the divine purpose.

Let us get one point clear at the outset. We believe the apostolic letters contain a revelation of the will of God. We believe their message is a transmission of the Holy Spirit. We neither doubt nor question the authenticity or genuineness of these writings. To us they are the sacred scriptures as opposed to all other writings of men. It is essential that we understand this because in the eyes of many, to question the use they make of the scriptures, is to question their divine origin. We affirm that the scriptures are divine with the same boldness that we deny that the application of them as made by our brethren is inspired. In short, we believe in the infallibility of God's revelation but we do not believe in the infallibility of any human interpretation.

It follows, then, that what we write is not infallible. To this we would be the first to agree. Therefore, what we write is not offered in a dogmatic or arbitrary sense. The word of God, and not MISSION MESSENGER, should be our court of appeal. As we explore some of our cherished traditions, and even explode them, we are not doing so in an authoritarian sense. While we exercise our freedom we shall in no sense exorcise yours. We respect your right to differ and to doubt what we say. We encourage you to place your trust in God and His word and not replace it with confidence in men. We shall not be guilty of undermining the faith of others nor of surrendering our own. Neither will we be reluctant or hesitant about a candid examination of all we have accepted as truth. Truth has naught to fear from the searchlight of investigation.

AN IMPORTANT QUOTATION

We begin with a study of a basic quotation as found in Hebrews 8:5, "See to it that you make everything according to the pattern shown you on the mountain." It is generally assumed that these words spoken to Moses with reference to the tabernacle in the wilderness are applicable to us and that the new covenant scriptures sustain the same relationship to us as did the law of Moses to the children of Israel. We believe that such an exegesis is not only faulty but is the exact opposite of the meaning which the writer of Hebrews intended to convey. Since this is so fundamental we ask your kind indulgence while we make a careful study of the impact of the meaning ordinarily attached to these words. In order to make our statements clearer we shall number them.

1. A pattern or blueprint is needed only by a builder or construction agent. Moses was commissioned to build the tabernacle and no such a structure had ever before been seen. It was necessary for him to have a pattern to follow. God gave no man a pattern for building the true tabernacle. It would have been useless to do so for it is distinctly stated that Jesus is “a minister of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched and not man.” We are “the building of God” (1 Cor. 3:9). We are “built, as living stones, into a spiritual temple” (1 Peter 1:5). Instead of a pattern for constructing an edifice what we need is the cement to hold us together as stones in the building. Later on in this series we shall show that this is exactly what God has furnished us.

2. A pattern must exist prior to the rearing or erection of a structure and those who do the building must be familiar with it. In the Jewish dispensation God established a system of legalism “as a temporary measure pending the arrival of the ‘issue’ to whom the promise was made” (Gal. 3:19). In any such system the law must be complete and announced in advance or the subjects may be guilty of violating something of which they do not know. Accordingly God called Moses into the mount and wrote for him the constitution on stone tablets and showed him a pattern of the tabernacle. In the new covenant arrangement we are not under law but under grace. It was more than twenty years after the community of saints was planted before the first letter from an apostle was written. By that time the gospel had been taken to the Gentile world and it was to such a congregation the first letter was addressed.

3. The passage which occurs in Hebrews 8:5 is found in a context in which the writer is contrasting the priesthood of Jesus with that of the priesthood prescribed by law. The argument is that the latter is an inferior priesthood because the priests ministered “in a sanctuary which is only a copy and shadow of the heavenly.” That this is true is proven by the fact that the tabernacle was constructed by human power and skill. “This is implied when Moses, about to erect the tent, is instructed by God: ‘See to it that you make everything according to the pattern shown you on the mountain.’” The pattern is mentioned, not to prove that we have one by which to make everything, but to show that any system based upon such a pattern is inferior. The very next sentence declares, “But in fact the ministry which has fallen to Jesus is as far superior to theirs as are the covenant he mediates and the promises upon which it is secured.”

The whole point of the Hebrew letter is that Moses needed a pattern for the first tabernacle because he was a mere servant in God’s house. No pattern was needed for the real tabernacle since it was constructed by God himself. “For every house has its founder; and the founder of all is God. Moses, then, was faithful as a servitor in God’s whole household; his task was to bear witness to the words that God would speak; but Christ is faithful as a son, set over his household” (Hebrews 3:4, 5).

4. The apostolic letters were written because of local conditions which arose and demanded attention. If the Thessalonians had not been disturbed about the state of the righteous dead and if some of them had not continued their slothful and indolent work habits, the first epistle would not have been written. If there had not been a misunderstanding of the tenor of the first letter as related to the coming of Christ there would have been no second. The first epistle to the Corinthians was called forth by a report from the family of Chloe and in reply to a letter of enquiry carried by Stephanas, Fortunatus and Achaicus. The Philippian letter was primarily one of thanks and appreciation which would not have been penned at all if a contribution had not been sent to the “ambassador in bonds.” The letter to Philemon was one of commendation for a fugitive slave returning to his master.

Since these letters were written to meet conditions as they arose among congregations existing in a pagan society, it is too much to expect they will cover in detail every condition which may affect the church of God in all ages, locations and cultures. I hold the view that the letters were not written as a pattern at all but to call men back toward an ideal involved in their acceptance of Jesus. As men deviated from the path leading toward this ideal it was necessary to recall them. It is obvious, then, that these letters create an understanding of a norm for those who attempt to be “laborers together with God.” Later, we shall attempt to define the ideal and when we do we believe that the purpose of the new covenant scriptures will be brought into sharper focus.

5. While the apostolic letters constituted a response to needs and conditions then existing they set forth principles which should govern the people of God in all ages until the absent King returns. These letters represented the will of that sovereign expressed by his special envoys. The ambassadors were endowed with the Holy Spirit to guarantee that the things they wrote corresponded with, and were actually an expression of, the divine purpose. It was not the purpose of these letters to give minute specifications but to create the kind of character or nature which would automatically and spontaneously respond in every contingency in a proper manner.

In this age of the Spirit it was not the intention of God to make his people mechanical robots moving jerkily when a particular law was quoted or realized, nor to constitute them puppets jumping with the manipulation of certain strings behind the scenes. Instead, the record declares “You, my friends, were called to be free men; only do not turn your freedom into license for your lower nature, but be servants to one another in love”

(Gal. 5:13). Law does not free, but confines. “Before this faith came, we were close prisoners in the custody of law, pending the revelation of faith” (Gal. 3:23). Law seeks to affect men from without, so no one can be made truly good by law. It can never justify nor give life. The new covenant scriptures are not new legislation but letters written in love to a new creation. Those who have been made “partakers of the divine nature” respond in a divine manner to every situation. Those who seek to gain the response by law “have a form of godliness but deny the power thereof.”

6. The apostolic letters were never intended to be exhaustive in specifying details even in dealing with the situations which called them forth. After having written at some length about the problems at Corinth, the apostle says, “The other matters I will arrange when I come” (1 Cor. 11:34). The RSV renders this, “About the other things I will give directions when I come.” What were the other things? How did they affect the life of the congregation? What directions were given? Surely it must be admitted that the letter to Corinth did not deal with every problem in that congregation.

The apostle John closes his letter “to the elect lady and her children” with the words, “Though I have much to write to you, I would rather not use paper and ink, but I hope to come to see you and talk with you face to face.” He concluded his letter, “to the beloved Gaius” in this fashion, “I had much to write to you, but I would rather not write with pen and ink. I hope to see you soon and we will talk together face to face.” What was included in “the much” that John would like to have written? What instructions, admonitions and exhortations did he impart when he met the addressees? We shall never know nor is it important that we know.

All who love the Lord can agree that while these letters were not exhaustive as to methods, manners and modes, the things that are written are for instruction and admonition. I am convinced from my own study that the principles enunciated cover every category of our relationship. It must be remembered that despite the multiform outworking of such relationships, they still fall into relatively few species or types. We do not need a detailed bill of specifications. We simply need to know how “the picked representatives of God’s new creation” are to respond within a certain sphere or domain. It would be foolish to reject the new covenant scriptures as containing no norm. It would be just as foolish to search them to find a scriptural precedent to meet every trivial problem in a modern congregation. The child of God can better employ his time than by engaging in either gnat-straining or nit-picking.

7. The content of the apostolic letters demonstrates that it was never the intention of the writers to compile a code of laws. One who writes statutes and judgments does not insert little matters of personal interest and concern at intervals throughout the document. What would you think if you were reading a copy of the Missouri Statutes and found tucked away among the “whereases” a request for the reader to pick up the writer’s overcoat and also bring along his writing materials? Does one insert in a legal code of jurisprudence a suggestion of a remedy for the stomach ulcer of the proofreader?

In the letter to Philemon in which the apostle refused to “pull his rank” as an ambassador in order to have his desire fulfilled (verses 8, 9) he inserts a casual request for a room reservation. “At the same time prepare a guest room for me” (verse 22). All of this makes these letters much more appealing unto me. Of course there is a natural curiosity about some of the things which were written and have not been preserved. I cannot help wondering what was in the letter John wrote to one congregation which their leader rejected with false accusations against the writer. “I sent a letter to the congregation, but Diotrephes, their would-be leader, will have nothing to do with us. If I come, I will bring up the things he is doing. He lays baseless and spiteful charges against us; not satisfied with that, he refuses to receive our friends, and he interferes with those who would do so, and tries to expel them from the congregation.” I wonder if John ever went, and if he did, what happened when he brought up the things this character was doing. I’m especially interested because I have met some of his “relatives” around over the country. They also refuse to receive some of my friends and have tossed out of their congregations some who would like to receive them.

There is no question but what the Mosaic dispensation was governed by a legalistic arrangement which is designated as “a written code” in contradistinction to the new covenant which is called “a spiritual bond” (2 Cor. 3:6). A simple comparison of the apostolic letters with the Pentateuch will show the difference. Take, for instance, the regulation of the law with reference to birds. This covered every contingency from robbing a bird’s nest of eggs or squabs (Deut. 22:6, 7) to the kind of birds which could not be eaten— “the eagle, the ossifrage, the osprey, the kite, the falcon, the raven, the ostrich, the nighthawk, the sea gull, the hawk, the owl, the cormorant, the ibis, the water hen, the pelican, the vulture, the stork, the heron, the hoopoe, and the bat.”

Unwittingly, I think, but nonetheless certainly, many of our brethren have drawn up almost such a list of particulars with reference to the Lord’s Supper and other aspects of Christian witness. This is the result of a mistaken concept, a reversion to Judaistic attitudes of justification. It culminates in confusion by exalting incidentals to essentials. It seeks to establish human judgment as being an infallible criterion by which to measure all others. Traditional procedures become hallowed in each party and division is finally enshrined as the divine objective. When this occurs men are discouraged from attempting any real reform. They trudge the weary rut of factional debate and wearily walk on the treadmill of partisan orthodoxy. They dare not question the whole structure of sectarian exclusiveness for fear they will be accused of denying the word of God or the revelation from heaven.

I hold no brief for the empty mouthings of modernism nor for the vapid vagaries of what is mis-called “liberalism.” I accept without question the fact that the sacred scriptures are a revelation from God just as I do not hesitate to affirm my belief that Jesus of Nazareth was a revelation of God. But I do challenge the use being made of the new covenant writings which reduces them to a repository of factional texts and purports to discover within them a specific prescription for every detail of current controversy. I am asked if it is not dangerous to thus write and speak. The question is raised as to whether some who are weak may not be encouraged to disregard the authority of the word. To this I reply that there is always an element of danger when anyone challenges an entrenched view with truth. Faith itself is not without its risks. Shall we continue in mistaken attitudes simply to “play safe”? Is it really being safe in a spiritual sense to maintain and defend the status quo at the expense of our integrity? All freedom has about it an aura of danger. Certainly one feels more secure behind the walls of exclusivism. Shall we purchase security by bartering away our freedom to investigate and our right to speak and act? Is it not an act of weakness upon our part to conceal truth by hiding behind the skirts of the weak? There will always be men who will seek for justification for their departures from the truth. Will we be held back from discovering and affirming the truth on the basis that they will use it as an excuse for their own undue latitude? It is not a sin to regard the word of God in its proper perspective.

THE TRUE PATTERN

Our pattern is not a law, not even a divine one. It is a person. Even the previous written code of legalism was temporary in nature and designed to bring us to him. Mistaking this fact the Jews set their hope on the written law. Jesus said,

“Your accuser is Moses, the very Moses on whom you have set your hope. If you believed Moses you would believe what I tell you, for it was about me that he wrote” (John 5:46) He further declared, “You study the scriptures diligently, supposing that in having them you have eternal life; yet, although their testimony points to me, you refuse to come to me for that life” (John 5:39, 40). Before Jesus ascended he opened the minds of the apostles to understand the scriptures and this understanding helped them to see for the first time the purpose of those scriptures. “Everything written about me in the Law of Moses and in the prophets and psalms was bound to be fulfilled.”

Jesus is our everything! God has made him “our wisdom, our righteousness and sanctification and redemption.” If we have any right to boast it cannot be because of our own program, performance or perfection. “Therefore, as it is written, Let him who boasts, boast of the Lord” (1 Cor. 1:31). The New English Version reads, “If a man is proud, let him be proud of the Lord.” So long as we regard the scriptures as a legalistic code we will be as proud as any other lawyer of our knowledge of the law. “This knowledge breeds conceit, it is love that builds. If anyone fancies that he knows, he knows nothing yet, in the true sense of knowing. But if a man loves, he is acknowledged by God” (1 Cor. 8:2).

The great envoy to the Gentiles reaches his peak when he writes to the Philippians. Referring to those who placed their confidence in ritualism of the law, he said “We are the circumcised, we whose worship is spiritual, whose pride is in Christ Jesus, and who put no confidence in anything external” (3:3). Several things need to be noted here. Our pride must not be that we are in Christ, but it must be in him. It is his status rather than our state which counts. We did not find him, he found us. Worship which is spiritual is also contrasted with confidence in external things. This is a definition and distinction which many need to learn.

Paul could have predicated his hope on externals. He writes, “If anyone thinks to base his hope on externals, I could make a stronger case for myself.” He then mentions some of these, including racial purity, tribal identity, attitude toward the law, pious zeal and legal rectitude. He says, “But all such assets I have written off because of Christ. I would say more: I count everything sheer loss, because all is far outweighed by the gain of knowing Christ Jesus my Lord for whose sake I did in fact lose everything. I count it so much garbage, for the sake of gaining Christ and finding myself incorporate in him, with no righteousness of my own, no legal rectitude, but the righteousness which comes from faith in Christ, given by God in response to faith.”

Jesus is our pattern and love our guiding principle. It is a summation of all law as well as the consummation of all law. “He who loves his neighbor has satisfied every claim of the law. For the commandments, ‘Thou shalt not commit adultery, thou shalt not kill, thou shalt not steal, thou shalt not covet,’ and any other commandment there may be, are all summed up in the one rule, ‘Love your neighbor as yourself.’ Love cannot wrong a neighbor, therefore the whole law is summed up in love” (Rom. 13:8-10). “Every claim— any other commandment— all summed up— one rule.”

In view of the fact that we have only one pattern (a person), and only one law (love), we fulfill the demands of God by pledging allegiance to our Lord Jesus Christ and loving one another. “We can approach God with confidence, and obtain from him whatever we ask, because we are keeping his commands and doing what he approves. This is his command: to give our allegiance to his Son Jesus Christ and love one another as he commanded” (1 John 3:22, 23). This is one of the most difficult things for men to grasp. So long have they regarded the religion of Christ as one of rules, regulations and rituals, they simply cannot accept the fact that the scriptures teach there is just one rule. Paul wrote that, “The whole law can be summed up in a single commandment: Love your neighbor as yourself” (Gal. 5:14).

PURPOSE OF SCRIPTURES
